COONEY v. PIRRELLI et al. (S. F. 12274.)

Supreme Court of California. April 11, 1928.

1. Trial ⚷191(11)—Instruction submitting question of damages, in action for injuries in which defendant admitted negligence, held not erroneous as assuming some injuries.

In action for injuries, where defendant's counsel admitted all the allegations of complaint except as to injuries and agreed that there was no issue before the jury except as to the extent of the injuries, instruction submitting question of damages to jury held not erroneous as assuming injuries, especially where qualifying term "if any" was applied to the injuries; and in view of counsel's admissions and evidence court could properly have assumed that some injuries were sustained as result of the admitted negligence.

2. Appeal and error ⚷882(8)—Inadvertent direction of jury's attention to fact that plaintiff suing for injuries was overseas man held not prejudicial, where matter was first injected into case by defendant.

In action for injuries, inadvertent direction of jury's attention to fact that plaintiff was an overseas man held not prejudicial; especially where the defendant first brought the matter to the jury's attention in an attempt to show previous impaired state of plaintiff's health.

3. Appeal and error ⚷=1050(1)—Testimony of plaintiff, suing for injuries, that wife and child were with him in automobile, held not prejudicial.

In action for injuries, permitting plaintiff to answer that his wife and child were with him in automobile at time injuries were sustained held not prejudicial, on theory that sympathy was unduly created by showing plaintiff was head of a family.

4. Damages ⚷=132(2)—$7,500 for injuries to truckman's head, ribs, and knee joint and creating possibility of lung infection and weakening knee and for pain and suffering held not excessive (Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 5).

$7,500 damages for injuries consisting of cuts on head, concussion of brain, rib fracture, and injury to knee of truckman, subjecting him to possible lung infection and impairing usefulness of his knee, and for pain and suffering, held not excessive under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 5.

5. Damages ⚷=24—Damages cannot be enhanced by mere remote possibility of future ill effects.

The mere remote possibility of future ill effects will not justify jury in increasing its award of damages for injuries.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Frank Cooney against A. O. Pirrelli and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. On the evening of August 2, 1925, respondent Frank Cooney, his wife and child, and William Aspe and wife, respondent's stepfather and mother, respectively, and Mr. and Mrs. William Schnorr, father-in-law and mother-in-law, respectively, of respondent, were occupants of a Stephens seven-passenger automobile returning from a trip to Stanislaus county to San Francisco. When near Livermore, Alameda county, respondent, who was at the wheel, pulled off and clear of the paved portion of the highway by two feet, stopped his car, set his brakes and got out to examine the mechanism, which was not functioning properly. The hour was between 8 and 9 o'clock at night. Both front and rear lights were burning. The automatic starter having failed to work, respondent stepped to the front of the car to crank it, when his car was struck with great violence by a Moon sedan machine driven by appellant, who, from some unexplained circumstance, had left the paved portion of the highway and struck respondent's car from the rear, forcing it forward, with such force as to throw respondent down. The car passed over his body, thereby causing the injuries complained against.

[1] At the trial appellant admitted the allegations of the complaint charging negligence and carelessness on his part and thereby narrowed the issues to the extent of the injuries suffered. The instruction of the court, framed upon the admissions of counsel, is now objected to on the ground that no admission was made that respondent suffered any injuries which were the proximate result of appellant's negligence. The instruction, together with the colloquy that occurred between court and counsel for respondent at the time said instruction was given, follows:

> "You are instructed that by reason of the admissions of negligence made by the defendant, that there is but one issue for you to determine in each of these cases, namely, the amount of damages to be awarded to the respective plaintiffs—I am afraid of that, Mr. Johnson. I will withdraw that instruction.
> "Mr. Johnson: The amount of damages, if any, would cure any possible uncertainty.
> "The Court: You are instructed that by reason of the admissions of negligence made by the defendant, that there is but one issue for you to determine in each of these cases, namely, the amount of damages to be awarded to the plaintiff Cooney, and the amount of damages, if any, to be awarded to the plaintiff Aspe. In the case of Frank Cooney, in assessing damages that you should award him you should take into consideration the character of the injury sustained by him, the nature, extent and severity of the injury sustained, and whether the same is temporary or permanent in its character. In estimating the amount of such damages you may consider the physical and mental pain suffered, if any, the extent, nature, and character of suffering, mental or physical, if any, and its duration and severity. You may also consider any physical pain or mental pain, if any, which you believe from the evidence the plaintiff Frank Cooney is reasonably certain to suffer in the future."

We have given sufficient of the instruction to show that the court did not assume that the respondent had suffered a compensable injury. The instruction, as shown by the reproduced portion and as appears in the portions we have omitted, in speaking of the alleged injuries, uses the qualifying term "if any" (injuries) were sustained. There was no unqualified assumption by the court of the existence of any fact not proved. We think, however, from the admissions of counsel and in view of the uncontroverted evidence that the court could properly have assumed that the respondent suffered injuries to some extent by reason of appellant's admitted negligence. The following colloquy, which occurred between counsel for appellant and respondent and the court, would justify such an assumption:

> "Mr. Hoge: The defendant admits all of the allegations of the complaint except the allega-

⚷=For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes tions as to injuries. We will place before the jury merely the question as to what injuries these people sustained. I have been so instructed. I desire to make the statement that the admission of the allegations of the complaint is made with the consent and under the direction of my clients who are present in court. I want to say that for my own protection.

"The Court: The allegations as to the accident itself?

"Mr. Hoge: The allegations as to the accident itself. We do not admit the allegations as to the injuries, and we do not admit the truth as to the opening statement made by Mr. Johnson.

"The Court: Then there will be no issue before the jury except as to the extent of the injuries?

"Mr. Hoge: Yes."

That counsel admitted that respondent sustained injuries as the proximate result of the appellant's negligence and disputed merely the extent of the same, as he was compelled to do under the convincing proofs in the case, seems clear.

[2, 3] There is no merit in the complaint that appellant was prejudiced because inadvertently it was brought to the attention of the jury that respondent was an "overseas" man. Appellant, in an attempt to show respondent's previous impaired state of health, first brought to the jury's attention the fact that respondent had performed overseas service in the World War. Nor is there any merit in the claim that appellant suffered prejudice by permitting the respondent, when a witness, to answer that his wife and child were with him at the time the injuries were inflicted. Appellant's objection to this testimony was on the theory that sympathy was unduly created by showing that respondent was the head of a family.

[4, 5] Complaint is made that the award of damages, which was for the sum of $7,500, was excessive and the result of passion and prejudice on the part of the jury. Section 657, subd. 5, Code Civ. Proc. The injuries consisted in three lacerated cuts upon the head, concussion of the brain, fracture of the third rib, resulting in an injury to the lungs by puncture, an injury to the lining of the knee joint, breaking of the bones of the nose and a separation from the nasal plate, and numerous bodily bruises and contusions. One physician testified that he was permanently affected and liable to blood-stream infection, and while he could not testify that respondent was suffering from a serious lung infection at the time he examined him, there was a possibility that the injury to the lung had rendered him more susceptible to lung infection. Respondent was confined to a hospital for a period of two months on account of the knee injury and complained of having suffered pain in and weakness of said knee by reason of said injuries. Respondent was a truck driver by occupation, and naturally a weakened condition of the knee would seriously impede his usefulness in the performance of his labors as a truckman. While the damages were doubtless sufficient, we have no comparative method by which damages for injuries, such as those described in the evidence, can be measured, and must repose much in the conscience of the trial judge, who saw the parties to the action and heard the evidence. Mere remote possibility of future ill effects are not sufficient to justify a jury in enhancing its award. We cannot say, however, in the instant case, that the amount of the award, as a matter of law, was excessive, considered with respect to the injuries actually suffered.

We concur: CURTIS, J.; PRESTON, J.

ASPE v. PIRRELLI et al. (S. F. 12274a.)

Supreme Court of California. April 11, 1928.

Damages ⚷132(3)—$500 for pain in back and shoulders, partially incapacitating drayman occupying car, as result of impact with another automobile, held not excessive.

$500 damages to drayman injured in back and shoulders by shock of impact of another car striking that which he occupied held not excessive, in view of drayman's testimony as to pain and inability to do certain work which he formerly did in his business.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by William Aspe against A. O. Pirrelli and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This case, by reason of having been tried with case No. S. F. 12274, was not given a number. For purposes of identification it will be numbered S. F. No. 12274a.

William Aspe, respondent herein, was an occupant of the automobile driven by Frank Cooney on August 2, 1925, which was struck from the rear by a Moon sedan driven by said A. O. Pirrelli. The facts are described in the case of Frank Cooney v. A. O. Pirrelli, S. F. No. 12274 (Cal. Sup.) 266 P. 273, this day decided. Said William Aspe and his wife, Louise, were seated on the back seat. The rear end of the car was struck by appellant's car with such force as to wreck it.

This cause, which was also one for personal injuries received by reason of the negligence of appellant, and S. F. No. 12274, supra, were tried at the same time by stipulation of the parties to both actions, the jury returning separate verdicts. The issues, admissions, and facts were the same in both causes, except as to the character and extent of the injuries received by the respective plaintiffs, in said respective causes. Respondent Aspe alleged in his complaint that he was thrown forward with great force and violence by the impact of appellant's automobile striking the automobile in which he was sitting, and thereby sustained a severe sprain of the back and suffered and continues to suffer much pain and anguish and a severe nervous shock by the negligent acts of appellant as described in said case S. F. No. 12274. The jury returned a verdict in his favor in the sum of $500.

A separate appeal was taken to this court. The decision of the cause last cited is decisive of every issue raised upon this appeal except as to the extent of the injuries suffered by reason of the negligent acts of appellant, which includes the question of excessive damages which are claimed to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice. The respondent, who was a drayman, testified that, by reason of the shock of the impact heretofore described, he has since suffered pain in the region of the back and shoulders to the extent that he has been incapacitated from doing the work which he formerly did in his business. His testimony is to the effect that he suffered pain as a result of his injuries and that his physician had "strapped" him up quite severely as a part of the medical treatment. There is nothing before us by which we can say that the amount of the award was influenced by passion or prejudice.

Case S. F. No. 12274 necessarily compels an affirmance of the judgment in the instant case. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: CURTIS, J.; PRESTON, J.

ASPE et al. v. PIRRELLI. (S. F. 12747.)★

Hearing Denied in Bank May 7, 1928.

1. Damages ⟹222—$2,500 verdict on evidence which failed to show actual physical injuries alleged held unwarranted under complaint based solely upon physical injuries, where there was no finding upon special damages.

In action for injuries by occupant of automobile, struck from rear by another car in which complaint alleged that plaintiff sustained physical injuries without alleging special damages, $2,500 verdict, based upon evidence which failed to show actual physical injuries alleged, but merely showed neurasthenic and hysterical condition and chronic neuritis, possibly aggravated by an assumed blow, held unwarranted, where court found all of allegations contained in complaint were true and made no finding upon special damages to which the evidence was directed.

2. Damages ⟹222—Defendant is entitled to findings upon issues of special damages in action for injuries.

In action for injuries defendant is entitled to special findings upon issues made by evidence of special damages, in order that he may point out precise errors of trial court upon motion for new trial and upon appeal.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Allen, Judge.

Action by Louise Aspe and another against A. O. Pirrelli. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco (Enid Childs, of Berkeley, of counsel), for appellant.

George K. Ford, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. This case and Cooney v. Pirrelli, S. F. No. 12274 (Cal. Sup.) 266 P. 273, and Aspe v. Pirrelli, S. F. No. 12274a (Cal. Sup.) 266 P. 275, this day decided, are companion cases as to the cause of and the circumstances attending the accident, which, it is claimed, resulted in inflicting injuries upon respondent. The facts are fully set out in the first of said cited cases. One or two important propositions of law arise in the instant case which were not present in the other two cases. In the instant case, as in the said other two cases, negligence was admitted by appellant. The main disputed issues here are whether respondent suffered any injuries at all as the proximate result of the negligence of appellant in operating his said automobile and, if it be found that she did, whether the award of the court, to wit, $2,500, was greatly in excess of any damages actually sustained by her.

We have carefully considered the evidence, and feel convinced that the full amount of the award is not, as a matter of law, supported by the evidence. Mrs. Aspe was occupying with her husband, the back seat of said automobile at the time it was struck from the rear by appellant's car. She was not rendered unconscious by the impact, nor was she seemingly unduly disturbed by shock at the time of the accident. She received no cuts, lacerations, bruises, or broken bones. Her testimony is that, immediately after the impact, she looked around to see if all were safe. She discovered her son, Frank Cooney, lying under the automobile, apparently dead. This shock is stressed as one of the contributing causes of the neurasthenic condition which is made the basis of damages herein. Upon seeing her son prone under the automobile she became greatly excited and bewildered, as she explained herself. Her statement was that her anxiety for his safety so affected her that she was unable to recollect just what was subsequently done at the scene of the accident. She testified that she was struck upon the back of the head, but she was unable to say what had struck her. No person testified to having seen a contusion or bruise of any kind upon her head or to have heard her make any complaint. She also testified that, in some manner, two of her front teeth were loosened. Strictly speaking, these are the only physical injuries which she claimed to have sustained. The after effects, as described by respondent, are in the main attributable to shock and fear. It is claimed that, if the collision did not directly cause the physical condition complained of, it hastened and accelerated the diseases and sclerotic conditions that inevitably accompany advancing years. The age of respondent was about 56 years. Neither the husband nor any of the persons who were at the scene of the injury were aware that appellant had suffered serious injury or shock until some hours thereafter. No physician attended her and at no time did she require hospital attention. Her sister, who was a professional masseuse, testified that respondent came to her room about 1 o'clock a. m. on August 3 in an hysterical condition. She gave her a course of treatments and attention. Respondent's daughter, who is a trained nurse, accompanied her aunt and mother, who was visiting the former at her eastern home, to California about one year after the accident, and has since remained with her mother. She testified that respondent was in a nervous and hysterical condition that rendered her much less efficient in assisting her husband in conducting his business than formerly. The husband was engaged in the business of piano mover and operated five trucks in conducting said business. Respondent wife did the bookkeeping, signed checks, and attended to the three phones installed for the purpose of receiving orders. She put in full hours as his business assistant. After the accident she was easily confused and only able to give part time to the duties which she formerly performed. Her husband finally employed a man to take her place, except that she went to the office on Saturdays to sign checks. Her ailments, as described by her sister, daughter, and husband, were manifested by occasional sleepless nights, forgetfulness, extreme nervousness, and fearfulness. She was given to making outcries at night, which was termed by the witness "nightmares."

The physician called by respondent at the trial made an examination of her physical condition a day or two before he testified. He found her heart, lungs, blood pressure and abdomen to be normal. The sensations over the body as to heat, cold and pain were also normal, as were the reflexes. The reaction of her pupils to light was a little sluggish. There was some hardening of the arteries, the beginning of arterio-sclerosis. The urine was carrying a considerable quantity of albumen. It was this physician's opinion that respondent had a chronic nephritis. He also said that in all probability it was caused by the injury received from an assumed blow. The injury referred to is based upon traumatic injury. The effect of said blow could not be determined without some knowledge of its force. The blow, so far as the evidence goes, appears to be a matter of small significance. It was the opinion of said physician, adopting his language, that respondent's "neurasthenia and hysteria were aggravated by the presence of her diseased kidneys, and I further believe that these kidneys were diseased at the time she was injured and probably long before." It was his opinion, however, as elsewhere expressed, that the symptoms indicated to him some evidence of traumatic injury and that would tend to aggravate her ailments. The defendant called two physicians in his behalf, who testified at considerable length. They were of the opinion that the accident had nothing whatever to do with respondent's condition. No evidence of trauma was discernible. Their examination of respondent convinced them that the cause of respondent's trouble was hypertension (high blood pressure) coincident with kidney disease. Her symptoms were attributable to conditions produced by advancing years.

[1, 2] From our examination of the evidence, we conclude that the full amount of the judgment cannot be sustained. The state of both the proof and the pleadings make it impossible for us to order an affirmance conditional upon respondent consenting to accept a reduced sum. The allegata et probata are absolutely at variance with each other. The complaint alleges one ground of damage and the evidence is directed to an entirely different ground. For example, the complaint alleges that respondent sustained physical injuries, to wit, a sprain of the left shoulder and back and concussion of the spine and a severe nervous shock. These allegations are denied by the answer. No evidence whatever was offered to show that she sustained the physical injuries specifically pleaded. As another ground of damage, it was alleged that respondent did the housework, including the cooking, for herself and family; that since sustaining said injuries she had been only partially able to perform said service. The above allegations were also denied by the answer. Not one word of evidence was introduced in support of said allegations. Indeed, the evidence adduced was directed solely to the assistance rendered to her husband as an assistant in carrying on his business as a piano mover. In fact, her time was so completely occupied with her office duties as to repel the inference that she had time for any other duties. The complaint contained no allegation as to the special damage to which the proofs were directed. Ordinarily it will be held that, where a case is tried on a theory not outlined in the pleadings without objection by the adversary, the losing party will not be permitted thereafter to complain. In the instant case, however, the court found that all of the allegations contained in the complaint were true excepting the amount of damage sustained, which, of course, included alleged but unproved household services and excluded special damages, to which some evidence was directed, but which were not pleaded in the complaint. There is no finding upon the special damages to which the evidence was directed. The appellant was entitled to special findings upon the issues thus made in order that he might point out the precise errors of the trial court upon motion for a new trial and upon appeal. Klein v. Milne, 198 Cal. 71, 243 P. 420.

The situation is somewhat anomalous, and we see no other alternative but to remand the case to the trial court for a new trial.

BOYD et al. v. BENNEYAN et al.

Supreme Court of California. April 12, 1928.

1. Mortgages 🔑468(3)—Court may appoint receiver in foreclosure proceeding, where value of premises is less than mortgage debt and mortgagor is insolvent (Code Civ. Proc. § 564).

When foreclosure proceeding is instituted, court has power in its discretion to appoint receiver, under Code Civ. Proc. § 564, where it is shown that value of premises is less than mortgage debt and that mortgagor is insolvent.

2. Mortgages 🔑550—Court cannot appoint receiver to collect rents and profits after foreclosure sale for payment to purchaser (Code Civ. Proc. § 707).

In foreclosure proceeding, court held to have no authority to appoint receiver to collect rents, issues, and profits arising from possession of premises after sale and during period of redemption, to be paid to purchaser, notwithstanding that purchaser is entitled to rents of property sold or value of use and occupation during such period, under Code Civ. Proc. § 707.

3. Evidence 🔑84—Price bid by purchasers at foreclosure sale is presumed to be value of property.

Price bid for property by purchasers at sale on foreclosure of mortgage is presumed to be its value.

4. Mortgages 🔑550—In foreclosure proceeding, provision of judgment directing receiver's collection of rents after sale for purchaser held severable from valid provisions and subject to attack by motion to amend judgment.

In proceeding for foreclosure of mortgage, provision of judgment directing that receiver should collect rents and profits after foreclosure sale for payment to purchaser at such sale, though void on its face, was severable from valid provision for appointment of receiver to hold prior to sale and is subject to attack by motion to amend judgment.

5. Mortgages 🔑550—Funds in receiver's possession accruing after foreclosure sale held subject to disposition by court on receiver's discharge.

In foreclosure proceeding, funds in possession of receiver which accrued after sale and during period of redemption held subject to disposition by court at time of receiver's discharge as "further order of the court," specified in original order appointing receiver.

6. Mortgages 🔑550—Court held not to abuse discretion in discharging receiver after foreclosure sale and ordering payment of funds accruing after sale to crop mortgagees.

In proceeding for foreclosure of mortgage, court held not to abuse discretion in discharging receiver after foreclosure sale and ordering payment of proceeds of crops accruing after such sale and during period of redemption to defendants to apply on their notes secured by crop mortgages.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Laura Jane Boyd and others against Mrs. H. Benneyan, also known as H. Benneyan, and others. From an order made after final judgment, discharging receiver and directing disposition of money in his hands, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

G. L. Aynesworth and L. N. Barber, both of Fresno, for appellants.

L. B. Hayhurst and K. Kuyumjian, both of Fresno, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from an order made after final judgment discharging a receiver and directing the payment of the balance of moneys in his hands to the defendants.

The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage on real property given to secure a promissory note in the sum of $8,750 executed by defendant Mrs. H. Benneyan, in favor of the plaintiffs. The mortgage by its terms also covered the rents, issues, and profits of the mortgaged premises. Before the mortgage was executed, the defendant mortgagor had signed a marketing contract with defendant Sun-Maid Raisin Growers of California, pursuant to which the latter was entitled to receive delivery of the 1925 crop of raisins grown on the mortgaged premises. Subsequent to the execution of the mortgage and prior to the commencement of this action, the defendant Mrs. H. Benneyan gave to each of the defendants Paul Enochian and M. S. Constantian a mortgage on the 1925 crop to secure payment of notes for $1,475.71 and $856, respectively. All of these mortgages were duly recorded. At the commencement of the action a receiver was appointed by the court to take possession of the mortgaged premises, manage, cultivate, and farm the same, harvest, sell, and dispose of the crops, and collect and hold the rents, issues, and profits subject to the further order of the court. The order appointing the receiver was made on a showing that the value of the premises was less than the mortgage debt and that the defendant mortgagor was insolvent. Upon a hearing the trial court found the facts, concerning which there is no dispute, and entered its decree of foreclosure wherein it was adjudged that the plaintiffs were entitled to a sale of the mortgaged premises; that the receivership be continued to carry out the provisions of the decree, and ordered that the rents, issues, and profits received from the property prior to the sale be applied to the payment of any deficiency, and that the rents, issues, and profits arising after the sale and during the period of redemption be paid to the purchaser at said sale. Pursuant to the decree, and on April 14, 1925, a sale of the premises was conducted at which plaintiffs became the purchasers. A deficiency judgment in their favor in the sum of $1,435.58 was entered. No appeal was taken from the judgment and no motion was made to set it aside, until the events hereinafter related. The receiver took possession at the time of his appointment and farmed the premises. After the sale, but within the period of redemption, he harvested the crops and delivered them to the defendant Sun-Maid Raisin Growers of California. Out of the proceeds which he received therefor, after deducting his expenditures, he reported a balance on hand of $234.20. There were, however, further sums to be received from the defendant Sun-Maid Raisin Growers, on account of the sale and delivery to that corporation of the crops involved. On February 4, 1926, the report of the receiver was approved, whereupon the court ordered that said balance on hand be paid to the plaintiffs who were the owners and holders of the deficiency judgment.

On the 19th day of February, 1926, pursuant to notice, the defendant Mrs. Benneyan moved the court to modify the decree of foreclosure as to the continuance in office of the receiver during the period of redemption and as to the disposition of the proceeds from the sale of the 1925 crops grown and produced on the mortgaged premises, and to discharge the receiver and order payment of the proceeds from the sale of the crops to defendants to apply on the notes secured by crop mortgages hereinbefore mentioned. The motion was made on the ground that the order continuing the receiver in office was contrary to law and therefore void, and that the defendant mortgagees were entitled to the proceeds from the sale of the crops. The motion was submitted to the court for decision, and several months after the period of redemption had expired the following order was made pursuant to the said motion:

> "It is ordered that the receiver heretofore appointed in the above-entitled action be and he is hereby discharged; and that all moneys received by him since the filing of his last report herein be paid over by him to the said defendants."

From this order the plaintiffs have appealed. They contend that the rights of the parties were established by the decree of foreclosure, and that the motion, pursuant to which the order appealed from was made, was a collateral attack upon the judgment and beyond the power of the court to grant.

[1, 2] It is beyond question that the court, when the foreclosure proceeding was instituted, had the power in its discretion to appoint a receiver where, as here, a proper showing had been made. Section 564, Code Civ. Proc. And the power of the court to continue the receiver in possession until the sale of the mortgaged premises is not here questioned. A sharp dispute has arisen between counsel as to the power of the court to continue the receiver in possession after the sale and during the period of redemption. The plaintiffs contend that the court had such power and cite in support of their contention numerous cases in other jurisdictions where the appointment of a receiver to take or continue in possession of the mortgaged premises during the period of redemption has been upheld, but upon examination we find them to be cases where the purpose of the receivership during the period of redemption was to satisfy a deficiency judgment, if any, entered after the judicial sale. The continuance of the possession of the receiver after the sale and during the period of redemption for the purpose of satisfying a deficiency judgment has likewise been sanctioned in this state. Montgomery v. Merrill, 65 Cal. 432, 4 P. 414. The foreclosure decree in this case, however, did not require that the funds in the hands of the receiver as a result of his operations during the period of redemption be applied to any deficiency, but specifically provided that the rents, issues, and profits arising from the possession of the premises after the sale and during the period of redemption be paid to the purchaser at such sale. We think that such an order of the trial court, made either in the decree of foreclosure itself or independently thereof, was not only erroneous but was in excess of the power of the court. If it had been provided that the receiver continue in possession for the purpose of the application of the funds properly coming into his hands during the period of redemption to the satisfaction of a deficiency judgment, if any, the situation would have been different, but we know of no law which authorizes the court to appoint a receiver or to continue a receiver in possession of the mortgaged property during the period of redemption for the purpose of paying the rents, issues and profits to the purchaser at the sale. As was said in West v. Conant, 100 Cal. 231, at p. 233, 34 P. 705, 706:

> "We know of no provision of the Codes, of any decision, or of any principle upon which the purchaser is entitled to place a receiver in charge of the property during the period of redemption."

[3] True, the purchaser is entitled to the rents of the property sold or to the value of the use and occupation thereof during the period of redemption under section 707 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but such statutory right affords no sufficient reason for the appointment of a receiver merely to secure to the purchaser the rent or the value of the use and occupation of the premises during the period of redemption and there appears to be no reason at all for the appointment of a receiver to take from the mortgagor his right of possession during the period of redemption for the benefit of the purchaser or to appropriate to the use of the purchaser the issues and profits arising from such possession during that period. The fact that in this case the mortgagees happened to be the purchasers is of no controlling significance. The purchasers might have been strangers to the mortgage. The price they bid for the property is presumed to be its value and they have no further concern except to see that their rights as purchasers are protected and that they receive from those in possession of the property the rents, or the value of the use and occupation during the period of redemption.

[4] The provision of the judgment here assailed does not purport to be for the protection of the owners or holders of a deficiency judgment, but only for the benefit of the purchasers, and, as there is no authority in law for the appointment of a receiver for the benefit of the purchaser, as such, we think such provision was void on its face and, being severable from the admittedly valid provision for the appointment of a receiver to hold prior to the sale, is subject to the attack made upon it and could and should be disregarded by the court in its disposition of said motion.

[5, 6] The account of the receiver was approved on February 4, 1926, and the balance then in his possession after the payment of his expenses and fees was ordered paid on account of the deficiency judgment. As to this order there is no objection on the part of any of the parties. The disposition of the collections by the receiver after this report and prior to his discharge forms the basis of this controversy. The period of redemption expired on April 14, 1926, and the receiver was discharged by order of the court on July 30, 1926. As there is no contention by the plaintiff that any moneys in the hands of the receiver and subject to the order of July 30, 1926, came into his hands or that the right thereto accrued prior to the sale, it must be assumed that the right to all funds involved on this appeal and coming into the hands of the receiver accrued after the sale and during the period of redemption. Such being the case, the funds in the possession of the receiver at the time of his discharge were subject to disposition by the court at that time as the "further order of the court" specified in the original order appointing the receiver and made in the exercise of a wise discretion. We cannot say on the record before us that the court abused its discretion in making the order appealed from. It is conceded, of course, by the plaintiffs that the said order of July 30, 1926, in so far as it provided for the discharge of the receiver, was within the power of the court to make.

SARTORI v. GRANUCCI et al. (S. F. 12328.)

1. Automobiles ⟹244(6)—In action by pedestrian, struck by motorist while crossing street, evidence justified jury's finding in favor of plaintiff.

In action by pedestrian, struck by defendant's automobile while crossing street in which defendant did not contradict testimony to effect that he was on wrong side of street when accident happened, evidence held to justify jury's finding in favor of plaintiff.

2. Automobiles ⟹246(14)—In action by pedestrian, struck by automobile while crossing street, giving instruction relating to statute requiring driving on right half of highway held proper (Motor Vehicle Act, § 122).

In action by pedestrian, struck by defendant's automobile while attempting to cross street, giving instruction that Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 557, § 122) provided that driver of vehicle shall drive same on right half of public highway, and that, if jury found that defendant was not driving automobile on right half of street, and that it was practicable to travel close to right-hand curb of street, he was guilty of negligence as matter of law held not error, since statute referred to is for benefit of any one who might possibly be injured as proximate result of its violation, and not only for benefit of overtaking vehicles.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by H. J. Sartori against Esperiano Granucci and others for damages for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin and Francis N. Foley, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment against it in an action to recover for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the agent of the defendant copartnership, in driving an automobile. The driver is also made a defendant.

Plaintiff was crossing Green street, in the city and county of San Francisco, from the north to the south side, about 50 feet east of its intersection with Columbus avenue, and collided with an automobile operated by defendant Guido Granucci. It is unnecessary to discuss the evidence in its entirety, but it is sufficient to point out that there was some evidence in the record from which the jury might have found that, upon a wet and slippery pavement, defendant Guido Granucci was driving between 20 and 25 miles an hour. Because of the rain and the mist, he could only see 10 or 15 feet ahead of him. He made a left turn from Columbus avenue into Green street. Green street runs in a general easterly and westerly direction. He was on the left side of the street and was attempting to cross to the right side. This defendant did not contradict the testimony to the effect that he was on the wrong side of the street when the accident happened—he merely said that he "could not say" as to that. He did testify, however, that the right-hand side of the street was clear, and that it would have been possible for him to have traveled close to the right-hand curb on Green street—that there was a clear street. Again, in his testimony, said defendant admitted that at the time of the accident his automobile was in a place where it would be struck by an automobile going in the other direction and on the right-hand side of the street.

Plaintiff testified that he stepped off the curb on the northerly side of Green street and looked to the east (the direction from which he might expect vehicles to approach him), and before he could turn to the west, he was struck and became unconscious.

[1] Without further discussion, we may say that the finding of the jury in favor of the plaintiff upon the evidence above recited is fully justified.

[2] The only other point urged upon the appeal is that the court erred in giving the following instruction:

> "The Motor Vehicle Act further provided that, on all occasions, the driver of a vehicle shall drive the same upon the right half of a public highway and close to the right-hand edge or curb of such highway, unless it is impracticable to travel on such side of the highway, and except when overtaking and passing other vehicles, in which latter case the vehicle may be driven on the left side of the highway if such left side is clear and unobstructed for at least 100 yards ahead.
> "If you find from the evidence in this case that C. Granucci was not driving the Buick automobile upon the right half of the street and close to the right-hand curb of such street and that it was practicable to travel close to the right-hand curb of such street, then you are instructed that he was guilty of negligence as a matter of law."

It is contended that the foregoing instruction was erroneous because the provision of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 557, § 122) contained therein was not a provision for the benefit of pedestrians, but for the benefit of overtaking vehicles. The position of appellant upon this matter is not sound. The provision in question is clearly for the benefit of any one who might possibly be injured as the proximate result of its violation. An instruction similar to the one just quoted was approved in the case of Weihe v. Rathjen Mercantile Co., 34 Cal. App. 302, 167 P. 287.

There are no other matters requiring discussion, and the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Gertrude Wallace and another against the Great Western Power Company of California. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Collins, Roan & Collins, of Oakland, and C. K. Bonestell, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Guy C. Earl and W. H. Spaulding, both of San Francisco, and Crosby, Naus & Crosby, of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiffs commenced this action for damages for the death of their minor son, a boy of a little over 12 years of age, caused by his coming in contact with a high voltage cable located upon and passing through an electric tower within the limits of the city of Oakland, which cable and tower were being maintained by the defendant for the purpose of the transmission of an electric current of high voltage along its power lines and into said city. The tower in question was one of a series of steel-framed towers which the defendant had constructed, and was maintaining to about the number of seven to a mile, from its power producing plant to said city. This particular tower was situated upon the slope of a hill in the open country which lies in the outskirts of the city of Oakland, and which is used quite generally by outing parties and for picnic purposes, the land upon which it was located not being inclosed nor the public being excluded from its use. At the time of the injury to the plaintiffs' son which caused his death he, with a companion of about the same age, was playing in the vicinity of this tower, and it was suggested by one of them that they climb the tower. There was no ladder or other means of ascending the tower except that of "shinnying" up its vertical supports to reach its horizontal braces, which begin about 8 feet from the ground and form a series of from 6 to 8 feet apart to the summit. The lowest wires which are supported by this tower rest upon cross-arms 33 feet from the ground. Plaintiffs' son climbed this distance of 33 feet up the tower until he arrived at said cross-arms, and either crept to or came sufficiently near one of said high voltage wires to receive the shock which caused his death. The cause was tried before a jury, but at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon a number of grounds, among which was that the deceased boy was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The trial court granted the motion for nonsuit upon all grounds and entered judgment accordingly in the defendant's favor, from which the plaintiffs have prosecuted this appeal. While the appellants undertake to discuss a number of questions involved in the defendant's motion for nonsuit, and which relate to the negligence of the defendant in the maintenance of the structure in question, practically the only question which is presented upon this appeal is the question as to whether or not the trial court was in error in granting the motion for nonsuit upon the ground that the deceased boy was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

[1-3] In determining this question, it may be conceded that the question of contributory negligence, especially where the evidence is in any material degree conflicting, is a question of fact for the jury, and it may also be conceded that the question as to whether children of the age of about 14 years or younger have been guilty of contributory negligence in relation to the instrumentality which has caused their injury or death is, as a general rule, a question of fact for the jury. The determination of this question, however, depends upon what the evidence discloses as to the degree of intelligence of the minor and as to his opportunity for knowing or being aware of the danger which attends his coming or bringing himself in contact with such dangerous instrumentalities or agencies as are high power electric wires. Assuming the defendant herein to have been guilty of negligence in the maintenance of this electric tower in an open and unguarded state within the limits or vicinity of a populous city and without the presence of signs or devices which would give warning to persons who might be tempted to play upon or ascend the tower, the trial court was still in a position, upon motion for nonsuit, to determine from all of the circumstances of the case whether the deceased boy, though a minor, was sufficiently intelligent and sufficiently familiar with the dangers incident to contact with high power electric wires that his action in ascending this tower by the difficult means of ascent afforded and to the height and place of danger to which he did thus succeed in climbing, was to be held guilty of negligence as a matter of law. The courts of the country have quite generally held that the action of the trial court in determining this question either way will not, as a rule, be disturbed by an appellate tribunal, in the absence of a clear showing of abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in the granting or in the denial of a motion for nonsuit based upon that ground. Mayne v. San Diego Elec. Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 173, 175 P. 690, and cases cited. We are unable, in the light of the facts as presented in the instant case, to determine that there was such abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court, and this being so we are unable to declare that the action of the trial court in granting the defendant's motion for nonsuit upon that ground was reversible error.

PARKER v. PARKER. (S. F. 12078.)

Supreme Court of California. April 10, 1928.

1. Divorce 🔑255—Default divorce decree granting wife alimony under complaint which merely prayed for divorce and custody of minor child and for general relief held not void as against collateral attack (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 580, and § 585, subd. 2).

Prayer for relief in complaint in wife's suit for divorce, seeking divorce decree and care and custody of minor child and "for such other and further relief as to the court may seem proper," held to give court jurisdiction to award alimony on default, as against attack on motion to vacate order for issuance of execution, notwithstanding alimony was not specifically asked for, since Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 580, and section 585, subd. 2, do not render default judgment in excess of amount prayed for void, but merely subject to modification.

2. Divorce 🔑263—Court's ex parte order for execution to collect unpaid alimony held not void, notwithstanding facts which if disclosed might have required notice to judgment debtor (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

Order obtained by divorced wife for issuance of execution to require payment of alimony under decree held not void for failure to give notice to defendant under Code Civ. Proc. § 685, which is a continuation of Practice Act, § 214, though, on account of plaintiff's remarriage, facts were such that notice of motion might have been required had the court been informed of them.

3. Divorce 🔑263—Remedy of judgment debtor to prevent execution to collect alimony is by motion to vacate and recall execution (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

Remedy of defendant as judgment debtor in divorce suit, after plaintiff has obtained ex parte order for issuance of execution to collect alimony under Code Civ. Proc. § 685, is to move to vacate the order and recall the execution.

4. Divorce 🔑263—Divorced wife who remarried is presumed to have been supported by second husband (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

Divorced wife who remarried is presumed to have been supported by her second husband in proceedings under the original divorce judgment to require issuance of execution to recover unpaid alimony, under Code Civ. Proc. § 685.

5. Divorce 🔑263—Averment in divorced wife's affidavit that second husband's earnings were insufficient to support herself and child held mere conclusion (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

Averment in divorced wife's affidavit to require issuance of execution to collect unpaid alimony under Code Civ. Proc. § 685, that second husband's earnings were insufficient to support herself and child held merely a conclusion and not controlling as against averments concerning amount of income of second husband.

6. Divorce 🔑263—Divorced wife who married second husband, earning $300 per month, and who failed to show second husband's inability to support herself and child, held not entitled to collect unpaid alimony (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

Divorced wife who almost immediately after obtaining divorce married second husband, earning salary of $300 a month, and who failed to show that second husband was unable to support her or her child during their marriage, held not entitled to order directing issuance of execution to recover unpaid alimony under divorce decree under Code Civ. Proc. § 685; allowance being given for support of wife and child jointly.

7. Divorce 🔑245(1), 309—Court may modify alimony and child's support and may make modification operate prospectively (Civ. Code, §§ 138, 139).

Court has jurisdiction in an original proceeding for divorce upon proper pleadings and evidence to award support to the wife and minor child, and court retains jurisdiction to modify its order from time to time, and such modification may upon a proper application operate prospectively under Civ. Code, §§ 138, 139.

8. Divorce 🔑245(1), 309—In proceedings for execution to collect unpaid alimony and support money for child, who had since attained majority, court had no jurisdiction to modify judgment as to payments already accrued (Code Civ. Proc. § 685; Civ. Code, §§ 138, 139).

In proceedings by divorced wife under Code Civ. Proc. § 685, for issuance of execution to enforce payments of alimony and for support of minor child, who had since attained majority and married, court had no power to modify the divorce judgment so as to affect payments which had already accrued thereunder, since modification may only operate prospectively and not retroactively under Civ. Code, §§ 138, 139.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by Emma Parker against J. W. Parker for divorce. Having secured a divorce, the plaintiff after a lapse of time applied for an order directing issuance of execution to collect unpaid alimony. Defendant's motion to vacate the order was denied, and defendant appeals from the order, and plaintiff appeals from that portion of the order reducing and modifying the judgment and execution. Order denying defendant's motion to vacate order directing issuance of execution reversed, with directions and order reducing and modifying judgment and execution reversed.

Reisner & Deming, of San Francisco, for plaintiff.

Howe, Hibbitt & Johnston and O. F. Meldon, all of Sacramento, for defendant.

SHENK, J. The plaintiff and the defendant herein were married in November, 1902. In 1912 the plaintiff sued the defendant for divorce on the sole ground of willful neglect. The complaint alleged the weekly earnings of the defendant, and that there was, as the issue of said marriage, a minor child, Gladys Madeline Parker, aged seven years. The prayer was for a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony; that the plaintiff have the care and custody of the minor child and "for such other and further relief as to the court may seem proper." There was no specific prayer for alimony or for maintenance of the child. On May 21, 1912, the default of the defendant was entered for failure to answer after his demurrer had been overruled. The cause came on for hearing as a default matter on June 10, 1912, whereupon an interlocutory decree was granted. This decree contained the usual provisions entitling the plaintiff to a final decree of divorce upon the expiration of one year from the entry of the interlocutory decree and provided that the plaintiff have the custody of the minor child. In addition, the interlocutory decree set forth the following:

> "It is further ordered that the defendant pay to plaintiff the sum of forty dollars ($40.00) per month for the support of plaintiff and Gladys Madeline Parker, the minor child of said marriage."

On May 28, 1914, a final decree of divorce was made and entered incorporating the same provisions for the custody of the minor child and for the support of the plaintiff and said child as were contained in the interlocutory decree. On June 5, 1914, or eight days after the entering of the final decree, the plaintiff married one E. W. Pappert at the city of Visalia. The plaintiff and said Pappert lived together as husband and wife until May, 1923, when they separated. On May 15, 1923, the plaintiff instituted an action for divorce against said Pappert and obtained an interlocutory decree therein on October 24, 1925. Prior to the commencement of the second divorce action the plaintiff and said Pappert entered into a property settlement wherein and whereby certain real property in the city of Oakland was set apart to the plaintiff, from which she received an income of $75 per month. In addition to the property settlement the court, upon the institution of the second divorce action, awarded temporary alimony to the plaintiff in the sum of $50 per month, the said payments to continue to May 1, 1925. The temporary alimony was paid by Pappert as required. On the 27th day of May, 1925, the plaintiff, under the name of Emma Parker, made an affidavit and presented the same to a judge of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, in which the original decree of divorce had been granted. In this affidavit she set forth the entry of the judgment in the original divorce action and the requirement therein that the defendant, J. W. Parker, pay to the plaintiff the sum of $40 per month "for the support of plaintiff and Gladys Madeline Parker." It was further averred that none of said payments had been made except the sum of $480, and that there was then due and owing to the plaintiff on account of said judgment the sum of $4,360 and interest thereon, said sum being the amount claimed to be due from June 10, 1913, to and including July 10, 1922. The affiant prayed for an order directing execution to issue for the sum of $4,360 and interest. The application, made ex parte, was granted, and the judge made an order directing that execution issue. Pursuant to said order the clerk of the court, on May 27, 1925, issued the execution directed to the sheriff of Sacramento county where the defendant herein was engaged in business.

On June 5, 1925, the defendant made a motion, duly noticed in the superior court at San Francisco, to vacate the order of May 27, directing execution to issue and to recall the execution issued on that day. This motion was supported by the affidavit of the defendant and was made on numerous grounds, some of which are and others of which are not now urged on this appeal. The plaintiff filed a counter affidavit on the hearing of the motion at which both parties were represented. The matter was taken under submission, and under date of September 23, 1925, the court made an order denying said motion. In this order it was recited that the court, on the hearing of the motion, had received evidence, "oral and documentary adduced by the parties respectively," and the court found from such evidence that the sum of $560 had been paid by the defendant on account of the judgment in said action; that on the 5th day of June, 1914, the plaintiff intermarried with said E. W. Pappert and ever since said date and up to on or about the 24th day of October, 1924, the plaintiff and said Pappert had lived together as and continued to be husband and wife, and that the minor child became of age on the 10th day of August, 1922. It was then ordered as follows:

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that said judgment and execution be and the same are hereby modified so that the plaintiff may recover under said judgment the sum of $20 per month for the period of five years immediately preceding the 10th day of August, 1922, to wit: the total sum of $1200 exclusive of the amount heretofore paid by the defendant to the plaintiff."

The order also authorized and directed the sheriff of Sacramento county to amend said execution so that the plaintiff should recover the sum of $1,200 in lieu of the amount stated in said execution. The motion of the defendant to vacate the order directing the issuance of execution and to recall the same was denied.

The defendant has appealed from the whole and each part of said order of September 23, 1925, and the plaintiff has appealed from that portion of said order modifying and reducing said judgment and execution to the sum of $1,200.

[1] The appeal of the defendant will first be considered. It is contended by him that the court was without jurisdiction to direct an execution on said judgment. It is insisted that the said judgment is void on its face, for the reason that the relief therein granted was in excess of the relief demanded in the complaint. The claim is based on the fact that the complaint did not demand support for the plaintiff or the minor child and that the judgment included a provision for such support in alleged contravention of section 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure which provides, "The relief granted to the plaintiff, if there be no answer, cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint;" also of subdivision 2 of section 585 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that in such cases the plaintiff may, on the default of the defendant, "apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint." The defendant also cites numerous cases in support of his contention, including Brooks v. Forington, 117 Cal. 219, 48 P. 1073; Foley v. Foley, 120 Cal. 33, 52 P. 122, 65 Am. St. Rep. 147; Staacke v. Bell, 125 Cal. 309, 57 P. 1012; Bennett v. Bennett, 50 Cal. App. 48, 194 P. 503; and Von Der Kuhlen v. Hegel, 51 Cal. App. 416, 196 P. 913. He also cites Staacke v. Bell, supra, to the effect that the prayer for general relief does not enlarge the power of the court to grant relief not prayed for against the defaulting defendant. None of the cases relied upon go to the length of holding that the granting of relief in excess of that demanded by the complaint renders the judgment void on its face. They do, however, uniformly hold that the granting of such excessive relief is erroneous, from which relief may be granted under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure or which may be corrected by appeal, either by a reversal or by a modification of the judgment, neither of which courses was pursued by the defendant in this case. It was held by this court in Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 88 P. 267, 11 Ann. Cas. 520, which case has not been overruled or criticized so far as we are advised, that a judgment by default for alimony in a divorce action under a prayer for general relief, but where no alimony was specifically demanded, was not void and was not subject to a collateral attack such as is here attempted to be made. See Harlan v. Harlan, 154 Cal. 341, 98 P. 32; Stone v. Stone, 58 Cal. App. 415, 208 P. 993.

It is also insisted that the judgment is void on its face for the reason, so it is claimed, that the judgment for the support of the plaintiff and said minor child was not of the same character as the relief specifically demanded, namely, for the dissolution of the bonds of matrimony and for the custody of the child; that the relief specifically demanded is for a judgment in rem affecting the marital status and the custody of the minor child and that the alleged excessive relief is a judgment in personam or a money judgment against the defendant. Here again it was held in Cohen v. Cohen, supra, that an award of alimony is so germane to the cause of action for divorce as that, under a prayer for general relief, the court would have jurisdiction to make it even though error might thereby be committed in exercise of such jurisdiction.

[2, 3] It is further urged that the original order for the issuance of the execution is void as having been made without notice to the defendant. It has been the law of this state since 1861 that the court, under section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure (which was a continuation of section 214 of the Practice Act), has power ex parte to order the issuance of an execution on a judgment which has become final more than five years before the application. Bryan v. Stidger, 17 Cal. 270; Harrier v. Bassford, 145 Cal. 529, 78 P. 1038; Doehla v. Phillips, 151 Cal. 488, 91 P. 330; Creditors' Adjustment Co. v. Newman, 185 Cal. 509, 197 P. 334; 11 Cal. Jur. 50. Although the court may in proper cases direct that notice of the motion be given (McAuliffe v. Coughlin, 105 Cal. 268, 38 P. 730) and in some cases it might be an abuse of discretion not to require notice (Harrier v. Bassford, supra), in the present case, if the court had been apprised of the facts in the affidavit of the plaintiff on which the application for the issuance of the execution was based, a notice of the motion might well and probably would have been required. In fairness to the court, at least, the plaintiff should have set forth the facts with reference to the parties at the time. The plaintiff made the application as Emma Parker, when, in fact, her name at the time was Emma Pappert. The court was not informed of the fact that she had remarried within a few days after the entry of her final decree of divorce from the defendant Parker.

had lived with her second husband for more than ten years thereafter; that the minor child had lived with the plaintiff and the stepfather for most of the time during her minority, had become of age, and had married prior to said application. All of these matters would have been pertinent in the consideration by the trial court of the application and in the determination as to what extent, if at all, the relief should have been granted in the exercise of a wise discretion. But the failure of the plaintiff to disclose the true situation did not go to the jurisdiction of the court to act on the ex parte motion. If the defendant, as judgment debtor, had good cause to show against the issuance and enforcement of process, he had his remedy by a motion to vacate the order and to recall the execution. This motion was made and denied, which brings us to the point of considering whether the court abused its discretion in denying that motion when on the hearing thereof the true situation of the parties was presented.

[4-6] During the marriage of the plaintiff with Pappert she was presumptively supported by him. Cohen v. Cohen, supra; McKay v. McKay, 125 Cal. 65, 57 P. 677. She attempted to show on the hearing of the motion to vacate that during the time she lived with Pappert the latter's earnings were wholly insufficient to support herself and the child; but this averment in her affidavit was merely a conclusion and could not be controlling as such in the light of her additional averment that said Pappert was earning a salary of $300 per month and that the court in the second divorce action had actually awarded her $50 per month as alimony, which had been paid. The court in the present proceeding made no finding that Pappert was unable to support his wife during their marriage, and the record does not present facts from which it may be reasonably said that such a finding could be implied. Such a showing and a finding based thereon, we think, were essential to a valid order requiring a former husband to continue to support his former wife during her marriage to another man. Furthermore, the fact that the plaintiff waited for over ten years before the original judgment was sought to be enforced by her, and during which she was the wife of another man, furnished a cogent reason which should have appealed to the discretion of the trial court in determining whether the order for execution should issue. The showing made on the motion to vacate the order and recall the execution was sufficient to compel the granting of the motion. The subsequent order of the court made in an endeavor to modify the original judgment so as to provide therein for the sum of $20 per month for the support of the plaintiff and the minor child for a five-year period immediately preceding the 10th day of August, 1922, when the child became of age, and to amend or modify the execution accordingly, is persuasive to the effect that the court realized that the amount for which the execution was first directed to issue, to wit, the sum of $4,360, was excessive. The denial of the motion to vacate the order and recall the execution must therefore be deemed to have been an abuse of discretion requiring a reversal of the order denying the motion unless it may properly be held that the subsequent order, in so far as it directs that execution be amended so as to provide for the collection of $1,200, be valid and effective notwithstanding such denial.

[7, 8] It is contended by the plaintiff that the portion of the order of September 25, 1925, directing the modification of the original judgment so as to provide that the plaintiff recover $20 per month, instead of $40 per month as in said judgment originally provided, was beyond the power of the court. The original judgment had long since been final. No appeal was taken therefrom and in the intervening years no application ever was made by the defendant for a modification thereof. It is beyond question that the court had jurisdiction in the original proceeding for divorce upon a proper pleading and evidence to award support to the wife and to the minor child, and that the court retained jurisdiction to modify its order for such support from time to time also upon a proper application and showing, the said modification to operate prospectively (sections 138, 139, Civ. Code; Harlan v. Harlan, supra), but no authority has been cited and we have discovered none which would authorize or justify the court merely on an application under section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the issuance of an execution to enforce payments theretofore accrued on a final judgment to modify said judgment and give the same retroactive effect. Section 138 of the Civil Code authorizes the court, in the divorce action, to provide for maintenance and support of the child "during the minority" of the child, and the court is given power to modify or vacate the order "at any time." But the phrase "at any time" must necessarily refer to any time "during the minority" of the child specified in the earlier part of the section. Then, too, the order of modification must, we think, have a prospective effect and apply to payments thereafter to be made during such minority. Where, as here, the minor became of age and married prior to such order of modification, such order could not disturb the accrual of payments under the original judgment. But whether such payments should be enforced and the manner of the enforcement of the same require separate consideration. The order of the court which is here assailed provides for the payment of the full sum to the plaintiff, Emma Pappert, formerly Emma Parker, and to cover a period of time during which she was the wife of a man other than the defendant, with no showing that she was entitled to the same during that period. If the amount ordered paid was intended by the court to constitute a proper payment for the benefit of the daughter during a period before she became of age, it must be said that such a conclusion may be reached only by speculation and not from a consideration of the language of the order.

On the showing developed during the proceeding in the trial court, it is clear that the plaintiff was not entitled to the order directing execution to issue, and the court should have granted the motion to set aside said order and to quash the levy under the execution. The order denying that motion should therefore be reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant the same. Likewise, the order modifying the judgment from which the plaintiff has taken an appeal should be reversed, for the reason that it was beyond the power of the court to modify said judgment so as to make said modification operative on payments already accrued under the judgment. It is so ordered.

Rehearing Denied May 7, 1928.

Contracts ⟹232(4)—Contractors held entitled to recover for extras installed under subsequent agreement with owners, notwithstanding written contract called for architect's order.

Where extras under construction contract were ordered and installed and counsel stipulated that the construction work had been completed, the contractors were entitled to recover for extras thus installed, notwithstanding contract called for furnishing extras solely on order of architect; since under the circumstances the written contract had been modified by executed oral agreements.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Thomas A. Cavanagh and Frank H. Cavanagh, copartners doing business under the name and style of Cavanagh Bros., against Martha Q. Keplinger and husband, to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal (262 P. 470).

Knight, Boland & Christin and Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an action to enforce a mechanic's lien for a balance claimed for extras due upon the construction of a building.

The complaint alleges the furnishing of materials and the performance of labor in connection therewith under a contract for the construction by plaintiffs for defendants of a combined residence and garage. It also alleges the completion of the work, the filing of a notice of completion by one of the defendants, and the filing thereafter of the claim of lien here sued upon.

The answer admits the filing of the notice of completion, the filing of a lien by plaintiffs, and pleads a written contract asserted to be the full and sole measure of the rights of the parties. This written contract was what is known as a guaranteed maximum cost contract with commission attached for the contractor, and providing with respect to extras that the same should be calculated upon a cost plus 10 per cent. basis, said extras to be furnished solely upon order of the architect. But the evidence abundantly shows that, although the written contract was executed, the parties, in a very large measure, disregarded its provisions, among other things dispensing with the architect therein provided for and dealing directly with each other throughout the building operations. Scarcely a provision of the contract was left in full operation. Plaintiffs claim 73 items of extras and a balance due therefor of $3,089.26. The court held with plaintiffs as to all of said items except 18, which were held to have been included in the original contract price, and accordingly made findings in favor of plaintiffs, fixing the amount due them at $1,878.44. Defendants have appealed.

The findings, except as to the amount claimed, are in the language of plaintiffs' complaint. The duty of defendants to pay for said extras, many of which were ordered in writing by them, and admitted to be such, seems too clear for controversy. Wyman v. Hooker, 2 Cal. App. 36, 41, 83 P. 79; Bavin v. Bard (Cal. App.) 255 P. 200.

Plaintiffs' testimony showed that these extras were charged for at cost or less. The issue that the original purchase price as named in the contract had not been properly earned was never made at any time by the defendants and is contrary to the stipulations made upon the trial and to the necessary inferences from all the testimony. In fact, written statements were rendered by plaintiffs to defendants claiming the whole of the purchase price to have been earned, to which statements there was no protest. This conclusion is also aided by the notice of completion according to the contract given by defendants themselves.

★Rehearing denied.

The whole matter may be summed up in the observation that admittedly many extras were ordered and installed and the written contract was thus modified by executed oral agreements. The entire issue tried and submitted was whether the items claimed as extras were in fact such and whether the charge for any such extras was the proper amount. The court allowed certain of these items and disallowed others.

No good purpose can be served by a prolonged discussion of the evidence. Considered in connection with their admissions, oral and written, the stipulation of counsel for defendants to the effect that the work was done, along with statements of plaintiffs, gives ample support to the findings of the court.

No other questions raised require discussion.

Judgment affirmed.

GRAVEM v. GRAVEM et al. (S. F. 12362.)★

Hearing Denied in Bank May 7, 1928.

Partnership ⚬226, 242(1)—Retiring partner retained interest in partnership under agreement providing for payment of profits to assignee, and could sue on agreement for accounting (Code Civ. Proc. § 2055).

Contract by retiring partner, assigning interest in partnership to brother on condition that accounting be had in usual manner and profits to which he should be entitled should be paid to his brother, held not an unqualified assignment of all interest in partnership, including right as retiring partner to accounting, though profits were to be paid to brother but retained in retiring partner beneficial interest in profits of partnership, and hence complaint on contract for accounting was sufficient to enable retiring partner to offer evidence in support of allegations thereof, and entitled him under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, to examine defendant partner as an adverse witness.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Lars B. Gravem against Nicholas L. B. Gravem, individually, and others. From a judgment of the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, in action for accounting, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Sherman & Peters, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Clarence A. Shuey, J. R. Pringle, and Oliver Dibble, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHENK, J. Prior to October 20, 1920, the plaintiff was a partner to the extent of a one-eighth interest in the partnership of Otis, McAllister & Co. The other partners, to wit, the defendants Otis and Bee, desired the plaintiff to retire from the partnership, to which the plaintiff consented. To that end the plaintiff entered into an assignment and retirement agreement with the defendants under date of October 20, 1920, wherein and whereby the plaintiff assigned his interest in the partnership assets to his brother, the defendant Nicholas L. B. Gravem, and the latter assumed the position of his brother as partner in the firm. This agreement recited the existence of the former partnership contract between the plaintiff and the defendants Otis and Bee, and that the plaintiff desired to assign to his brother "all his rights and privileges as contained in said agreement, said Otis and Bee consenting thereto, as herein provided." It was then provided that the plaintiff "may, and does hereby, assign unto Nicholas L. B. Gravem all his rights and privileges in and to the above-mentioned agreement. * * * The parties hereto do and each of them does further covenant and agree that the above transfer of interest shall be subject to the following provision, to wit: Following the termination of the year 1920, the partnership books of Otis, McAllister & Co. shall be closed and in due course and by partnership determination in the manner pursued in previous years the profits and losses for the year 1920 determined. If as a result of such determination it shall appear that the partnership business has been conducted at a profit, the one-eighth part of said profits that would have been paid to said Lars Gravem by virtue of paragraph 3 of said agreement had said Lars Gravem not made this assignment shall be paid to the said Nicholas L. B. Gravem in the manner and as and when the partnership profits for the year 1920 are paid to the other members of the partnership and those entitled to share in the partnership profits of Otis, McAllister & Co. * * *"

The foregoing agreement was signed by the plaintiff and by all of the defendants individually and by Otis and Bee on account of the partnership.

Three counts are set forth in the complaint. The first count alleges the execution of the contract of October 20, 1920; that the said agreement was executed at the request of the defendants upon representations by and promises of the defendants and each of them that the books of the partnership would be closed as of December 31, 1920, in the usual manner, and that the value of the assets, including the value of the accounts, accounts receivable, and the profits for the year 1920 be determined as of the 31st day of December, 1920, properly and accurately and in the manner employed in previous years, and that the plaintiff would receive from the defendant Nicholas L. B. Gravem immediately upon such determination the purchase price of said plaintiff's interest in the partnership, to wit, the sum of $37,500, and in addition should receive one-eighth of the profits of the partnership for the year 1920, which profits are alleged to have been in excess of $500,000; that the defendants had failed and neglected to close the books of the partnership to determine the profits for the year 1920 as agreed, although demand had been made upon them so to do; that no part of the amounts due to the plaintiff has been paid except the sum of $37,500, representing the original interest of the plaintiff, and the further sum of $2,500 on account of profits; that the defendant Nicholas L. B. Gravem has failed to pay the one-eighth of the profits as agreed with the knowledge and at the instance of the other defendants.

The second cause of action, in addition to the allegations of the first count, averred that the defendants had entered into a conspiracy to prevent the plaintiff from obtaining the sum of $60,000 due him as his share of the profits. The third cause of action, also in addition to the allegations of the first count, set forth that the defendants and each of them had failed, refused, and neglected to make an accounting to the plaintiff as agreed, and that the defendant Nicholas L. B. Gravem had failed, refused, and neglected to obtain an accounting from the partnership, in violation of his agreement with the plaintiff.

A general and special demurrer was interposed to the complaint and was overruled. The defendants answered separately, denying generally the allegations of the complaint and setting forth in hæc verba the contract of October 20, 1920. No affidavit was filed denying the due execution of the contract. The cause came on regularly for trial, whereupon the plaintiff called the defendant Otis as his first witness under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendants objected to the examination of the witness as to the condition of the affairs of the partnership during the year 1920 on the ground that under the agreement of October 20, 1920, on which all parties were relying, the plaintiff had assigned all of his interest in and to the assets and business of the partnership to his defendant brother and had therefore parted with all of his interest therein. The court sustained the objection, ruled in effect that the plaintiff had not and could not state a cause of action under the contract, refused to permit the plaintiff to introduce any evidence in support of the allegations of his complaint, and granted a motion for judgment for the defendants made on the ground that there was no evidence in the record to support a judgment for the plaintiff. Counsel for the defendants expressly declined to make a motion for a nonsuit or for a judgment on the pleadings, and made a motion for judgment for the defendants on the ground that "there is no evidence to support a judgment for the plaintiff," at the suggestion of the court that counsel for defendants "make a motion." The motion was granted, judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and this appeal was taken.

The error of the trial court was in concluding that, under the contract of October 20, 1920, the plaintiff had made an unqualified assignment of all of his interest in the property and business of the partnership, including his right as a retiring partner to an accounting. An inspection of the contract discloses that such was not the case. On the contrary, the plaintiff assigned his interest in the partnership upon the condition and with the qualification that an accounting be had in the usual manner at the end of the year 1920 and the profits to which he should be entitled be paid to the defendant brother. All of the defendants and the partnership itself agreed to this provisional assignment. It would seem to be quite immaterial that in this instance the profits to which the plaintiff might be entitled should be paid to the plaintiff's brother and that such agreement had been made between the brothers for a disposition of the fund. If the contract had provided that the plaintiff's share of the profits be paid to a bank or trust company or to any other stranger to the assignment and retirement agreement, it would perhaps be clearer that the plaintiff retained a beneficial interest in the partnership profits for the year 1920. The fact that the profits were to be paid to the brother of the plaintiff would lead to no different result. The fair and we think the only reasonable intendment of the agreement was that the plaintiff was not relinquishing his interest in the profits for the year 1920, but that after an accounting should be had the plaintiff's share should be paid to his brother, who was his nominee in the transaction. We think the first cause of action as a pleading was sufficient, to enable the plaintiff to offer evidence in support of the allegations thereof, and that under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure the plaintiff was entitled to call and examine the defendant Otis as an adverse witness.

After the ruling of the court on the effect of said contract the plaintiff requested permission to amend his complaint to the end that the plaintiff "would not be foreclosed from some remedy." This the court refused, and such refusal is assigned as an abuse of discretion. In view of the fact that the plaintiff would seem to be entitled to all the relief which he seeks under the allegations of his first cause of action, it is deemed unnecessary to pass on this point.

HEIDEL v. CALIFORNIA TRANSIT CO.

Supreme Court of California. April 12, 1928.

1. Venue 🔑75—Notice of motion to change place of trial to county of defendant's residence will not support change to another county (Code Civ. Proc. § 395).

Notice of motion to change place of trial to county of defendant's residence, under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, will not support a motion for a change to some other and different county such as that in which injury sued on occurred.

2. Corporations 🔑503(3)—Motion for change of place of trial held properly denied for failure of affidavit to show residence corporation's principal place of business at time of commencement of action (Code Civ. Proc. § 395).

Where affidavit for change of place of trial to county of defendant's residence merely alleged that defendant was a corporation having its principal place of business in Alameda county, motion was properly denied, under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, for failure of affidavit to show residence or principal place of business of defendant at time of commencement of action.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Laura Heidel against the California Transit Company. From an order denying defendant's motion to change the place of trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Earl A. Bagby, of Oakland, for appellant.

Burns & Watkins, of Fresno, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order denying its motion for change of place of trial. The action was brought in the county of Fresno, state of California, the residence of the plaintiff, to recover for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of the negligence of defendant. The defendant appeared by demurrer and at the same time served and filed an affidavit of merits and a written demand for a change of place of trial to the county of Alameda. That affidavit, as well as the complaint on file, showed that the injury had occurred in the county of Sacramento, state of California. It was set forth in the affidavit:

"That said defendant is a corporation organized, existing, and doing business under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, and having for its principal place of business the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, state of California."

It was further alleged that:

The defendant was served with summons in the said county of Alameda, and "that said defendant is a resident of said county and is not and never has been, during any of the times mentioned in the complaint, a resident of the county of Fresno, and that said county of Fresno is not and never has been the principal place of business of said corporation."

[1, 2] It will be noted that the affidavit contains no allegation as to the residence or principal place of business of the defendant corporation at the time of the commencement of the action, as required by section 395, Code of Civil Procedure. Under said section of the Code, the defendant might have moved to have the action tried at the county where the injury occurred, but it did not see fit to do so. A notice of motion, such as was given in this case, to change the place of trial to the county of appellant's residence will not support a motion for a change to some other and different county.

It appears, therefore, that the affidavit did not support the motion made under section 395, Code of Civil Procedure, and that the trial court properly denied the motion. The order appealed from is affirmed.

Finding of trial court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Damages 🔑188(1)—Allowance of $5 per day loss of use of automobile by reason of collision held supported by evidence.

In action for damages resulting from injury to plaintiff's automobile in collision, evidence held sufficient to sustain trial court's finding that $5 a day was proper allowance for plaintiff's being deprived of use of car.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action by A. P. Wilson against Jens J. Pedersen. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Hammel, F. W. Docker, and R. E. Norton, all of Fresno, and G. E. Sandford, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Hebert F. Briggs, of Fresno, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff commenced this action to recover a judgment for damages for personal injuries and for damages to his automobile and for the loss sustained by reason of his deprivation of it in his business, occurring as a result of a collision between the defendant's and plaintiff's automobiles at a street intersection in the city of Fresno, alleged to have occurred through the defendant's negligence. The defendant answered, denying negligence on his part, and also disputing the item of damages alleged by the plaintiff to have been sustained. The defendant did not affirmatively plead contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, but upon the trial of the cause this issue appears to have been litigated. The trial court found thereon that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence; that the injuries to plaintiff personally entitled him to an award of $50 damages; and that he was entitled to $350 damages to his automobile and $100 damages for deprivation of its use in his business for a period of 20 days. Judgment was entered accordingly. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he thereupon appealed from the judgment.

[1, 2] The appellant makes three contentions upon this appeal, none of which has any substantial merit. As to his first contention, that the evidence showed plaintiff to have been guilty of contributory negligence, the question of the plaintiff's guilt in that regard was a question of fact upon which the evidence was clearly conflicting. The findings and conclusions of the trial court thereon will not therefore be disturbed. As to the appellant's second contention, that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that plaintiff's car was damaged to the extent of $350, the evidence is also in substantial conflict, and such finding will not, for the same reason, be disturbed. As to the appellant's third contention, that there was no evidence as to the reasonable or any other value of the loss suffered by plaintiff by the deprivation of the use of his automobile during the period it was undergoing repairs the evidence, it is true, is slight, but we think it is sufficient to sustain the finding of the court in that regard. The plaintiff testified that he was a real estate agent and was obliged to have the use of a car in his business, and that he had used his said car daily therein and had been deprived of its use for a period of approximately 30 days, for which he claimed damages at the rate of $10 a day. Another witness for plaintiff testified that automobiles were rented for such use at so much a mile or so much a day. The trial court cut down plaintiff's claim from 30 to 20 days and allowed him $5 a day. We think the allowance in that respect was reasonable and was supported by the evidence in the case.

Finding no merit in this appeal, the judgment is affirmed.

BELL v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 3, 1928.

1. Taxation 🔑821(2)—Tax purchaser of government land cannot recover amount paid without paying all taxes, penalties, and costs (Pol. Code, §§ 3771a, 3785b, and § 3898, subd. 5[b]).

Tax purchaser not paying all taxes, penalties, and costs, as required by Pol. Code, §§ 3771a, 3785b, to be entitled to conveyance, cannot recover amount paid for land belonging to federal government under section 3898, subd. 5(b), which applies only when land has been "sold and conveyed."

2. Constitutional law 🔑70(1)—Judiciary cannot determine whether plain and unambiguous statute meets situation.

Whether the Legislature has met the situation by statute is not for the judicial branch of the government to determine, where language is plain and unambiguous.

3. Statutes 🔑47, 49—Statute authorizing refund to tax purchaser of government land only when "sold and conveyed" held not uncertain or ambiguous or impossible of performance (Pol. Code, § 3898, subd. 5[b]).

Pol. Code, § 3898, subd. 5(b), authorizing refund of amount paid at tax sale for land belonging to federal government only when "sold and conveyed," held not uncertain, ambiguous, or impossible of performance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Chester A. Bell against the County of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Emmet H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edward T. Bishop and Woodward M. Taylor, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PULLEN, Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover from the respondent county of Los Angeles the sum of $370 paid to the tax collector of said county.

A parcel of real property was assessed for taxes in the name of Herman Heacker for the years 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, and 1922. The taxes for the year 1917 were not paid, and in 1918 there was noted on the assessment roll opposite the property: "Sold to the State."

In July, 1922, the tax collector, pursuant to the provisions of section 3771a of the Political Code, offered the property for sale at public auction. In the course of the bidding appellant bid the sum of $370, and the property was struck off to him. Appellant bid this amount to the tax collector, who in due course paid the money into the county treasury. After the sale and after the money was so paid to the tax collector appellant learned that the property attempted to be sold to him by the tax collector was vacant public land, and that in the year 1917 and at all times thereafter title to the property was vested in the United States government. The records of the United States Land Office show that between 1916 and 1923 no person had any interest in the land in question by reason of any filing of record in that office, and that no patent was ever at any time issued by the United States to any person whomsoever for the property, and that at no time during the years 1917 to 1922, inclusive, did Herman Heacker hold any possessory right, title, or interest in any of the real property.

After the discovery of the foregoing facts appellant in proper time made and filed a demand against the county of Los Angeles for the refund of said sum, which was by the board of supervisors rejected. Respondents alleged and it is found that appellant did not within 30 days after his bid or at any time pay to the tax collector the amount of taxes purported to have been levied upon the property for the years 1918 to 1922, inclusive, with the penalties and costs thereon. For that reason no certificate of sale or deed for the property was issued by the tax collector. Respondents maintain that in the absence of statute a purchaser at a tax sale has no remedy against the county or state to recover money paid at a tax sale. Since appellant has not placed himself within the terms of a statute authorizing a refund, he is a mere volunteer and not entitled to recover.

It is the contention of appellant: That the assessment of the property in question made in 1917 was absolutely void for the reason that the property at that time belonged to the United States, and neither Herman H. Heacker nor any other person had any possessory right or assessable interest therein. If the assessment itself was void, all subsequent proceedings thereunder are void. The assessment being void, the tax collector had no right or authority to give notice of the sale of the property under section 3771, had no right to offer the property for sale, and his action in accepting the plaintiff's bid and accepting the plaintiff's money was contrary to law. That the amount paid by the plaintiff to the county tax collector was received by the county without consideration. That the tax collector had no authority to accept the money, and that he acted outside the law in so doing.

Prior to 1917 there was no statutory provision concerning the attempted sale of government lands for state taxes, and the Supreme Court in Brooks v. County of Tulare, 117 Cal. 465, 49 P. 469, had a situation in which the facts were quite analogous to the case at bar. There an action was brought under section 3804 of the Political Code to recover from the county of Tulare taxes erroneously assessed and illegally collected upon government land of the United States. As expressed in the syllabus:

> "A purchaser at a delinquent tax sale of government land of the United States, which was not subject to taxation, is a mere volunteer, and cannot recover of the county the money so paid by him on the ground that it had been erroneously and illegally collected. Section 3804 of the Political Code does not apply to such a case."

The reason of the court was that plaintiff knew or might have known when he made his bid and paid his money whether the land was vacant public land or not. Some one may have had a possessory claim on the land which was subject to assessment. At any rate, his bid was voluntary and he should not be permitted to recover back the money paid.

Thus stood the law prior to 1917, and in the absence of some statutory remedy a purchaser at a tax sale had no remedy against the county or state to recover money paid at a tax sale.

The principle announced in Brooks v. County of Tulare, supra, accords with the majority of the states which hold that the rule of caveat emptor applies. Lisso & Bro. v. Police Jury, 127 La. 283, 53 So. 566, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) p. 1141. Section 3898, subd. 5(b) of the Political Code as amended, now provides as follows:

> "Whenever it shall be determined to the satisfaction of the board of supervisors of the county in which the land is situated that any land belonging to the United States government or to this state, a municipality or other political subdivision of this state has been erroneously sold and conveyed under the provisions of this or the preceding section, or section three thousand seven hundred seventy-one of this code, and the said land should not have been so sold, the purchaser at said sale may present a claim against the county in the manner provided by law for a refund of the amount so paid into the county treasury by reason of such sale."

[1-3] It is the contention of respondent that, this remedy being purely statutory, appellant must strictly comply with the terms of the statute. Appellant did not complete his option to purchase the property and pay the amount of the taxes which had been levied against the property and obtain a conveyance from the tax collector. The remedy applies only when land has been sold and conveyed, and until appellant has complied with section 3785b of the Political Code the tax collector could not issue a deed, and therefore there could be no conveyance. Whether the Legislature has met the situation or not, is not for the judicial branch of the government to determine, for the language is plain and unambiguous. Appellant to have completed the sale must, under section 3771a of the Political Code, pay the amount bid, together with all taxes, penalties, and costs due, before being entitled to a conveyance. He has failed to comply with the plain provisions of the law, and the court cannot say the provisions of section 3898, subdivision 5(b) are uncertain, ambiguous, or impossible of performance.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Mabel Butner Thompson, as administratrix with the will annexed of Alfred Thompson, deceased, against the O. W. Childs Estate Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant J. M. Danziger appeals. Affirmed.

Morgrage, Stanley & O'Brien, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hazlett & Albee, Geo. H. P. Shaw, and C. E. McDowell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. This action was originally brought by plaintiff's testator to recover damages for a trespass on his land. Upon his death, plaintiff, as his personal representative, was substituted for him, and judgment was given in her favor against the defendant J. M. Danziger only, who appeals. Appellant concedes that the acts complained of were wrongful, and that plaintiff is entitled to recover damages therefor to the amount of the judgment, but denies that he is legally responsible therefor. The persons who actually did the acts in question were employed by one C. W. Whitley to do them as a part of his operations under an oil lease on the above-mentioned land, and the only question presented by this appeal is whether appellant was a partner with Whitley in this matter and therefore liable for his acts.

Appellant had at one time been the owner of the oil lease above mentioned. Prior to the doing of the acts complained of he had executed an instrument by which he purported to assign this lease to Whitley. This instrument is signed by both appellant and Whitley and is much more than a mere assignment of the lease. It provides for payment to appellant of an overriding royalty of 4⅙ per cent. of all oil and gas produced, and, also, that in consideration of the instrument, Whitley shall pay to appellant the sum of $12,500 upon the execution of the instrument, and appellant shall receive the further sum of $37,500 out of the proceeds of oil produced under the lease. The agreement further provides that Whitley shall have sole charge of all operations under the lease, with authority to purchase and hire materials and labor and contract bills therefor; that he shall drill three wells upon the leased land, the cost of the first two wells to be paid by him, and the cost of the third well to be paid from the proceeds of oil produced, if sufficient, otherwise by him. All sums paid by Whitley on the cost of these wells are to be refunded to him out of the proceeds of oil produced. After appellant has received the sum of $37,500 to be paid him and Whitley has been reimbursed for all drilling and operating expenses paid by him, the agreement provides that all further net proceeds shall be shared by appellant and Whitley, 40 per cent. thereof going to appellant and 60 per cent. to Whitley, and all funds needed for developing and operating the lease shall be furnished by the parties in the same proportions. There is also a provision that, except as to expenses to be advanced by Whitley, all moneys necessary for development and operation of the lease and for paying and discharging any and all obligations of Whitley incurred by, or resulting from said development or operation, shall be contributed and paid by the parties in the proportions above mentioned, and that any and all obligations that shall result or arise by operation of law or otherwise, by reason of operations under the agreement, shall be paid by the parties in the same proportions. There are still other provisions for sharing expenses, which we forbear to quote.

[1-4] "Partnership is the association of two or more persons, for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing its profits between them." Civ. Code, § 2395. "A partnership may be organized for the prosecution of one or two adventures, as well as for the conduct of a general and continuous business. It is not of the essence of a partnership that the parties to it should have known that their contract in law created a partnership." Westcott v. Gilman, 170 Cal. 562, 569, 150 P. 777, 780 (Ann. Cas. 1916E, 437). The fact that by agreement between the parties one of them is given the management of the partnership enterprise does not prevent a partnership from arising. Westcott v. Gilman, supra. The indicia of a partnership are at least as definite and clear in the agreement before us as in that construed in the case just cited, regarding which the court there said:

> "It is plain from the very terms of the agreement between these defendants that it measures up to the definition of a partnership as declared by section 2395 of the Civil Code. It was an association of two persons to carry on a definite business and to divide the profits and losses of that business."

We think the agreement between appellant and Whitley constituted them partners in all operations thereunder. By its terms they were to operate the lease together as a business and divide its profits and losses. There was no other substantial evidence of the relations between them. Appellant's own testimony tended to indicate that they were operating under the agreement, and there was nothing in conflict therewith. It is clear, therefore, that the question of appellant's liability for the acts complained of depended solely upon the legal effect of that agreement. The judgment of the trial court is based upon the same construction which we have given to the agreement, and we find no error in it.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by Carl M. Miller and wife against the First Savings Bank of Colusa to recover overpayment for land. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

U. W. Brown, of Colusa, for appellant.

Seth Millington, of Gridley, for respondents.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant, First Savings Bank of Colusa, from a judgment entered against it in the sum of $740.

The facts are briefly these: The defendant owned a small tract of land in Colusa county, and through its cashier entered into an oral agreement to sell the same to plaintiffs for $3,716. Plaintiffs paid defendant this sum, and defendant executed and delivered to them its deed particularly describing the land purchased, and reciting that it contained "9.29 acres, more or less." Some time after receiving the deed, the plaintiffs had the land resurveyed and found that it contained only 7.44 acres, or 1.85 acres less than that mentioned in the deed. Thereupon, demand was made upon defendant for the return of the overpayment, and, said demand being refused, this action was brought to recover the alleged overpayment.

Plaintiffs contend, and the court found, that plaintiffs purchased the land upon the understanding that they were to receive 9.29 acres of land, for which they were to pay $400 per acre, or a total of $3,716. On the other hand, defendant contends that it sold the land to plaintiffs en masse for the sum of $3,716, and did not sell it on an acreage basis, and did not represent or guarantee that said land contained 9.29 acres.

[1-3] The evidence therefore, upon the vital issue in the case, is decidedly conflicting, but there is ample substantial evidence to support the conclusions of the trial court. The law is, of course, well established that the findings of the trial court upon conflicting evidence are conclusive on appeal, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of the findings, and the burden is upon appellant, who claims error, to show its existence. A few of the cases laying down this doctrine are as follows: Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 7, 239 P. 332; Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25; Gjurich v. Fieg, 164 Cal. 429, 129 P. 464, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 111; Miller v. Lynn, 59 Cal. App. 685, 211 P. 466; Perham v. First National Bank of La Verne (Cal. App.) 261 P. 1064.

[4] The appellant contends that the court erred in admitting parol evidence to vary the terms of the deed, when no fraud, mistake, or accident was alleged or proved; or, in other words, appellant contends that the court erred in admitting parol evidence to show that the land conveyed by the deed did not in fact contain 9.29 acres.

There is no merit in this contention. There was no attempt made by the plaintiffs, either in the complaint or in the proof, to vary or change the terms of the deed. Indeed, it was wholly unnecessary to change or vary the terms of the deed in any respect as far as the case at bar was concerned. The deed did not purport to state the precise quantity of land conveyed. The expression used in the deed, "9.29 acres, more or less," is openly determinative and uncertain and shows that it was not of the essence of the contract, and that reliance, so far as the quantity of land is concerned, was not placed upon that, but upon the description in the deed that preceded that expression, which was:

> "Farm No. 332 of the River Garden Farms subdivision No. 5, as per the map or plat thereof filed July 7, 1913, in Liber 1 of Records of surveys, page 100, Records of Colusa County, Cal." Danielson v. Neal, 164 Cal. 748, 130 P. 716; Commissioners v. Younger, 29 Cal. 179.

This being true, the quantity of land conveyed by the deed was undetermined and uncertain; therefore, in view of the guarantee made by defendant that the tract of land contained 9.29 acres, parol evidence was admissible to show just how many acres was actually in the tract.

[5, 6] Upon the evidence adduced, the court found that said tract of land actually contained 7.44 acres, and that plaintiffs had paid defendant $400 per acre for 9.29 acres. Therefore, defendant had in its hands $740 which rightfully belonged to plaintiffs. Under such circumstances, the general principles of an ordinary action in assumpsit apply. There is no attack upon the deed; the only attack is upon the consideration, and the law is well settled that the true consideration, or failure of consideration, or want of consideration may always be shown by extrinsic evidence. Section 1962, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc.; sections 1614 and 1615, Civ. Code; Field v. Austin, 131 Cal. 379, 63 P. 692; Shepard v. Hunt, 43 Cal. App. 630, 185 P. 677; Chaffee v. Browne, 109 Cal. 220, 41 P. 1028; National Hardware Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 7, 130 P. 881; Royer v. Kelly, 174 Cal. 70, 161 P. 1148; Braselton v. Vokal, 53 Cal. App. 582, 200 P. 670.

All the other contentions made by appellant go to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of the court and, as we have seen, the evidence is conflicting and there is ample substantial evidence to support the findings and judgment; therefore, we are powerless to interfere.

We think the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Harry S. Harper, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The defendant was convicted on each of two counts of an information charging him with violations of section 288 and 288a of the Penal Code, respectively. The appeal is from the judgment and an order denying motion for new trial. The victim of the felonious acts of the defendant was a boy eight years of age. It would serve no useful purpose to recite the testimony, which is sharply conflicting on several matters, and the complaining witness is contradicted by a number of witnesses for the defendant, but believing and accepting the boy's story as true, which the jury evidently did, a complete case was made upon both counts.

[1] The brief of counsel for the defendant is mainly occupied with a discussion of the weight of the evidence and a comparison of the testimony. If there is any principle of law that is elementary, it is that such considerations have no place in the presentation of an appeal of a defendant found guilty of crime, unless some exceptional issue, not here suggested, is present; for example, where it is doubtful if the error committed prejudiced the substantial rights of the defendant. The jury saw the witnesses, and heard them testify, and its verdict as to the weight of the evidence and credibility of the witnesses is final.

[2] There is no merit to the contention that the trial court committed error in not ordering an inspection of the premises by the jury. This is a question peculiarly within the discretion of the trial judge, and there is nothing in the record to show any abuse of that discretion.

[3] It is charged that the trial court abused its discretion, in that it unreasonably limited the time for argument by counsel for the defendant. The record does not sustain this claim. It shows that the court merely indicated its desire that the arguments should not last more than half an hour on each side, but that more time would be permitted if a longer period were required. No request for additional time was made, nor is there anything to substantiate the assertion now put forth, apparently for the first time, that the period suggested by the court was not sufficient.

[4, 5] A number of witnesses were called to testify to the good general reputation of the defendant in the neighborhood of his residence. On cross-examination each of these witnesses was asked if he had heard that a certain little girl had made complaint that the defendant had taken liberties with her person. That a character witness may be examined as to his knowledge of reports of specific charges of acts inconsistent with the reputation as to which he has testified is well recognized. People v. Hightower, 65 Cal. App. 331, 224 P. 110. That such a complaint had been made was testified by the defendant himself, and so it cannot be doubted that the district attorney was acting in entire good faith in asking the questions. There was no error in the ruling of the court in this regard.

[6] However, this cannot be said of another question asked by the deputy district attorney. Following the one to which we have just adverted, a witness was asked if he had not heard "that the authorities were unable to proceed with the case because the little girl was too young to make a good witness." This question was calculated, and doubtless intended, not to qualify the evidence which the witness had given, but to explain why the defendant had not been prosecuted upon another charge, and therefore to suggest to the jurors that the defendant was probably guilty of such other offense. This was highly improper. However, the trial court at once sustained an objection to the question, and said:

"The jury is instructed to disregard the expression of counsel, and I will instruct you, as I will further instruct you before submitting the case, that, when a question is asked and the court sustains an objection, you have no right to assume that the facts for which the question calls would or would not be the facts; in other words, you have no right to assume that the facts would come as implied by the question, and the entire matter must be disregarded by you."

It is true that in exceptional instances the harm done by misconduct of counsel cannot be cured by any instruction from the court, but under the circumstances here presented we think this admonition was sufficient to safeguard the rights of the defendant and that the misconduct of the deputy district attorney was not of such a nature or extent as to be incurable through this timely and clear instruction.

The judgment and order denying new trial are affirmed.

1. Negligence 🔑121(1)—Burden of proceeding with proof shifts to defendant under res ipsa loquitur rule, but burden of proving whole case remains on plaintiff.

The burden of going forward with proof shifts to defendant under application of res ipsa loquitur doctrine, but burden of proving whole case rests on plaintiff at all times.

2. Negligence 🔑138(2)—Instructions that burden of proof shifted to defendants under res ipsa loquitur rule and that burden remained with plaintiff held not inconsistent or misleading.

Instructions that burden of proof shifted to defendants under res ipsa loquitur rule and that burden of proof remained with plaintiff throughout case held not inconsistent nor misleading, as burden of going forward with proof shifts to defendant, but burden of proving whole case rests on plaintiff throughout.

3. Carriers 🔑321(21)—Term "slightest negligence" in res ipsa loquitur instruction held not erroneous in action for injuries to motorbus passenger (Civ. Code, § 2100).

In action against motorbus carrier for injuries to passenger, use of term "slightest negligence" in instruction on res ipsa loquitur doctrine held not erroneous, in view of Civ. Code, § 2100, requiring that carrier for hire use utmost care and diligence for safety of passengers.

4. Carriers 🔑316(4)—Testimony as to plaintiff's status as passenger, speed and collision of bus and automobile, and objects in vicinity held not to preclude application of res ipsa loquitur rule.

In action for injuries to motorbus passenger, testimony as to plaintiff's status as passenger for hire, collision between bus and automobile, warning posts, buildings, etc., in vicinity of accident, and speed of cars shortly before collision held not necessarily to cover negligence causing accident, nor to establish such negligence beyond doubt, so as to preclude application of res ipsa loquitur rule, where plaintiff alleged negligence in general terms, and plaintiff's counsel stated that he would rely on such rule as against defendant's owner and driver of bus, but could not do so as against defendant automobile driver.

5. Negligence 🔑121(1)—That plaintiff discloses cause of accident in testifying as to details does not preclude reliance on res ipsa loquitur rule.

That plaintiff, alleging negligence generally, hits on cause of accident in explaining details of case on witness stand, so far as she knows them, or offers some testimony tending to show specific acts of negligence, does not preclude her from relying on res ipsa loquitur rule.

6. Carriers 🔑315(3)—Result of negligence must be alleged and proved, even where res ipsa loquitur maxim applies.

Even where res ipsa loquitur maxim applies, result of negligence, that is, the happening, if not the reason therefor, by which injury was sustained, must be alleged and proved, and burden thereof sustained throughout by plaintiff; mere allegation and proof of relation of carrier and passenger and injury not being sufficient.

7. Negligence 🔑121(2)—Manner and circumstances of injury, not injury itself, justify application of res ipsa loquitur maxim.

It is not the injury, but the manner and circumstances thereof, that justify application of res ipsa loquitur maxim and inference of negligence.

8. Trial 🔑296(7)—Res ipsa loquitur instruction held not erroneous as warranting conclusion that bus owner and driver, sued for injuries to passenger, were liable to cross-complainant automobile driver for slightest negligence, in view of another instruction.

Res ipsa loquitur instruction, in action for injuries to motorbus passenger, held not erroneous as warranting conclusion that bus owner and driver owed highest degree of care, and would be liable for slightest negligence, to automobile driver filing cross-complaint for injuries to him in collision with bus, in view of instruction that burden was on him to establish cross-defendants' negligence directly and proximately causing accident, and that verdict should be for them on cross-complaint, though they were negligent, if cross-complainant was guilty of any negligence directly and proximately contributing to accident in any degree, however slight.

9. Appeal and error 🔑977(3)—Trial court's discretion in granting new trial is legal one which must rest on sound reason in case (Code Civ. Proc. § 657).

While trial court is clothed with large discretion in granting or denying motion for new trial, under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, and appellate court will not disturb its ruling if it can be supported at all, such discretion is a legal one and must rest on sound reason to be found in the case itself.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Eleanore C. Kilgore against E. B. Brown, doing business as Brown's Auto Tours & Taxi Service, Robert A. Wickersham, and another, in which defendant Wickersham filed a cross-complaint against codefendants. Judgment for plaintiff and cross-complainant, and, from an order granting such codefendants' motion for a new trial, plaintiff and cross-complainant appeal. Reversed.

Harry K. Sargent, of Los Angeles, for appellant Kilgore.

Cruickshank, Brooke & Evans, of Pasadena, for appellant Wickersham.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought an action in damages against defendants for personal injuries received by reason of an automobile collision, and the jury awarded damages in the sum of $7,815 as against the defendants Brown and Armstrong. Robert A. Wickersham filed a cross-complaint against those named in the title as his codefendants for personal injuries received in the same accident, and the jury awarded damages to him in the sum of $1,000. Judgment was duly entered upon these verdicts and thereafter a motion for new trial was made by defendants Brown and Armstrong as to each verdict on all of the grounds provided for in section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure except only subdivision 2, relating to misconduct of the jury, and subdivision 3, relating to accident or surprise. The trial court granted the motion without specification of the ground upon which the order was based. Plaintiff and cross-complainant appeal.

Defendant Brown was the owner and operator of a motorbus line between the cities of Riverside and Los Angeles, and plaintiff was a passenger for hire in one of the busses at the time of the accident. Defendant Armstrong was in Brown's employ and was driving the bus at the time of the collision. The bus was traveling easterly on a boulevard, and defendant and cross-complainant Wickersham was driving his automobile southerly on a cross street. The two vehicles collided just south and west of the street intersection center. Both vehicles were upset, and plaintiff and cross-complainant were both injured.

The parties all agree that the only two points urged for a new trial were: (1) Error in instructing for the plaintiff on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur as against the defendants Brown and Armstrong, for the reason that the plaintiff, by her evidence, having fully explained the cause of the accident, was not entitled to an instruction on that doctrine (citing Connor v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 189 Cal. 1, 207 P. 378, 26 A. L. R. 1462, and Marovich v. Central Cal. Tr. Co., 191 Cal. 295, 216 P. 595); (2) conflicting instructions, in that the jury was informed, in effect, that under the rule res ipsa loquitur the burden of proof shifted to the defendants and also that the burden of proof remained with the plaintiff throughout the case.

[1-3] As to the second point, the trial court gave an instruction covering the res ipsa loquitur rule, applying it specifically to the issues between plaintiff and defendants Brown and Armstrong. It also gave a proper instruction to the effect that the burden of proof rested throughout the case upon the plaintiff. This same point was unsuccessfully urged in Lawrence v. Pickwick Stages, 68 Cal. App. 495, 498, 229 P. 885, under essentially the same circumstances. It is too elemental to consume time and space to elaborate upon the principle that the burden of going forward with proof shifts to the defendant under the application of the res ipsa loquitur doctrine, but that the burden of proving her whole case at all times rests upon the plaintiff. We see no inconsistency nor possible misunderstanding in the two instructions referred to. Atkinson v. United Railroads, 71 Cal. App. 87, 234 P. 863, quoting from Osgood v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 137 Cal. 280, 70 P. 169, 92 Am. St. Rep. 171. In this connection, and incidentally, though not having presented the point to the trial court, appellant seems to question the correctness of the res ipsa loquitur instruction in the use of the term "slightest negligence." Section 2100 of the Civil Code reads:

> "A carrier of persons for reward must use the utmost care and diligence for their safe carriage. * * *"

The terms mean the same as used. There could not be the slightest negligence if the utmost care were taken. Almost the identical question was raised in Osgood v. Los Angeles, etc., Traction Co., supra, and it was there held against appellant's contention.

[4] As to the first point, we understand appellant contends that, since the plaintiff herself and three other witnesses explained all they knew about the happening of the accident, which explanation defendants contend covered the cause thereof, it was not a proper case for the application of the rule at all. We do not think the testimony referred to necessarily covered the negligence that caused the accident. The testimony referred to covered the fact that plaintiff was a passenger for hire; that the two cars came together, wrecking the car in which she was riding; and that she was jostled and injured. It also described the vicinity of the accident as to condition and objects such as warning posts, trees, buildings, etc., and the speed of the cars shortly before collision. plaintiff did not attempt to plead the negligence which caused the wreck, but alleged negligence in general terms and gave the jury relevant information—perhaps all she had—about the occurrence. It should also be recalled that there was another defendant, and that to all objections to questions of plaintiff's counsel upon every subject not relevant directly to the injury counsel explained that he would rely upon the res ipsa loquitur rule as against Brown and Armstrong, but that he could not do so as against the other defendant.

[5] Appellant relies on Connor v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 189 Cal. 1, 207 P. 378, 26 A. L. R. 1462. We do not read this case as authority for the position taken. The learned Justice (Mr. Justice Wilbur) who wrote the opinion in that case states that a complete explanation of the cause of the accident was pleaded, and that:

> "The general rule is that where the plaintiff in his complaint gives the explanation of the cause of the accident, that is to say, where the plaintiff, instead of relying upon a general allegation of negligence, sets out specifically the negligent acts or omissions complained of, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply" (citing authorities).

Later in the same opinion the Justice says:

> "In this case if the plaintiff had alleged negligence in general terms [and plaintiff did so in the instant case], and had merely proved the happening of the accident, a prima facie case would have been established under the doctrine res ipsa loquitur. But where the plaintiff went further and showed that the accident was caused by a cloudburst, the question of whether or not the defendant was negligent in failing to inspect the track was to be determined by the jury without reference to the prima facie case resulting from the mere happening of the accident. * * * However, where the explanation leaves it doubtful as to whether or not the ultimate cause of the injury is the negligence of the party charged, it is proper to instruct the jury as to the res ipsa loquitur doctrine."

We do not think this language can be taken as authority for the proposition that, if the plaintiff, after a general allegation of negligence, explains the details of the case on the witness stand so far as she knows them, and hits upon the cause of the accident, this deprives the plaintiff of the res ipsa loquitur instruction to the jury. The fact that some testimony is offered which tends to show specific acts of negligence does not preclude the plaintiff from relying on the presumption. Freeman v. Foreman, 141 Mo. App. 359, 125 S. W. 524. This does not seem to be the doctrine in Osgood v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., supra, nor in Tompkins v. Clay Street Ry. Co., 66 Cal. 163, 4 P. 1165, wherein the court said that no presumption of negligence arises from the mere fact of injury resulting from the collision as against the proprietor of the vehicle not occupied by the plaintiff, but that the rule clearly applies to the proprietor of the vehicle occupied by plaintiff. It would be difficult, indeed, to imagine how, under the rule as contended for by appellant, the case could ever be proved against the other defendant without forfeiting the benefit of the res ipsa loquitur rule as to the defendant carrying the plaintiff as a passenger. And even if it did, it cannot be said that the evidence given by plaintiff and her witnesses established the act of negligence that caused the wreck and injury beyond doubt, and therefore the instruction would be proper under the exception mentioned in Connor v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., and in Mansfield v. Pickwick Stages, 68 Cal. App. 507, 229 P. 890.

The case of Atkinson v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 71 Cal. App. 82, 234 P. 863, collates and distinguishes the California cases on the general subject of res ipsa loquitur. In the cited case as well as in the instant case the action was for damages against two independent defendants. In each case two vehicles, one a passenger carrier and one not a passenger carrier, collided. In each case testimony was introduced upon the subject of negligence as alleged in the complaint against two defendants. In each case the trial court gave the jury instructions upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applying alone to the passenger carrier. In the cited case the court, in holding that the maxim did apply, said:

> "The case was presented to the jury, so far as the evidence was concerned, in the same manner as if it were an ordinary action for damages based upon negligence, the plaintiff having assumed the burden of proof upon all affirmative allegations set forth in the complaint, and the trial court having fully instructed the jury that the burden was upon plaintiff to prove those allegations before she was entitled to a verdict. However, along with the other instructions given, the court instructed the jury, in effect, that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applied, and gave two instructions upon that subject, one being general in form and the other applicable to the particular acts of negligence pleaded. Appellant contends that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur did not apply and that it was therefore error for the court to instruct the jury that it did. This contention is grounded upon the claim that respondent, in her complaint, pleaded specific acts of negligence; that consequently she excluded from the case the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, and lost the right to have the jury instructed upon that subject."

See, also, Marovich v. Central California Tr. Co., supra; Koskela v. Albion Lumber Co., 25 Cal. App. 12, 142 P. 851; Houghton v. Market Street Ry. Co., 1 Cal. App. 576, 82 P. 972; and Housel v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 167 Cal. 245, 139 P. 73, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1105, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 665. Perhaps the latest California case squarely and very clearly deciding the point under consideration is Burke v. Dillingham (Cal. App.) 258 P. 627.

[6, 7] The court gave four instructions prepared from the provisions of the California Motor Vehicle Act, St. 1923, p. 517, as amended. No criticism is made as to the instructions themselves, but appellant complains that they show that respondent, plaintiff below, relied "upon specific proof of negligence in submitting her cause to the jury." We see no point in appellant's argument, as even in a case wherein the maxim res ipsa loquitur is applicable the result of the negligence, to wit, the happening, if not the reason for the happening, by which the injury was sustained, must be both alleged and proved and the burden thereof sustained throughout the case by the plaintiff; and, of course, it follows that instruction as to the law should be given. It is not sufficient merely to allege and prove the relation of carrier and passenger and the injury. "It is not the injury, but the manner and circumstances of the injury, that justify the application of the maxim and the inference of negligence." Davis v. Galveston, etc., Co., 42 Tex. Civ. App. 55, 93 S. W. 222.

[8] Although the point seems not to have been touched upon by appellants in argument to the trial court for a new trial, it is here contended that the res ipsa loquitur rule as given in the instruction might well have been misunderstood by the jury as applying to the defendant Wickersham also; but we do not see how its application could have been made clearer, since the instruction specifically and very plainly limits it to the defendants Brown and Armstrong. Respondents also state in their reply to Wickersham's brief that, although it is not included in points 1 and 2:

> "Nowhere was there an instruction on the degree of care required of Brown and Armstrong as to Wickersham, and under the res ipsa loquitur instruction they might well have concluded that Brown and Armstrong owed the highest degree of care to Wickersham and would be liable for the slightest negligence."

We think the following instruction, which was given, effectually answers this suggestion:

> "In so far as the cross-complainant's cross-complaint against the defendants Brown and Armstrong is concerned, you are instructed that the burden of proof is upon him to establish that the defendants Brown and Armstrong were negligent and that such negligence directly and proximately caused the accident to his car. And in this connection you are instructed that, if you shall find from the testimony that the cross-complainant Wickersham was guilty of any negligence directly and proximately contributing to the happening of the accident in any degree, however slight, your verdict will be for the defendants Brown and Armstrong on the cross-complaint, notwithstanding you may believe that they were guilty of negligence at the time and place of the accident."

[9] We appreciate the rule that this court should not disturb the ruling of a trial court in granting or refusing to grant a motion for a new trial if it can be supported at all. Houghton v. Market Street Ry. Co., supra. The trial court is clothed with a large discretion, but this discretion is a legal one. It must rest upon a sound reason to be found in the case itself, and no such reason has been here pointed out, nor have we, in generally reviewing the whole record, discerned any.

The order granting a new trial is reversed.

We concur: WORKS, P. J.; THOMPSON, J.

PEET v. PEOPLE'S TRUST & SAVINGS BANK et al. (Civ. 5787.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 28, 1928.

1. Chattel mortgages 🔑176(1)—In conversion action for mortgagee's wrongfully retaining cattle taken under mortgage, tender of part of cattle to mortgagor held insufficient defense.

In action against bank, mortgagee, and another for conversion of plaintiff's cattle mortgaged to bank as security for debt, that defendant, rightfully taking cattle under mortgage on nonpayment but wrongfully retaining them without sale, tendered part of cattle to mortgagor on condition mortgagor would pay for rounding up and caring for them, held insufficient defense, where a number of the cattle had died or had been lost.

2. Chattel mortgages 🔑176(4)—Evidence held to show conversion of cattle by mortgagee bank and transferee, where cattle were not disposed of as statute required.

Evidence held to show conversion of cattle by bank to which they had been mortgaged and by bank's transferee, where cattle, though rightfully taken, were not disposed of under mortgage in conformity with statute, but had been turned over to bank's transferee on disposal of bank's assets.

3. Banks and banking 🔑112—Bank held liable for officers' tort in failing to sell, within reasonable time, cattle taken under mortgage.

Bank having mortgage on cattle held liable for tort of its officers, who rightfully took possession of mortgaged cattle on nonpayment of debt, but failed to sell them, in accordance with statutory provisions, within a reasonable time, against objection that a bank is not liable for torts of its officers, since officers were acting within scope of authority in taking cattle for purpose of protecting loan.

4. Banks and banking ⚷67—Bank taking over assets of another bank and selling converted cattle could not defend conversion action on ground original bank's tort was committed by department not taken over (Banking Act, § 31).

Banking taking over assets of another bank pursuant to Banking Act, § 31 (St. 1909, p. 95), and selling converted cattle as part of assets, could not successfully defend conversion action on ground of nonliability because original bank's tort was committed by department thereof which had not been taken over.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; William H. Ellis, Judge.

Action by Jay Peet against the People's Trust & Savings Bank and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Page, Nolan, Rohe & Hurt and Arthur F. Coe, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Lee R. Taylor, C. A. Stutsman, and D. B. Chapin, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for the alleged conversion of a herd of cattle by the defendants. In a previous trial of the case judgment was rendered for the defendant People's Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation, which in that trial was the sole defendant in the case. Upon an appeal taken by the plaintiff the judgment was reversed in Division 2 of this court. Peet v. People's Trust & Savings Bank, 56 Cal. App. 46, 204 P. 413.

Prior to the second trial, which resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff and which occasioned the present appeal, plaintiff filed an amended and supplemental complaint making the Hellman Trust & Savings Bank a codefendant with the People's Trust & Savings Bank.

The original complaint was filed February 4, 1919, and the supplemental complaint on March 16, 1923. In this discussion we will refer to the amended and supplemental complaint as the complaint. Plaintiff alleges that on or about the 20th day of April, 1918, he was the owner and in the lawful possession of 147 head of cattle, situate in Riverside county, of the aggregate value of $15,000, and that on said date the defendant People's Trust & Savings Bank unlawfully took possession of these cattle and converted them to its own use and benefit. The complaint further alleges that subsequent to the filing of the original complaint, to wit, on May 21, 1920, the People's Trust & Savings Bank executed with the Hellman Trust & Savings Bank two contracts, copies of which are set forth in the complaint; that the said agreements were entered into pursuant to the provisions of section 31 of the Banking Act of the state of California (St. 1909, p. 95), and by this arrangement the Hellman Bank acquired from the People's Bank all of the assets of its commercial and savings department, and as consideration therefor agreed to assume and pay its deposit liabilities; that by reason of the aforesaid transactions the plaintiff as creditor of the People's Trust & Savings Bank was deprived of recourse to any of the assets of said bank in order to satisfy its claim; also, that by the terms of said agreements the Hellman Bank assumed and became liable for plaintiff's claim for damages arising out of the alleged conversion.

The answer admits the execution of the contract set out in the complaint, but denies that by reason of said contracts or otherwise the Hellman Bank became in any way liable for plaintiff's alleged claim. Also, upon information and belief, the answer denies the ownership of the cattle in the plaintiff and denies the values placed upon the cattle in the complaint. Defendants also allege that plaintiff's claim did not arise out of the business of the commercial or saving department of the People's Bank, but rather out of the transactions of the trust department; that the Hellman Bank did not purchase either the business or assets of the trust department, nor did it assume any of its trust department liabilities. The case proceeded to trial before a jury and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $3,000.

The presentation in statement and argument by appellants in their brief indicate that they rely upon four points for a reversal of the judgment. These may be stated as follows:

First, that there was in fact no conversion of the cattle by the defendants.

Second, that even if an officer or representative of the defendant corporations wrongfully took cattle belonging to the plaintiff, neither of the defendant corporations can be held liable for the tort of its agent or officer.

Third, that there was no competent evidence presented in the trial to support the finding of the jury that the cattle taken were worth the sum of $3,000.

Fourth, that if any legal liability attached to the appellant People's Trust & Savings Bank by reason of the acts of any of its officers, such liability cannot attach to the Hellman Trust & Savings Bank.

There is a marked conflict in the evidence on certain material matters involved in the case. There is, however, sufficient evidence to have justified the jury in accepting a view of the facts in the case which the following statement fairly portrays.

On September 1, 1917, and for several years prior thereto, the plaintiff was the owner of a herd of dairy cattle near Blythe, Riverside county. This herd consisted of a number of milk cows, and a lesser number of calves and heifers. On September 1, 1917, plaintiff, in order to secure the payment of a loan of $2,500 made by appellant People's Trust & Savings Bank to one Joseph W. Hopkins, executed a chattel mortgage to the People's Trust & Savings Bank covering 60 head of cows and 20 calves of plaintiff's herd. Prior to the spring of 1917 a portion of this herd was pastured on lands known as "Brown's slough," while the remainder of the herd, which were used in the production of milk, constituted plaintiff's dairy near Blythe. Some time in the spring of 1917, the dairy business not proving profitable, plaintiff turned all of his milk cows out to pasture with the remainder of his herd in Brown's slough. In February, 1918, plaintiff caused a roundup to be made of his cattle, and found that he had 147 head, including his milk cows, young calves, several bulls, and some steers. All of his cattle were branded with his brands so as to distinguish them from other cattle then pasturing on the common range.

In April, 1918, J. O. Phillips, who was then assistant trust officer of the People's Bank in charge of the Blythe branch of the bank, under general instructions from J. C. Odell, president of the bank, to look after its affairs in the vicinity of Blythe, ordered all of plaintiff's cattle pasturing in Brown's slough rounded up and taken to a corral, where they were fed for several weeks and then shipped over to Arizona, where they were pastured for a number of months. Shortly after taking possession of the cattle, Phillips reported his having done so to Odell. Odell approved his action and counseled with him concerning the subsequent shipment of the cattle to Arizona. Phillips testified that at the time he took possession of the cattle he did not know whether the note was due or not; that he was moved to round up the cattle because he feared they would be destroyed by the overflow waters of the Colorado river. The fact is the note fell due by its terms on January 1, 1918, and at the time the cattle were rounded up had not been paid.

There was a marked dispute as to the number of cattle taken under Phillips' orders. Plaintiff claims practically all of his herd of 147 cattle were taken, while defendants contended only 57 were rounded up. It appears that Phillips' orders were to round up all of the herd marked with plaintiff's brands, and testimony was offered to the effect that none of the cattle with plaintiff's brands were left in Brown's slough after the roundup ordered by Phillips. It further appears that although plaintiff was living near Blythe, no notice of any kind was given him of the bank's intention to remove the cattle from Brown's slough, nor even later of its decision to ship the cattle to Arizona. There is some dispute as to when the bank officials notified plaintiff that they had taken possession of the cattle. In any event, it was after the cattle were shipped to Arizona.

[1] It is admitted that Phillips and Odell had an interview with plaintiff in October, 1918, concerning the cattle, although again there is a dispute as to what was said in the conversation. Phillips testified that on this occasion Odell offered to return what was left of the herd (it appears without conflict that at this time some 20 to 25 head of the cattle had died or were lost) to plaintiff if he would reimburse the bank for its outlay in rounding up the cattle and caring for them. This part of the conversation is denied by plaintiff. Conceding such a proposal was made, it could not be regarded as a good tender for the reason that a substantial portion of the herd taken could not be returned. It is interesting, although not necessarily important, to note that on October 7, 1918, some days prior to the time of the proposal to return the cattle to plaintiff, Hopkins had paid in full the $2,500 note as security for which the chattel mortgage on the cattle had been given.

In any event, the cattle were retained in the possession of the People's Bank until the assignment of May, 1920, when the Hellman Bank evidently took over the cattle as a part of the assets of the People's Bank, for in October, 1920, one Carrol, then in charge of the activities of the Hellman Bank in Riverside county, sold the cattle remaining from the herd taken for $1,600. There is nothing in the record to indicate what disposition was made of this money.

With the foregoing facts in mind, we will now turn to a consideration of the points urged by appellants in the order of their presentation.

[2] As to the first contention, which is urged as the most important of the issues involved, we are of the opinion that the evidence clearly shows a conversion of at least 57 head of plaintiff's cattle. There is evidence that would justify a finding that a larger number of cattle were rounded up and taken, but the admitted number, in our opinion, is sufficient to sustain the respondent's position. Unquestionably, the defendant People's Bank had the right under the terms of the chattel mortgage, there being a default in the payment of the note, to take possession of the mortgaged cattle in April, 1918, for the purpose of selling them in the manner provided by law. No further steps were taken by the People's Bank at any time to accomplish a sale of the cattle as provided by statute. When the Hellman Bank took possession of the assets of the People's Bank it evidently dealt with the cattle as though belonging to the bank, for no pretense of any kind was made by the Hellman Bank to sell the cattle under the provisions of law relating to mortgaged chattels. When the representative of the Hellman Bank sold the cattle the transaction was apparently that of an owner selling to a buyer.

Probably a complete answer to appellants' contention on this point is that the decision of this court on the first appeal established the law of the case on the question of conversion, and hence at this time there is no necessity for any discussion of this point. Peet v. People's Trust & Savings Bank, 56 Cal. App. 46, 204 P. 413.

[3] It is next contended that even if the acts of Phillips in taking possession of the cattle and the ratification by Odell, the president of the bank, constituted a conversion, the People's Bank did not become liable, for these acts were in the nature of a tort, and a bank is not liable for the torts of its officers. There is no merit in this contention. Phillips and Odell were acting well within their scope of authority in taking the cattle for the purpose of protecting their loan to Hopkins. Their failure to proceed with the disposition of the cattle within a reasonable time in accordance with the provisions of the statute is what furnished the basis for plaintiff's claim against the bank. Peet v. People's Trust & Savings Bank, supra.

As to the point urged, that there was no competent evidence to support the valuation of $3,000 put upon the cattle taken, we cannot agree with appellants. The evidence on this issue was in conflict, and while that offered on behalf of plaintiff was not as strong as usually is presented in cases of this character, it nevertheless was sufficient to support the jury's verdict.

The last contention presented by appellants, that in any event the Hellman Bank is not liable for the wrongful conduct of the officers of the People's Bank, is based upon the theory that the chattel mortgage was a transaction of the trust department of the People's Bank as distinguished from the savings and commercial departments; and, inasmuch as the contracts under which the Hellman Bank took over the affairs of the People's Bank related solely to the savings and commercial departments, the Hellman Bank cannot be affected by anything arising out of this particular transaction.

[4] Unfortunately for appellants' theory, the evidence in the record does not support the view that the chattel mortgage was a part of the assets—particularly of the trust department. The note was made payable to the People's Trust & Savings Bank, and the chattel mortgage made to the People's Trust & Savings Bank, as mortgagee. In the absence of any testimony upon the point, it is a fair inference that the funds loaned to Hopkins were funds of the commercial or savings department. Furthermore, it clearly appears without conflict that Carrol, who was in charge of the Hellman Bank activities in Riverside county accomplishing the liquidation of the affairs of the People's Bank under the contracts of May, 1920, took possession of the cattle and sold them, taking the proceeds for such purposes as the Hellman Bank saw fit; and it would clearly lead to the conclusion that they were regarded by both banks as a part of the assets of the commercial and trust department of the bank.

To permit the Hellman Bank to take and retain possession of the proceeds derived from the sale of cattle which neither it nor the People's Bank had any right to the possession of at the time of the sale, and relieve the bank from obligation to recompense the owner of the cattle for the wrong done, would do violence to the very primary considerations of justice.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is affirmed.

WRIGHT & HOGAN, Inc., v. HEIDE.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 28, 1928.

1. Frauds, statute of 🔑116(5)—Contract for sale of land signed for owner by alleged agent is not binding, in absence of written authority of agent (Civ. Code, § 1624, subds. 5, 6; Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 5).

Under Civ. Code, § 1624, subds. 5, 6, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 5, contract for sale of land signed with name of owner by his alleged agent was not binding on owner, in absence of evidence that alleged agent was ever authorized in writing to make any sales contract on behalf of owner.

2. Quieting title 🔑44(3)—Evidence that defendant had knowledge that agent could not bind plaintiff by alleged contract of sale held to warrant judgment for plaintiff.

In action to quiet title wherein defendant alleged that plaintiff, through an agent, entered into contract of sale of land with defendant, evidence that defendant was informed that agent could not bind plaintiff, and of agent's limited authority, held to sustain judgment for plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Wright & Hogan, Inc., against Charles R. Heide. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. A. Spill, of Pasadena, for appellant.

MacDonald & Thompson and L. W. Frankley, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. Appeal from a judgment quieting title in plaintiff and for costs.

The only matter to be considered is whether or not an examination of the record discloses sufficient facts to substantiate all of the material findings of the court. An investigation does disclose, contrary to appellant's statement, sufficient evidence to support all of these findings.

[1] The facts found bring the case within the provisions of section 1624, subds. 5 and 6, of the Civil Code, and section 1973, subd. 5, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The only claim of the defendant to the property was his claim of a right to purchase under an alleged contract of sale and purchase in which respondent is mentioned as the owner, and which contract was signed with the name of the plaintiff, by H. H. Steiner, and there is no evidence whatever in this record to show that Steiner was ever authorized in writing to make any sales contract on behalf of plaintiff.

[2] The evidence as to the agency of Le Roy and Steiner being sufficient to justify the trial court in finding that they were the agents to find purchasers only for the property in question and other properties, and there being sufficient evidence to show that the appellant was fully informed of the fact that Steiner, who signed the contract as agent, could not bind his principal, and being actually notified that Steiner could not make a deal excepting only for all cash, and there being sufficient evidence to show that Steiner at the time he signed the contract as agent for plaintiff so notified appellant, appellant cannot be now heard to complain of the judgment of the trial court.

The defendant raises the question of estoppel, and urges that the plaintiff is estopped from denying the authority of Steiner to bind it, and in support of this contention cites Karns v. Olney, 80 Cal. 90, 22 P. 57, 13 Am. St. Rep. 101. Appellant's reliance upon the case of Karns v. Olney is evidently based upon a misunderstanding of the facts of that case. Quoting from pages 97, 98 (22 P. 59) of that opinion, we find:

> "But here the sale was in legal effect made by the principals. * * * It was made in their actual presence, and at the request of one of them the money paid was handed to the other immediately. * * * The facts show that the only reason for the finding that they [principals] did not knowingly or intentionally ratify or affirm the contract of sale was, that they did not know the location of the lot. * * * The findings further show that the purchaser took possession under his contract, and made valuable improvements on the property with the knowledge of these parties."

Thus we see that in the Olney Case there was an absolute estoppel, as clear a case of estoppel as can ever be shown. Quoting from this case further:

> "In this case the vendors stood by and saw the sale made, and accepted the purchase money in the presence of the vendee, and the court finds that they 'by their acts and conversation aforesaid induced the said Bayles to purchase said lot from them by their said agent, Hall,' which, it seems to us, presents the strongest possible case against them. * * *"

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

ORMSTON v. LANE et al. (Civ. 4869.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 29, 1928.

1. Parent and child 🔑13(1)—Parenthood does not alone make parent liable for tort of minor child committed while in parent's control and custody.

The mere fact of parenthood does not make a parent liable for the tort of his child, even though the child be a minor and in the custody and control of the parent when the tort in committed, and this rule is only modified in cases of direct statutory provision.

2. Automobiles 🔑191—Father held not liable for minor son's negligence in driving automobile against father's command, where father had not signed son's application for license (Motor Vehicle Act, § 24, as amended by St. 1919, p. 224, § 14).

Where father did not indorse 18 year old adopted son's application for motor vehicle operator's license held by son, as required by Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 397), § 24, as amended by St. 1919, p. 224, § 14, he was not liable for injuries to pedestrian caused by son's negligent operation of automobile belonging to partnership of which father was member, where son was driving car in direct violation of father's command, since relation of agency did not exist on part of son.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by Fanny Ferrari Ormston against R. H. Lane and another, doing business under the fictitious firm name of Sunset Planing Mill, and T. W. Lane, sued herein as F. W. Lane. From so much of the judgment as was in favor of defendant R. H. Lane, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial as against him, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed, and appeal from order denying new trial dismissed.

John C. Miles and Bertrand J. Wellman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Geo. W. Fenimore, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff, Fanny Ferrari Ormston was given judgment by the trial court against defendant T. W. Lane for $3.200 on account of personal injuries she suffered when struck by an automobile operated by him while she was walking from a sidewalk to board a street car, but she was denied relief against the other defendants. Plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and her notice of appeal herein recites that she appeals from the order denying the motion and "from the judgment * * * in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant T. W. Lane, Jr., for the sum of $3,200 and from the whole of said judgment." However, in her brief on appeal appellant states that she appeals from that portion of the judgment which is in favor of respondent R. H. Lane, and from the order denying her motion for a new trial as against him.

As the order is not one from which an appeal lies, the attempted appeal from the order denying a new trial should be dismissed, but consideration will be given the appeal from that portion of the judgment which denied appellant relief against respondent R. H. Lane.

The only question for determination here is whether respondent R. H. Lane is liable for the damages suffered by appellant by reason of the negligence and carelessness of his adopted son, the defendant T. W. Lane.

The uncontroverted evidence showed and the court found the following facts existing at the time of and shortly prior to the occurrence complained of: Defendant T. W. Lane was a minor of the age of 18 years. During more than the 10 years next prior to April 5, 1922, he was the stepson of defendant R. H. Lane, and lives with and was in the custody and under the control of defendant R. H. Lane and of his wife, mother of defendant T. W. Lane. During that time he was known and treated as the son of defendant R. H. Lane, and on that date he was legally adopted as the son of defendant R. H. Lane. The relationship, custody, and control existed on April 12, 1922, when plaintiff's injuries occurred. (For the purpose of brevity defendant R. H. Lane will be hereinafter referred to as "the father" or "respondent" and defendant T. W. Lane as "the son." The father and defendant C. A. Knowles were copartners, doing business under the fictitious name of Sunset Planing Mill Company. At the time of and for some time prior to the occurrence complained of the son was employed by them, and in the course of his employment the son drove a Ford roadster belonging to them. On several occasions prior to the occurrence the father had instructed the son not to use the roadster for his own pleasure or purposes without the father's express permission, but at several prior times the son had used the roadster for his own pleasure pursuant to such permission. Defendant C. A. Knowles had warned the son never to use the roadster for his own purposes. On January 3, 1922, the son procured an operator's license from the motor vehicle department upon an application signed by his mother but which the father did not sign, and this license was in effect at the time of the occurrence complained of. Just preceding that occurrence and after his day's work was finished, the son took the roadster out and was driving it for his own pleasure without the father's knowledge or consent and contrary to his instructions, and while proceeding on a public highway the son so carelessly and negligently drove the roadster that he struck plaintiff and ran her down, causing her serious personal injuries on account of which the judgment against him was given.

Appellant contends that under the provisions of section 24 of the Vehicle Act then in force (Stats. 1915, pp. 397, 411, as amended in 1919, Stats. 1919, pp. 191, 224), it was the duty of the father as well as the mother to have signed the application of the minor son for the operator's license permitting him to operate a motor vehicle on the public highways, the section requiring "the parent or parents having the custody of such applicant" to sign the application; also that section 33 of the act made any violation of the act a misdemeanor, and that the father was guilty of a misdemeanor in permitting the son to so use the roadster without having first signed the son's application for the license, the act further providing, in section 24 that:

> "Any negligence of a minor, so licensed, in operating * * * a motor vehicle upon the public highway, * * * shall be imputed to the person or persons who shall have signed the application," and they "shall be jointly and severally liable with such minor for any damages caused by such negligence."

Appellant further contends that, therefore, as it was the father's duty to have signed such application, he, also, shall be held to respond to plaintiff on account of her injuries, even though he had not signed it.

In support of these contentions appellant cites Whitworth v. Jones, 58 Cal. App. 492, 209 P. 60, in which it appeared that a minor son of the defendant who was in the defendant's custody, had an operator's license, and, while driving his father's automobile, injured the plaintiff, who sued the father for damages. The evidence was silent on the question whether the father had signed the application for the license as provided in the Vehicle Act. On appeal the court held that, under these facts, certain presumptions may be indulged in to sustain the judgment against the father, and those were that:

> "Necessarily, * * * he would be the proper person to have indorsed the application. * * * There are two pertinent presumptions declared to exist under section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure: (15) 'That official duty has been regularly performed'; (33) 'that the law has been obeyed.' The trial judge was warranted in assuming that the father did indorse the son's application and that the officers in charge of the motor vehicle department would not have issued the operator's license without such indorsement being supplied."

Judgment against the father was affirmed. However, in this case, the presumptions mentioned in the Whitworth Case are rebutted by the proof of the fact that the father had not indorsed the son's application for the license.

Appellant argues that the father cannot take advantage of his own wrong in failing to indorse the application and permitting the son to drive the roadster without first having indorsed the application, and cites Walsh v. Flatland, 36 Cal. App. 819, 173 P. 596, and Buelke v. Levenstadt, 190 Cal. 684, 214 P. 42, in support of the proposition as related to the facts in this case. Neither case is an authority here. In the Walsh Case it appeared that the father had permitted his minor son, who had no license, to drive his automobile, and, while driving recklessly the son injured the plaintiff. It was held that the father was liable for the reason that the son was "acting in furtherance of and not apart from the service and control of these defendants" and that the liability rested upon a showing of agency, which need not be a business agency. Reference was made to the Vehicle Act as amended in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 382). The foregoing is taken from Crittenden v. Murphy, 36 Cal. App. 803, 173 P. 595 (referred to in the Walsh Case). Agency is not shown in the case at bar.

In the Buelke Case it appeared that the defendant signed the application of a minor to whom he stood in loco parentis, representing that he was the minor's father. The operator's license to the minor was issued on the application. The court held that defendant was liable for damages caused by the death of another resulting from the negligence of the minor in operating defendant's automobile, although defendant was not present and the minor was on a mission of his own. The court said that this liability was based upon the rules of negligence rather than upon the relation of parent and child, and that "the liability rests not alone upon the fact of ownership, but upon the combined negligence of the driver in the operation of the automobile, and of the owner in intrusting the machine to an incompetent driver," and that the defendant was liable under the provisions of section 24 of the Vehicle Act. This decision was cited with approval in Bosse v. Marye (Cal. App.) 250 P. 693, and Lackey v. Olds and Stoller Interexchange (Cal. App.) 252 P. 672.

[1] The mere fact of parenthood does not make a parent liable for the tort of his child, even though the child be a minor and in the custody and control of the parent when the tort is committed. Buelke v. Levenstadt, supra; Spence v. Fisher, 184 Cal. 209, 193 P. 255, 14 A. L. R. 1083; Perry v. Simeone, 197 Cal. 132, 138, 239 P. 1056; Arrelano v. Jorgensen, 52 Cal. App. 622, 623, 199 P. 855; Hudson v. Von Hamm (Cal. App.) 259 P. 374; Rocha v. Garcia (Cal. Sup.) 263 P. 238; Lane v. Bing (Cal. Sup.) 262 P. 318. "It is only by direct statutory provision that the rule is relaxed or modified. An example thereof may be found in section 24 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1915, pp. 397, 411, as amended by Stats. 1919, pp. 191, 223)." Perry v. Simeone, supra, page 136, 239 P. 1057. See, also, Buelke v. Levenstadt, supra; Rocha v. Garcia, supra, and cases cited.

Appellant's contention that the father violated the law by failing to indorse the son's application for the license and by reason of the violation became liable for the son's tort does not find support in the decisions of the courts. Assuming that the father's failure to indorse the application was a violation of the Vehicle Act, the general rule is that the violation of law must have contributed directly to the injury, and without regard to how improper or illegal it may have been in the abstract, no action for damages can be founded upon it. Arrelano v. Jorgensen and Rocha v. Garcia, supra. In the Arrelano Case a minor son and his parents were sued for damages suffered by the plaintiff resulting from an automobile collision upon a public highway carelessly caused by the son, who owned an automobile and operated it in the course of his employment. He had no operator's license, having permitted his license to lapse. He was in the custody and control of his parents, and they knew he so operated the automobile and that he had no license. "By no stretch of the imagination could it be said that the plaintiff would have been saved these injuries had the operator of the automobile renewed his operator's license." The court held that the parents were not liable. See, also, Spence v. Fisher; Perry v. Simeone; and Rocha v. Garcia, supra.

The statute made the parents liable only when they had indorsed the application upon which the minor child's operator's license was issued, and the child so negligently operates an automobile that he injures another person. Buelke v. Levenstadt; Lackey v. Olds & Stoller Interexchange; Bosse v. Marye; Whitworth v. Jones; and Rocha v. Garcia, supra.

In the Rocha Case it was held that parents are not liable, even though they had indorsed their minor son's application for an operator's license and, during the interim between the time of the indorsement and the issuance of the license, the son, in violation of the parent's explicit command, drove their automobile and so negligently operated it that he collided with and injured plaintiff, a pedestrian, on a public street, and that:

> "It is only for the negligence of a minor 'so licensed' that the parents are liable. * * * Willis Garcia [the minor] was not 'so licensed' or licensed at all, and hence the provisions of the statute imposing a liability upon parents of minor licensed drivers do not apply."

On the other hand, when a father permits his minor child to use his automobile, knowing the minor is a careless and reckless driver, the father is liable for injuries caused another person by the reckless operation of the automobile by the minor. Rocca v. Steinmetz, 61 Cal. App. 102, 104, 214 P. 257, and cases cited. But in the absence of any showing that the parents or either of them had signed an application to the state motor vehicle department for the issuance of an operator's license to their minor son, and in the absence of a showing that the minor was either in fact or to the parents' knowledge a careless or incompetent driver, and, in the absence of any evidence that he was in any business or affair on behalf of the parents, they cannot be held for damages resulting from the carelessness or incompetence of the minor. Lane v. Bing, supra.

Where a father keeps an automobile for the convenience and use of his family, and members of the family drive it solely for their own convenience or pleasure or on their own missions, and the father has no direction or control in those particular uses, he is not liable for torts committed by them in operating the automobile. Spence v. Fisher and Perry v. Simeone, supra; Sanfilippo v. Lesser, 59 Cal. App. 86, 88, 210 P. 44.

[2] It clearly appears in this case that the father—whether standing in loco parentis or as father by adoption of the son—did not indorse the son's application for the operator's license held by the son; that when plaintiff was injured the son was driving the roadster in direct violation of the father's command; and that the relation of agency did not exist on the part of the son. For those reasons the father is not liable to plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed. Appeal from order denying new trial is dismissed.

BOYER v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO (two cases.) (Civ. 5795.) ★

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court May 24, 1928.

1. Evidence 🔑506—Experts' opinions that statements in application for life policy, that insured was brother of female beneficiary, were material to acceptance of risk, held inadmissible.

Insurance experts' opinions, that statements in applications for life insurance policies, that insured in one of them was a brother of woman named as beneficiary, were material to acceptance of risk and hazard assumed by insurer, held properly stricken.

2. Insurance 🔑124—Insurance policies are governed by same general rules as all contracts.

Insurance policies are governed by the same general rules which pertain to all contracts.

3. Insurance 🔑124—Meeting of minds is prerequisite to valid insurance policy.

To execute a valid insurance policy, there must be a meeting of the minds.

4. Insurance 🔑138(1)—Parties to insurance contract may make any agreements they see fit, and courts will enforce terms thereof, if not against public policy or specific law.

Subject to rule that provisions of insurance policy must not be against public policy or in contravention of specific provisions of law, parties to contract may make such agreements as they see fit, and courts will enforce terms mutually agreed upon.

5. Insurance 🔑151(2)—Life policy and application constitute contract.

Life insurance policy and the application therefor constitute the contract.

6. Insurance 🔑298—Words "Relationship Brother" in application for life policy, held "statement" within agreement that any false statement with intent to deceive would bar recovery.

In woman's application for life insurance policy, naming man as beneficiary, words "Relationship Brother," first of which was printed and second typewritten, held a "statement" within preceding agreement that recovery would be barred "if any one of the following statements * * * is false and made with intent to deceive."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Statement.]

7. Contracts 🔑143—Court can enforce only agreements made by parties.

Court can enforce only such agreements as were made by the parties to the contract.

8. Insurance 🔑298—False statement in woman's application for life policy that male beneficiary was her brother held made with intent to deceive within agreement barring recovery in such case (Civ. Code, § 1709).

Statement in woman's application for life insurance policy that male beneficiary, who was only a friend, was her brother, held not a mere mistake, but made "with intent to deceive" within preceding agreement that recovery would be barred if any of following statements were false and made with such intent, though not made with intent to injure insurer; latter's position being altered to its risk within Civ. Code, § 1709.

9. Insurance 🔑298—Materiality of false statement intended to deceive is immaterial, where policy bars recovery if false statement is material to acceptance of risk "or" made with intent to deceive.

Where woman's application for life insurance policy provided that any false statement would bar recovery, if material to acceptance of risk "or" made with intent to deceive, materiality of false statement that male beneficiary was applicant's brother is immaterial, if made with such intent.

10. Evidence ⟹28—It is common knowledge that one cannot obtain policy on life of another, in whom applicant has no insurable interest, but not that rule is otherwise where applicant obtains policy on his own life.

It is a matter of common knowledge that one may not obtain an insurance policy on the life of another, in whom applicant has no insurable interest, but not that rule is otherwise where applicant obtains policy on his own life.

11. Trial ⟹136(3)—It is court's duty to construe written instruments.

It is the duty of the court to construe written instruments as a matter of law.

12. Insurance ⟹668(6)—Materiality of statements in applications for insurance policies is generally for jury, unless evidence is so clear and uncontradicted as to make it matter of law.

Generally, materiality of statements in applications for insurance policies is a question for the jury, unless evidence is so clear and uncontradicted as to make it a matter of law.

13. Insurance ⟹256(1)—One inducing issuance of void policy by deceitfully false statement cannot compel insurer to accept risk and revive policy by changing beneficiary (Civ. Code, § 2612).

One practicing deceit on insurance company by making false statement in application, thereby inducing issuance of policy, which is void from beginning under Civ. Code, § 2612, cannot thereafter compel company to accept risk and revive policy by merely changing beneficiary.

14. Appeal and error ⟹1177(8)—New trial will not be granted on reversal of judgments against insurer because of false statements intended to deceive in applications for policies (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a [added by St. 1927, p. 583]).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 956a (added by St. 1927, p. 583), authorizing appellate court to amend trial court's findings, new trial will not be granted on reversal of judgments for plaintiff in actions on life insurance policies because of false statements, made with intent to deceive, in applications, but cause will be remanded with directions to render judgments for defendant on fact findings as amended in appellate court.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Actions, consolidated for trial, by G. M. Boyer, as administrator of the estate of Dora Mockabee Rose, deceased, against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. Judgments for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Joe Crider, Jr., of Los Angeles, and H. W. B. Smith, of San Francisco, for appellant.

L. N. Turrentine, of San Diego, and Perry F. Backus, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Defendant issued to Dora M. Rose an accident insurance policy on August 16, 1920, in the principal sum of $15,000. Dr. C. E. Calm was named as beneficiary in the policy. On August 19, 1920, Charles Emil Calm, the same Calm named as beneficiary in the Rose policy, applied for and obtained from the defendant an accident policy in the principal sum of $15,000; the beneficiary being Dora M. Rose. At the expiration of one year from the receipt of her policy, Dora M. Rose, by rider attached thereto, changed the beneficiary to her estate. On May 22, 1923, Dora M. Rose and Dr. C. E. Calm were killed in an automobile accident; Dora M. Rose surviving Dr. Calm by two hours. The administrator of the estate of Dora M. Rose filed two actions to recover the policies. By stipulation, the actions were tried together before the court without a jury, and the same evidence was received in both cases. Appeals by defendant in both actions are now before us. The determination of the cases depends upon the construction to be given to the written applications for the policies signed by the insured in view of the stipulated facts and uncontradiced testimony. At the head of each of the applications, we find these words:

> "I hereby apply to the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company for a policy to be based upon the following representation of facts: I understand and agree that the right to recovery under any policy which may be issued upon the basis of this application shall be barred in the event that any one of the following statements, material either to the acceptance of the risk or the hazard assumed by the company is false, or in the event that any one of the following statements is false and made with intent to deceive. I agree that this application shall not be binding upon the company until accepted either by the secretary at the home office or by an agent duly authorized to issue policies."

Then follow fifteen items, all in narrative form except the eighth. In these items the applicants set forth personal data such as is usually found in applications for insurance policies, the first giving the name of the insured, the second, the residence, etc. Item 8 of the Rose application is as follows:

> "Policy to be paid in case of death by accident under its provisions to Dr. C. E. Calm. Resident California Club. Relationship Brother. Age, 55."

After the fifteenth item, the date appears, followed by the signature of the applicant. In the application signed by Dr. Calm three days later, the same words are found, except for the variations occasioned by supplying the personal data of the applicant. In item 8, Dr. Calm named Dora M. Rose as the beneficiary, and gave the relationship as that of sister. It was stipulated at the trial that Dr. Calm and Dora M. Rose were not brother and sister. By the testimony of Ruby Aikman, the driver of the automobile at the time of the accident, it was shown that the witness knew Dr. Calm and Dora M. Rose for some time before either of them made application to the defendant; that they introduced themselves to her, and represented to her that they were friends and not brother and sister. It was further shown that, at the time the applications were presented to defendant, Dr. Calm was a married man. The administrator of the estate of Dora M. Rose promptly furnished defendant with written proof of the accidental deaths; whereupon defendant investigated the facts and learned that Dr. C. E. Calm and Dora M. Rose were not brother and sister. Defendant then tendered to the administrator the amount of the premiums paid, and served written notice that the policies were void. The tender was refused.

[1] At the trial, defendant produced two witnessess, Warren Griffith and George A. Calkins, who qualified as experts in matters of insurance, and testified that, according to the usage and custom of insurance companies, in August, 1920, applications for insurance would not be accepted if made under the circumstances shown in evidence. They further testified that they were of the opinion that the statements contained in the applications to the effect that Dr. Calm was a brother of Dora M. Rose were material to the acceptance of the risk and to the hazard assumed by the defendant. At the close of the evidence, that part of their testimony giving their opinion on the subject of the materiality of the statements was stricken out by the court upon motion of plaintiff. The court did not err in so doing. 25 Cyc. 937. In Penn Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Mechanic's Savings Bank & Trust Co. (C. C. A.) 72 F. 413, 38 L. R. A. 33, 70, it is said:

> "The great weight of authority in this country, however, is against the view that an insurance expert may be asked his own opinion whether the undisclosed or misrepresented facts were material to the risk. * * * The better authorities, however, seem to sustain the rule that the insurance experts may testify concerning the usage of insurance companies generally in charging higher rates of premium or in rejecting risks, when made aware of the fact claimed to be material."

[2-5] Insurance policies are governed by the same general rules which pertain to all contracts. There must be a meeting of the minds. Subject to the rule that their provisions must not be against public policy or in contravention of specific provisions of law, parties to the contract may make such agreements as they see fit, and the courts will enforce the terms mutually agreed upon. The policy and the application therefor constitute the contract. In McKenzie v. Scottish U. & N. Ins. Co., 112 Cal. 556, 44 P. 924, the court said:

> "Parties may contract as they please. When a condition precedent is adopted by them in their contract, the courts will not inquire as to its wisdom or folly. * * * In Wood v. Hartford Ins. Co., 13 Conn. 533, 35 Am. Dec. 92, a leading case on the subject of warranty, Sherman, J., said: 'If a house be insured against fire, and the language of the policy is "warranted, during the policy, to be covered with thatch," the insurer will be discharged if, during the insurance, the house be covered with wood or metal, although his risk is diminished; for a warranty excludes all argument in regard to its reasonableness, or the probable intent of the parties.'"

In Jeffries v. Life Ins. Co., 22 Wall, 47, 22 L. Ed. 833, this language is found:

> "It is the distinct agreement of the parties, that the company shall not be deceived to its injury or to its benefit. The right of an individual or a corporation to make an unwise bargain is as complete as that to make a wise bargain. The right to make contracts carries with it the right to determine what is prudent and wise, what is unwise and imprudent, and upon that point the judgment of the individual is subject to that of no other tribunal."

[6] In her application for the policy, Dora M. Rose agreed that recovery would be barred "if any one of the following statements * * * is false and made with intent to deceive." If the words "Relationship Brother" constitutes a "statement," and were made "with intent to deceive," plaintiff cannot, in view of the rule just set forth and the stipulation of the parties, prevail in the action. It is not necessary to decide whether the words amount to a warranty or representation, since the contract uses the word "statement." The entire application consists of fifteen items, preceded by the agreement hereinabove set forth and followed by the signature of the applicant. Item 8 appears in the midst of the others, all of which contain statements of fact. If it were in narrative form, there could be no doubt but that a statement was made. For instance, if the language used were "the relationship is that of brother," it could not possibly be contended that a statement was not made. Manifestly the two words "Relationship Brother" were used for the sake of brevity. Plaintiff has attached to his brief an exact copy of the application. It appears therefrom that the word "Relationship" is printed and the word "Brother" is in typewriting. By filling in the space following the word "Relationship" as she did, the applicant doubtless meant to state to defendant that Dr. Calm bore the relation of brother to her. It was clearly the intention of the defendant to obtain, and of the applicant to impart, information on the subject of the relationship between the insured and the beneficiary. Considering the application as a whole, we are of the opinion that the applicant intended that all of the matter set forth over her signature was given to the defendant as information and as such was to be treated as statements.

[7, 8] Next is presented the question whether the statement concerning the relationship of the beneficiary was made "with intent to deceive." Plaintiff argues that, in order to bar a recovery, there must be shown an intent to injure defendant. It was not so provided in the contract, and as has been seen, the court can enforce such agreements only as were made by the parties. If the parties had agreed that the intent referred to in the application was an intent to deceive the company to its injury, it would have been a simple matter to add to the application appropriate language to that effect after the word "deceive." Such language, embracing a different idea and an additional condition, cannot be supplied by the court. Doubtless the parties meant to agree that, if the false statement were made knowingly and intentionally, the recovery would be barred. If, on the other hand, the statement were made inadvertently, it would not bar recovery, even though false, because there would be no intent to deceive. An example of such a false statement could be found in an error on the point of the age or the residence of the beneficiary. Erroneous statements by Dora M. Rose in her application that Dr. Calm was 54 rather than 55 years of age, and that he lived at a club other than the California Club, would doubtless be false statements, but not necessarily made with intent to deceive. They might be mistakes resulting from incorrect information on the part of the applicant. The statement on her part, however, that Dr. Calm, a married man and only a friend, bore the relation of brother to her could not possibly have been a mere mistake. There could be no inadvertence here. She must have intentionally stated as true that which she knew to be untrue. Section 1709 of the Civil Code provides:

> "One who willfully deceives another with intent to induce him to alter his position to his injury or risk, is liable. * * *"

[9-11] Here the position of defendant was altered to its risk, and this was brought about by the false statement of the applicant, which must have been intentionally and willfully made. Plaintiff cannot escape the result of the provision of the application by claiming that the false statement was not material, if indeed it be held that the statement in question was immaterial, since the contract provided that a false statement would void the policy in either of two events, if the false statement should be material to the acceptance of the risk, or, if made with intent to deceive. By the plain agreement of the parties, the materiality of the false statement is of no consequence if it was made with the intent to deceive. It is a matter of common knowledge that one may not obtain an insurance policy upon the life of another in whom the applicant has no insurable interest. It is not so generally known, however, that the rule is otherwise where the applicant obtains the policy on his own life. 14 Cal. Jur. 468; 14 R. C. L. 920. It can be well argued that the applicant in the case at bar made the false statement in question in the fear that the application would be refused if the truth were known. Such action on her part would certainly be taken with intent to deceive. Our conclusion on this point will necessitate a reversal of the judgment, notwithstanding the finding of the trial court:

> "That the description of the beneficiary Dr. C. E. Calm as a brother of the insured, Dora M. Rose, when he was not a brother was not a statement material either to the acceptance of the risk or to the hazard assumed by the defendant, or a false statement made with intent to deceive the defendant."

It is the duty of the court to construe written instruments as a matter of law. The facts, which are extremely simple, were established by stipulation or by undisputed testimony. There was nothing for the trial judge to do as a trier of fact. His duty was to draw a legal conclusion from the instrument before him and the stipulation as to the relationship between the insured and the beneficiary. That a false statement was made with intent to deceive is the only reasonable conclusion that can be drawn therefrom. What has been said with reference to the application for the Rose policy applies with equal force to the application of Dr. Calm.

[12] Counsel for defendant contends that a reversal should be ordered on the further ground that the false statement was material to the acceptance of the risk or to the hazard assumed. He points to the testimony of the expert witnesses that, according to the usage and custom of insurance companies, an application would be rejected if the company should discover that a false statement as to relationship had been made. He argues that, since no evidence in conflict appears, the finding on the subject of materiality is not sustained. The witness Calkins testified:

> "Well, the question would immediately come into my mind, which would influence me as to the issuance of that policy, that the character of a person who would deliberately lie to me on an important matter of that kind, that there might be certain relationships that would increase the hazard—and to make you understand it, if I can put it that way a little more clearly just what I mean—there is possibilities, strong possibilities, under these conditions, those certain ones, perhaps relations are not what they should be, and the character of such a person is not just as clearly good as it should be, it would be. I would judge, from making such statements to me, there might be third and fourth parties come in there that might cause a hazard there that I would not look on favorably for the issuance of the policy; do you get what I mean?
> "Q. What would such a hazard be, for example, have you got any concrete idea of what such a hazard would be? A. Well, I know of such hazards that have been carried out in life more than once, where a jealous wife or husband or relative have appeared on the scene and there has been trouble."

Section 2565 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Materiality is to be determined not by the event, but solely by the probable and reasonable influence of the facts upon the party to whom the communication is due, in forming his estimate of the disadvantages of the proposed contract, or in making his inquiries."

The authorities on this angle of the case are not harmonious. Defendant cites the case of Gaines v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York, 93 N. Y. App. Div. 524, 87 N. Y. S. 821, in support of its contention, while plaintiff cites Lampkin v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 11 Colo. App. 249, 52 P. 1040, which appears to support his view. There is also a lack of entire harmony in regard to the respective functions of court and jury in determining the materiality of statements in applications for insurance policies. The prevailing rule seems to be, however, that the materiality of such statements is a question for the jury, subject to the qualification that the evidence may be so "clear and uncontradicted" that the materiality is a matter of law. Everett v. Standard Accident Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 332, 187 P. 996; Union Indemnity Co. v. Dodd (C. C. A.) 21 F.(2d.) 709, decided September 24, 1927. We do not consider it necessary for us to pass upon the questions involved in defendant's contention concerning the asserted materiality of the false statements, since the judgments must be reversed on the ground that the statements were made with intent to deceive.

[13] It cannot be successfully argued that the situation of the parties was changed by the act of Dora M. Rose in changing beneficiaries a year after the policy was issued. Section 2612 of the Civil Code is as follows:

> "A breach of warranty, without fraud, merely exonerates an insurer from the time that it occurs, or where it is broken in its inception prevents the policy from attaching to the risk."

In Wolverine Brass Works v. Pacific Coast Casualty Co., 26 Cal. App. 183, 146 P. 184, it is said:

> "The above-mentioned warranties being false, the policy issued in reliance upon them was in our opinion, void ab initio."

One who has practiced deceit upon an insurance company by making a false statement and thus has induced the issuance of a void policy cannot thereafter, by merely changing the beneficiary, compel the company to accept her as a risk and give life to the void policy.

[14] A new trial will not be necessary. By section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure (added by St. 1927, p. 583) we are authorized to amend the findings of the trial court. It is ordered that the following be stricken from finding XV of the findings of fact in the action on the policy of Dora M. Rose, No. 41611 of the superior court:

> "That the description of said Dr. C. E. Calm as her brother was not material to the acceptance of the risk and to the hazard assumed by the defendant, and that it was not material to the acceptance of the risk or to the hazard assumed by the defendant; that the fact that said beneficiary was described as the brother of the insured did not increase the risk and hazard or risk or hazard assumed by defendant; that defendant did not rely upon the description in said application concerning the relationship of the beneficiary to the insured; and that the said beneficiary was not described as a brother of the insured with the intent to deceive the defendant, and that defendant was not thereby deceived or injured."

It is further ordered that the following be stricken from the findings of fact in the action on the policy of C. E. Calm, No. 41612 of the superior court:

> "That said Charles Emil Calm did not deceive or defraud defendant in any manner or particular in obtaining said contract or policy of insurance" in finding XVI, and "that the description of said Dora M. Rose, as his sister, was not material to the acceptance of the risk and to the hazard assumed by the defendant, and that it was not material to the acceptance of the risk or to the hazard assumed by the defendant; that the fact that said beneficiary was described as the sister of the insured did not increase the risk and hazard, or risk or hazard assumed by defendant; that defendant did not rely upon the description in said application concerning the relationship of the beneficiary to the insured, and that the said beneficiary was not described as a sister of the insured with the intent to deceive the defendant, and that defendant was not thereby deceived or injured" in finding XVII.

The judgments are reversed. It is further ordered that the cause be remanded to the superior court, with directions to render judgment for the defendant in both actions upon the respective findings of fact as herein amended and upon the payment into court for the plaintiff of the sum of $720, the total amount of the premiums received by defendant on the two policies.

I concur: CONREY, P. J.
I concur in the judgment: HOUSER, J.

MILWAUKEE BLDG. CO. v. WETZEL.★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 30, 1928.

Rehearing Granted April 28, 1928.

1. Contracts 🔑28(3)—Evidence held to support finding that parties entered into contract to furnish material and labor for building being constructed by plaintiff.

In action for damages for breach of alleged contract, whereby defendant agreed to perform labor and furnish materials for store fronts and iron doors and elevator doors for passenger elevators and other iron work for plaintiff, a general contractor, in construction of building, evidence held sufficient to support finding that parties entered into contract for alleged breach of which plaintiff asked damages.

2. Contracts 🔑28(3)—Evidence supported finding that plaintiff contractor accepted defendant's bid to furnish labor and materials for store fronts and other parts of building.

In action by general contractor for damages for breach of alleged contract, whereby defendant agreed to furnish materials and labor for store fronts and other parts of building being constructed by plaintiff, evidence held sufficient to support finding that there was an acceptance of defendant's bid.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Trial court's findings on conflicting evidence were conclusive on appellate court.

Trial court's findings on conflicting evidence were conclusive on appellate court, there being nothing in plaintiff's evidence marking it as inherently improbable, or such as would justify court in holding as matter of law that it was not of sufficient probative force to uphold decision.

4. Contracts 🔑349(4)—In action for breach of contract to furnish materials and labor, excluding blank form plaintiff sent defendant for submitting bid held not error.

In action by general contractor for damages for breach of contract, whereby defendant agreed to furnish material and labor for store fronts and other parts of building, denying admission in evidence of printed form which plaintiff sent to defendant for purpose of inserting and so specifying therein his proposal or bid for work held not error, where defendant's bid and acceptance thereof by plaintiff through or by means of purchase orders were introduced in evidence.

5. Contracts 🔑349(1)—In action for breach of contract to furnish materials for building, excluding evidence regarding whether certain item appeared on plans as recorded in county recorder's office held not error.

In action by general contractor for breach of contract, whereby defendant agreed to furnish material and labor for store fronts and other parts of building, excluding evidence on cross-examination of plaintiff's witness as to whether "iron frames and sash" as contained in plans and specifications on which defendant framed and tendered his bid appeared on plans as recorded in county recorder's office held not error, where defendant undeniably based his bid on plans and specifications which contained words, "iron frames and sash."

6. Appeal and error 🔑931(5)—Presumption is court considered all relevant testimony received and incompetent testimony received without objection.

Presumption is that court in deciding case considered all relevant and material testimony received, and even incompetent testimony if it was received without objection.

7. Evidence 🔑158(27)—In action for breach of contract to furnish materials, excluding evidence regarding similarity between plaintiff's exhibit and plans from which defendant made up bid held not error; plans being best evidence.

In action by general contractor for breach of contract, whereby defendant agreed to furnish material and labor for store fronts and other parts of building, excluding answer to question, "Have you determined whether or not they (Plaintiff's Exhibit 8) are similar plans to those from which you figured in order to submit your bid?" which was designed to establish that words, "iron frames and sash," which were in Exhibit 8, were not in plans from which defendant made up his bid, held not error, since plans themselves were best evidence of facts sought to be shown.

8. Evidence 🔑129(6)—In action for breach of contract, evidence regarding B.'s first bid in comparison with other bids held competent to show bid was substantially same as successful bid on reletting contract after breach and on damages.

In action by general contractor for breach of contract whereby defendant agreed to furnish material and labor for store fronts and other parts of building, evidence regarding B.'s first bid for work in comparison with other bids then made held competent to show that B.'s bid was substantially same as its successful bid on reletting of contract after defendant's breach, and also, on matter of measure of damages, to show that B.'s bid on reletting involved reasonable price for same work.

9. Trial 🔑105(1)—Evidence admitted without objection was in record for purposes of decision.

Where question objected to was elsewhere fully gone into without objection, it was in record for all purposes of decision.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1058(1)—Rulings on evidence held harmless, where testimony excluded was elsewhere admitted without objection.

Where testimony sought to be brought out by one of questions and testimony excluded by ruling as to the other were elsewhere permitted to go into record without objection, rulings, if erroneous, were harmless.

11. Damages 🔑120(3)—For breach of contract to furnish material and labor for building, measure of damages was amount which would compensate party aggrieved for all detriment proximately caused thereby (Civ. Code, § 3300).

For breach of defendant's contract to furnish plaintiff, a general contractor, with labor and materials for store fronts and other parts of building, measure of damages was amount which would compensate plaintiff for all detriment proximately caused thereby, or which in ordinary course of things would be likely to result therefrom, under Civ. Code, § 3300.

12. Damages 🔑189—Evidence supported finding that plaintiff's cost of having contract performed after defendant's breach was reasonable value of work.

In action by general building contractor for damages for breach of contract, whereby defendant agreed to furnish material and labor for store fronts and other parts of building, evidence held sufficient to support finding that cost to plaintiff for having work called for by contract performed represented reasonable value or price of work.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by the Milwaukee Building Company against Kurt O. Wetzel, doing business as the K. O. Wetzel Company, for damages for breach of contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Isaac Pacht and Clore Warne, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant damages for the alleged breach of a certain contract. Judgment passed for the plaintiff in the sum of $3,131, the amount prayed for in the complaint. The defendant moved for a new trial, the same being denied. This appeal is from the judgment upon a bill of exceptions.

The plaintiff, a corporation organized and existing in pursuance of the laws of California, prior to and at the time of the commencement of this action, was and is engaged in the business of general contractor for the erection and construction of buildings, with its principal place of business in the city of Los Angeles.

The defendant, Kurt O. Wetzel, prior to and at the time of the commencement of this action, was doing business in said city under the fictitious firm name of K. O. Wetzel & Co.

At some time prior to and at the time of the commencement of this action the plaintiff was, "and still is, engaged, as the general contractor, in the erection, building and construction of that certain building * * * at No. 806 South Broadway, in the city of Los Angeles, commonly known as the Carleton F. Burke building, according to plans and specifications provided" in the contract for the erection and construction of the same. "Said plans and specifications provided for the furnishing and construction of * * * certain store fronts and iron doors to store and iron front, iron doors and iron grille on the wood doors to the building lobby and iron elevator doors for two passenger elevators and other iron work to be furnished in and about said premises." On October 31, 1922, the defendant entered into a written agreement with plaintiff to furnish said iron or metal, and to perform all work, labor, and materials necessary therefor, for the sum of $4,752, and further in said contract agreed to complete said work on or before the 8th day of February, 1923.

The complaint, from which the foregoing statement is taken, alleges that the defendant breached said contract by failing and refusing to comply with the terms thereof; that, in order to complete said building in compliance with the terms of its contract, the plaintiff "was forced to and did secure from other persons and firms engaged in the same line of business, to wit, in the furnishing of iron and metal work and doing labor with regard thereto, such as required by the plans and specifications to be followed by this plaintiff, bids and estimates of the best price at which they would furnish the materials and do and perform the labor necessary to install the same as per the original agreement with the defendant; * * * that the lowest bid or estimate for said materials and work was the sum of $7,883; * * * that plaintiff has by its contract duly made become indebted in said sum for the iron and metal work which was to have been furnished by defendant under his said contract aforesaid." It is alleged that by reason of the defendant's failure to comply with and perform his said contract, the plaintiff has been damaged "in a sum equal to the difference between the sum of $7,883 and the sum of $4,752, the first-named sum being the amount which plaintiff was compelled to pay for the material and the work because of defendant's breach of his contract with plaintiff to furnish said material and work and the last named sum the amount defendant agreed to furnish said material and work for, the difference between said sums being the sum of $3,131. It is further shown by the complaint that the contract of plaintiff to erect said building provided that for its noncompletion within the time specified therein the plaintiff shall be penalized in the sum of $100 for every day until completed.

The defendant's answer first specifically denies the material averments of the complaint and then sets up a special defense. The brief of counsel for the plaintiff correctly epitomizes the averments of said special defense, and we will therefore adopt the same herein, as follows:

> "As a second and separate defense defendant alleged substantially that: He had received requests for the submission of a bid for certain work, designated as item No. 1 and item No. 2, said request being accompanied by certain plans and specifications. That defendant submitted bids therefor, but that neither of said bids was ever accepted. The plaintiff delivered to defendant a certain 'purchase order' calling for defendant to 'furnish and install complete ornamental wrought iron and cast iron front entrance and doors, except the lobby door and frame, which are omitted as per our plans and specifications and your bid 10/31/22, $2,952.' That said work order called for other and different work and material. That defendant returned said work order and requested that it be changed to conform to request for bid, but that plaintiff refused to change said purchase order. That defendant was ready, willing, and able to perform work called for in bid, and plans and specifications submitted to him at time of making, but plaintiff refused to allow him to so complete the contract. That as to item No. 2, plaintiff never accepted bid of defendant, but that plaintiff delivered to defendant a 'purchase order,' calling upon defendant to 'furnish and install complete passenger elevator frames and doors, as per our plans and specifications and your bid 10/31/22, $1,800.' That the original request for bid did not include any elevator 'frames.' That defendant demanded correction and elimination of item of 'frames,' but that plaintiff refused. That defendant was ready, willing and able to perform as per his bid, but plaintiff refused to allow him so to do."

The court found that the allegations of the complaint were true, and specifically found that the averments of the special defense were untrue.

The defendant contends that the findings derive no support from the evidence, and that the court, in certain rulings upon the question of the legal propriety of certain evidence, were prejudicially erroneous.

[1] The defendant first declares and contends that the finding that the parties entered into the contract for the alleged breach of which damages are asked by plaintiff in this action is afforded no support by the evidence. The finding so attacked, of course, constitutes the primary foundation of the judgment and without which the judgment, of course, could not stand.

It is not conceived to be necessary to enter herein into a minute examination and consideration of the evidence to show, as a careful review of the record has convinced us is true, that the above-mentioned findings, as well as the specific finding that the defendant breached his contract with plaintiff, are sufficiently supported. As is true in the general run of cases taken to the appellate courts, there is here a substantial conflict in the evidence upon the vital questions of fact. The presentation herein of a general statement, in synoptical form, of the testimony which supports the findings should be made, and even with such a statement considerable space in this opinion will be required.

It appears, as the complaint alleges and the court finds, that the defendant, on the 31st day of October, 1922, submitted a bid to the plaintiff for performing the metal and iron work described in the findings hereinabove set forth for the building mentioned in the complaint, and also for the furnishing of the materials necessary for such work. The submission of this bid, it appears from the testimony of defendant (who was called as a witness for examination by the plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure), was submitted to plaintiff in response to an invitation therefor by the latter some two weeks prior to said 31st day of October. At the time said invitation was made, the defendant (so he testified) and M. C. Montgomery, "estimator" of the plaintiff, together "went over the plans and specifications." Defendant testified that, on said 31st day of October, he and Montgomery again jointly examined the plans and specifications, and that immediately thereafter on that day he (defendant) signed his bid. Wetzel further testified that his bid was reduced to writing by Montgomery in the office of the plaintiff in his (defendant's) presence; that the "figures" set forth in the bid "as they were marked down in prices had been given to them by myself over the telephone some days previous to this meeting and making out of this written document as to the price of this work." Wetzel stated that, after he was solicited to make a bid on the work and prior to submitting his bid, he prepared shop drawings of a part of the work. He stated that on the 31st day of October, 1922, he went to the office of Montgomery in response to a telephone call from some party connected with the plaintiff. At that time, after stating to defendant that he had certain work for the performance of which he desired a bid from him (defendant) Montgomery proceeded to explain the character of the work to be done. Defendant testified that "in order to make it possible to make any bid at all on his work, Montgomery had a set of architectural plans * * * for the Burke building * * * and pointed out on these plans what kind of work was to be done. Then Mr. Montgomery, having absolutely no details of any kind referring to this work, had to explain to me in a positive way in what manner and in which way we should make this bid and what work was to be done and how this particular work was to be treated." Wetzel said that his business was that of a manufacturer of wrought iron and cast iron, and that he had followed that work for 20 years; that it was not possible to determine from the architectural plans "the class of cast-iron store front to be used in that building." Wetzel proceeded to testify that "in order to have a complete understanding of the class of work to be incorporated in a cast-iron store front it is necessary besides the set of architectural plans to have full size details * * * which carry the exact conditions of the work as it is carried out in its actual form, size, and appearance and ornamentation." Such details, he stated, were not shown by the specifications to which he subscribed his name and upon which he submitted his bid. Continuing, he testified:

> "Referring to the conversation with Mr. Montgomery held prior to October 31, 1922, Mr. Montgomery explained to me just in what manner they expected this front to be designed by them in time, in detail work, and in order to make a bid for it he explained what parts of the work they expected to be furnished and what parts of the work should not be considered. And as for the questions, which I have asked very many, Mr. Montgomery he has answered me. * * * In consequence of this conversation I based my price and all on this conversation. * * * At the time of this conversation with Mr. Montgomery he gave me a written paper or order, whatever you might call it, that indicated just what was wanted. There was more conversation on other work also if that is necessary to state. This is not all. And Mr. Montgomery conversed with me on this matter perhaps more than one hour and brought out all detail work about the thing and the conversation to more than one hour. He also asked me how long this work should take and all such things like that. We discussed the elevator doors, and as to what particular plans should be followed. * * * At the time that I submitted the estimate, Plaintiff's Exhibit 1, or prior to that, I had examined the plans and specifications. I had a set of architectural plans given to me for figuring and I had my instructions as to the extent of the work from Mr. Montgomery and on this I made my estimate. The plans that I had were supposed to be the architectural plans, either the set in evidence or one just like it."

The bid of Wetzel was dated October 31, 1922, was addressed to "Meyer & Holler, Milwaukee Building Co.," and was in form as follows:

> "Gentlemen: I, we proposed to furnish, as per plans and specifications, all labor and materials for the iron front & doors work on Burke job.
> "State alternate figures, additions, omissions or discrepancies between plans and specifications:

Cast-iron front complete	$3,452 00
Deduct for store doors only	280 00
Deduct for store doors frame	385 00
Deduct for lobby doors only	160 00
Deduct for lobby doors frame	340 00
Elevator doors as per Wetzel's details using Elevator Supply Co's hangers	1,800 00
Elevator doors as per M. B. Co. detail per sheet No. 13 using Elevator Supply Co.'s hangers	1,800 00

Time limit 3 mo.

> "K. O. Wetzel Co., signed by Kurt O. Wetzel."

Wetzel testified that either on the 11th or 12th day of November, 1922, he received from plaintiff two written documents addressed to him (defendant) called "purchase orders," which contained a specification, in somewhat general language, of the work which he was to perform in pursuance of the terms of his bid. The first of these orders, as they are identified as exemplars in the record (Exhibit 2), called for the furnishing and installation of "complete elevator 'frames and' doors as per our plans and specifications and your bid, 10/31/22, $1,800." This document was signed by "J. O. Graham, Manager of Construction" of plaintiff. The second (Exhibit 3) likewise addressed and signed, read:

> "Furnish and install complete ornamental wrot and cast-iron front entrance and doors, except the lobby door and frame which are omitted as per our plans and specifications and your bid 10/31/22, $2,952."

Accompanying the above when sent to defendant was a letter from the plaintiff, by "E. A. Waugh, Manager of Construction," in which it was stated:

> "We hand you herewith drawings Nos. 1, 2 & 3 of the Baker Iron Works covering the elevator door frames which they are furnishing on the Carleton F. Burke Bldg.; also your drawing of elevator doors which is approved by us."

At the time Wetzel received said orders, Wetzel signed the specifications and plans.

Wetzel did not, after receiving the "purchase orders," proceed with the carrying out of his agreement, and refused to do so. Wetzel claimed that the matter of the ornamentation of the iron work as given in the specifications was too indefinite to justify any attempt to figure on definitely or safely even by estimate, and that the character thereof when finally given in detail deviated materially from the specifications as they were explained and interpreted by Montgomery in the conversation between him and the latter on October 31, 1922. There were other objections made by Wetzel to the order (Exhibit 3) for "passenger elevator frames and doors," in that his bid did not contemplate elevator "frames." But these matters are explained by other witnesses for the plaintiff, and their testimony will now be considered in its application to all the disputed questions of fact herein, and which, as above stated, affords strong support to all the vital findings. Before doing this, however, it is well here to say that Wetzel stated that "ordinarily the giving of an order is an acceptance of the bid—an authorization to go ahead with the work. We took those as orders."

M. C. Montgomery, referred to above, testified—> to the details of the conversation with Wetzel on October 31, 1922, when the plans and specifications for the work on the Burke building on which he (witness) had asked Wetzel to submit a bid were fully discussed; that before submitting his bid, Wetzel examined the plans and specifications (marked in the record as Exhibit 8), "and after doing so he submitted a bid and signed it. The words 'iron frames and sash' (claimed by Wetzel not included within his bid) were on the plans which were shown to Mr. Wetzel on the 31st of October. There is no change on these plans with reference to the iron work from what was on there on the 31st of October. That remains the same. I had no conversation with Mr. Wetzel along the line that he was not to do the sash. There was no understanding (as Wetzel here claims) between us that the sash was to be pine instead of iron. This is delineated as outlined upon these plans of the work which was to be done by Mr. Wetzel under his bid. We submitted these plans and specifications to other bidders in the same line of work and got bids from other people for this very work. There were four bids, including Mr. Wetzel's. He was the lowest bidder. It is not the usual practice to have detail drawings in order to bid on a job of this kind. The usual practice is to take what we call scale drawings, meaning small scale drawings, and submit them to the bidders or subcontractors for estimate and the one that is finally successful in getting the work is then later on furnished with full sized enlarged scale details in order to actually execute the work that he has bid on. It is always presumed that there is enough information in the small scale work to render an intelligent bid. It is the same with this set of plans. * * * I submitted it to those that I had originally taken bids from at the time Mr. Wetzel bid. I submitted it to the Architectural Iron Works, the Bayer-Rothgeb Company, and the Lowith Iron Works, the same firms who bid about October 31st. I submitted these very plans which were approved by Mr. Wetzel; those plans plus some details that had been made in the meantime. The work was finally awarded to the Bayer-Rothgeb Company. * * * I do not know off-hand the amount of their bid. It was more than Mr. Wetzel's bid by three thousand or four thousand, I think. The bid of the Bayer-Rothgeb Company was slightly lower than its original bid; in the neighborhood of $500 lower. The other bids which we received after February 3d were about the same as the original bids of those firms. I think they let the bids stand, as I recall it, just as they were. There might have been some slight modification."

Montgomery further testified that, prior to the submission of the bid by Wetzel, he had a conversation with the latter, as to which conversation he (Montgomery) testified:

"At that conversation I told Mr. Wetzel what we desired him to bid on. I outlined the work for him in a more or less helpful way. I submitted the plans and specifications and supplemented them with explanations. I do not recall exactly the conversation, but I remember of running over the plans and specifications with him and pointing out the fact that the job was a commercial job of iron work such as usually used in buildings of that type, and pointed out the features of the work that he was to do, the store fronts, elevators. I remember showing him the sketch of the elevator door, things which I thought might be of help in working up a price on it. I told him with respect to the cast iron store front that it was the ordinary commercial work for that class of building. From the architectural plans that we had before us at the time it is possible to determine very closely the amount of ornamentation which will go into that cast-iron work. I think the drawings or architectural plans would cover the extent of the ornamentation fairly well. It would show the general character and nature of it right on the face of it, whether it were elaborate or not on the small drawings. I remember of telling him that it would be a commercial job. In our practice, and I believe in iron work in general, we refer to a 'commercial job' as a job of the type you would use in the business district to distinguish it from a finely hand-wrought and hand-work forged job that might be used in very high-class residential or public work. The term does not have reference to degree of ornamentation. It would not affect that, because in casting iron the ornamentation is not an important feature, the amount of it. We did not in that conversation mention sash."

Throughout his entire testimony, both on direct and cross-examination, Montgomery repeatedly asseverated that the whole of the work upon which Wetzel was invited to and did submit a bid was fully and in detail explained to the latter.

The witness Graham, called on behalf of plaintiff, stated:

"That he was placing the orders and contracts at the time of the Burke job, and that he was instructed by Mr. Waugh that Wetzel was going to get the orders; that the orders were drawn by him, and that he called Wetzel to the office, showed him the plans and specifications, the order and the bids; that Wetzel signed the plans and specifications, after looking at them, and took the orders with him; that Wetzel returned the following day and stated that the words 'elevator frames' appearing in the purchase order (Plaintiff's Exhibit 2) were improperly included; that he (Graham) immediately saw it was a typographical error; that Wetzel was told that the words stated did not belong there and that the Baker Iron Works had the order for the frames, and that he then scratched out the words 'frames' on Wetzel's copy and on the office copy; that Wetzel then took the orders with him again and left the office, saying that he would go ahead with the work; that he did not at that time raise the question that the order called for wrought iron and cast-iron front entrance and doors; that subsequently and about January 26 a letter was written, sending Wetzel details of the Baker Iron Works for the elevator door frames that were needed by Wetzel to complete the work; that up to that date Wetzel had not given Graham any information that he would not go ahead with the work, although he had been in the office several times between November 15 and January 26; that after the letter of January 26th was written, Wetzel came in with the orders and stated that they were not right, and left the orders with Graham, who told him that he would have to see Mr. Waugh; that later Wetzel came back to see Waugh and afterwards Graham mailed the orders left back to Wetzel."

The witness Waugh, manager of construction for the respondent company at the time in question, testified:

> "That Mr. Wetzel came to the place about the 1st of February; that the orders were there at that time; that Wetzel complained that the details elaborated on the plans and that he did not want to go ahead with the work; that he asked how they elaborated and was informed that there were two particular items objected to by Wetzel: One was the cast-iron stops and the other was the steel sash on the mezzanine floor of the front; that he then informed Wetzel that the iron stops were not a part of his contract, and that if the company wanted them he would be given an additional order to cover the item, but that the item of sash was a part of the original contract and was in the plans and specifications that had been signed. The witness Wetzel then said, 'Yes, that was the worst thing I ever did, was to sign those plans and specifications;' that Wetzel did not indicate at that conference that he would not go ahead with the work; that the Bayer-Rothgeb Company, the subsequent successful bidder who performed the work, had no other form of contract except their bid and the purchase order or acceptance."

The witness Buxton, testifying for plaintiff, stated:

> "That he was a draftsman and had been engaged in that line of work for some 20 years, and was working for respondent company at the time in question; that after November 15 he had possibly six conversations with Wetzel regarding the iron work, discussing various features of the order; that certain changes and revisions were made pursuant to the directions of Wetzel, which were entirely in matters of detail; that in none of such conversations did Wetzel indicate that he was not going on with the contract; that there was no different work required in the details furnished Wetzel from that specified in the plans."

We have for convenience taken the foregoing statement of the testimony of the witnesses named from the brief of counsel for respondent, after carefully comparing it with the testimony of said witnesses as it is presented in the bill of exceptions.

A. L. Lowith, manager of the Lowith Iron Works, engaged in the business of fabricating structural steel and ornamental iron work in all its branches for about 30 years, stated that he was "familiar with reading and translating blue prints, particularly with reference to ornamental iron work"; that when bids for the work in question were first called for by plaintiff (in October, 1922), he submitted a bid therefor; that he figured on plans submitted by plaintiff similar to those designated in the record as "Plaintiff's Exhibit 8" (upon which defendant testified, as seen, that he framed and tendered his bid); that he submitted more than one bid; that "it is possible from a set of architectural plans to determine the degree of ornamentation to be used in cast-iron work." In rebuttal, Lowith stated that he bid on the work when resubmitted of reletting, after defendant refused to proceed to do the work under his bid; that (referring to enlarged or detail drawings of the plans, upon which his later bid was based), the details then presented were "more plainly brought out" than "they are on these," referring to the original plans according to which defendant's bid was estimated and submitted. He said, however: "That the cost of the material shown in the detail drawing probably would be the same as shown on 'Exhibit 8.'" * * * That, "looking at the original plans, I would expect to receive details which would depict the work a good deal more fully and to the extent that it is depicted on these (the enlarged drawings) details." * * * That "preparing an estimate for a work of that kind is a job for an experienced man—a man who is experienced in that line, and he has to visualize certain details of the work. If he has the experience he knows about what any architect or builder will require on a job of this kind. In other words, the character of the job shows itself what will be required." That the purpose for which the building is to be used "would speak to quite an extent to explain what would be required." Lowith further testified that he could not see "a great difference" between the details in the two drawings. "I would say," he continued, "there should not be a difference of more than $150 on the pattern work of the whole job. * * * If there had been any substantial difference between the details and the original plans, my bid would not be the same. It would be higher or lower."

Harry Friedman, who at the time of the occurrence of the transactions involved herein was "estimator and shop foreman" of the Architectural Iron Works of California, testified that his company submitted a bid about October 31, 1922, for the work on the Burke building, for which defendant at the same time submitted his bid and was awarded the contract; that his company also tendered a bid for the same work in March, 1923, after defendant declined to carry out his agreement; that the plans on which he made the later bid involved a full-sized scale drawing, but he found no changes therein from the plans of October 31, 1922. "In fact," he testified, "I put in the same estimate for the same amount. * * * Naturally, a full-size scale drawing you can see a difference in that you can't on a small scale drawing, because it is bigger. When I saw the detail drawings it made no difference in my estimate. * * * I have found it possible to tell from a set of architectural plans the degree of ornamentation which will eventually appear upon the cast iron. If a man has the experience along those lines he will put in and show what is going to happen when the full sizes are made."

C. R. Fleishman, secretary of A. J. Bayer Company, which was awarded the contract for the iron work in question, in March, 1923, after defendant's refusal to proceed with the performance of his agreement for the same work, testified that his company tendered a bid for the doing of said work on or about October 31, 1922, upon plans or drawings designated in the record as "Defendant's Exhibit 8"; that the later bid of his company was based on "Defendant's Exhibit G," being drawings of the work to be done; that he had compared the two drawings, and found that "the details follow very closely to the scale drawings, as far as an estimate is concerned." The witness stated that his later bid was substantially the same as the bid submitted by his company in the first instance. The matter of the extent of the ornamentation in the iron work is in all such cases one of approximation, the estimates of the price of such work resting largely on the judgment of the bidders based upon the character of the building, the purpose for which it is to be used and other considerations which it is not always practicable to explain in complete detail on the architectural drawings, but as to which an experienced and capable iron and structural steel manufacturer should be and generally is capable of exercising intelligent judgment in estimating the kind and the value of the work to be done thereon.

It may here be stated that the several witnesses whose firms made a bid on the work on both occasions testified that there was no substantial difference in amount between the two bids submitted by them.

[2] As to the contention that the finding that there was an acceptance of Wetzel's bid by the plaintiff is not supported by any evidence in the case, it is to be observed that Wetzel himself testified that "ordinarily the giving of an order is an acceptance of the bid —an authorization to go ahead with the work." Furthermore, Wetzel's conduct with reference to the transaction, after receiving the orders, clearly shows that he regarded and assumed that the sending of the orders to him amounted to acceptance of his bid by plaintiff and thus a completed contract. This testimony corresponds with that of the other parties submitting bids for the work. It was admitted by Wetzel that, in his deposition taken before the trial of this action, the main objections to the plans and specifications upon which he framed and submitted his bid revolved around the item of ornamentation—that is, that the nature and the extent of the ornamentation could not be determined from said plans and specifications. In the same deposition, it was shown at the trial, Wetzel stated that certain items which he claimed were not included in his bid "are not even of any great importance."

Further consideration herein of the evidence is not necessary. It is enough to say that these results, which are either expressly or impliedly within the court's findings, are clearly deducible from the evidence: That defendant, upon the small-scale plans or drawings and the specifications, based his bid after a thorough examination of said plans, etc., and upon the conversations with Montgomery explaining the undelineated details of the work; that the plans or drawings in their very nature contemplated extrinsic explanation of the smaller details as to ornamentation; that such a course is usual in such transactions and known so to be by those experienced in iron and structural steel work; that the plaintiff accepted defendant's bid, after which further oral explanations as to details were made to defendant; that the latter, after such acceptance, pointed out to one of plaintiff's agents an item which was erroneously included in one of the purchase orders delivered to defendant, and that thereupon, acknowledging the error, plaintiff's agent struck out and eliminated said item from said purchase order; that at no time when personally consulting any of plaintiff's agents about his bid after the same was ratified or accepted by the plaintiff did Wetzel say or intimate that he did not intend to proceed with the execution of the terms of his agreement, and that he expressed no such intention until addressing to plaintiff a letter, dated February 3, 1923, to the effect that the details previously delivered to defendant by plaintiff (the purchase orders) so far deviated from "the intended work" as to justify him in declaring "your order canceled." From defendant's own testimony and his conduct with respect to the transaction, the court could expressly have found that the truth was that, after his bid had been accepted by plaintiff, he discovered and concluded that he had entered into an improvident agreement, from a financial point of view, and for that reason, and not because he was not given sufficient information as to details, etc., he resolved to repudiate his engagement. He specifically stated, it will be noted, that he based his bid on the drawings and his conversations with Montgomery.

[3] Of course, the effect of the testimony of the defendant and his witnesses at variance with that introduced by the plaintiff upon the salient questions of fact was merely to create a conflict, and the court's findings against the defendant are, therefore, conclusive upon this court, there being nothing in the plaintiff's evidence which marks it as inherently improbable or such as to justify us in holding, as a matter of law, that it is not of sufficient probative force to uphold the decision in all respects.

[4] The first of the several assignments of error based upon certain rulings of the court urged here grows out of the ruling denying admission in evidence on the offer of defendant of a printed form which plaintiff sent to defendant for the purpose of inserting and so specifying therein his proposal or bid for the work. The form, save certain printed words indicating the different items of which the work was to consist and as to which the bid was to be made, was a blank and, of course.

was unsigned. The ruling excluding the paper was proper. We can conceive of no service which it could render as evidence in this case. The defendant's bid and the acceptance thereof by plaintiff through or by means of the purchase orders were, as seen, introduced in evidence. These, with the conversations between the several agents of the plaintiff, particularly the conversation with Montgomery explaining the details of the work and upon which, mainly, the defendant stated he based his bid, were all that were necessary to show, at least with appropriate accuracy, the particular nature and extent of the work for the performance of which the plaintiff solicited the defendant to submit a bid. The blank form, therefore, could have reflected no light upon the proposition or any issue in the case.

[5] It is next objected that there was error in the ruling forestalling an answer to the question to the witness Montgomery on cross-examination by defendant's counsel as to whether the words "iron frames and sash," as contained in the plans and specifications upon which defendant framed and tendered his bid (Exhibit 8) "appeared upon the plans as recorded in the county recorder's office," the original plans and specifications having been filed in the recorder's office with the original contract—that is, the contract for the erection of the building between plaintiff and the owners thereof. The ruling was correct. The defendant undeniably based his bid on "Exhibit 8," which, as seen, contained the words "iron frames and sash." We cannot conceive what relevant or possible purpose the fact, if it was a fact, that said words were not indicated on the original plans could serve in the present case. It may be added that Montgomery stated that the plans recorded and the plans submitted to defendant were different in some of the matters of detail.

[6, 7] The point next urged is that it was error for the court to sustain the plaintiff's objection to the following question to defendant by his counsel: "Have you determined whether or not they (Plaintiff's Exhibit 8) are similar plans to those from which you figured in order to submit your bid?" The proposition which the question was designed to establish was that the words, "iron frames and sash," which, as seen, were on "Exhibit 8," were not on the plans from which defendant made up his bid. Defendant elsewhere testified that those words were not on the plans according to which his bid was prepared. Counsel for defendant on page 79 of his opening brief expressly so admits, contending, however, that the question being specific as to that matter, the ruling disallowing an answer thereto would show that the court "left out of consideration entirely that testimony in arriving at its conclusion as to what contract defendant made." The presumption is that the court, in deciding the case, considered all the relevant and material testimony received, and even incompetent testimony if it was received without objection, as was the testimony of defendant on that subject. The ground upon which the court disallowed an answer to the question was that the plans themselves were the best evidence of the fact thus sought to be shown and upon that ground the ruling was legally correct.

[8, 9] Over objection by defendant, the court permitted the witness Montgomery, in response to a question by counsel for plaintiff, to state what the bid by the Bayer-Rothgeb Company was for the work when that company submitted its bid in the first instance, in comparison with other bids then made—that is, the bid of the Bayer-Rothgeb Company and other bids submitted in the first instance in the month of October, when defendant was the successful bidder. The purpose of this testimony was to show that the Bayer-Rothgeb bid was then substantially the same as its successful bid on the reletting of the contract in February, 1923, and also upon the matter of the measure of damages, as far as it might tend to do so, to show that the bid of said company on the reletting involved a reasonable price for the same work. We think the testimony was competent for that purpose. At any rate, the same question was elsewhere fully gone into without objection, and it was therefore in the record for all the purposes of the decision below.

[10] There are two other assignments under the present head. We will not give them special notice herein. Even if we were required to hold that they were technically erroneous, the testimony thereby sought to be brought out by one of said questions and the testimony excluded by the ruling as to the other were elsewhere permitted to go into the record without objection. The rulings therefore were harmless in their effect upon defendant's rights, assuming, but not deciding, that they involved error.

[11] Another question raised by the defendant here is that the award of damages was founded "upon a state of facts which the record does not support." The rule applicable to cases such as the one here is embraced within or declared by section 3300 of the Civil Code, as follows:

> "For the breach of an obligation arising from contract, the measure of damages, except where otherwise expressly provided by this code, is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom."

[12] It was practically stipulated by and between counsel, on the close of the taking of the testimony, that the rule as to the measure of damages in the instant case is that adopted by the court in its findings and as fixed by the above section of the Civil Code. It is, however, claimed that it was not shown that the sum at which the Bayer-Rothgeb

Company fixed the price of the work in its successful bid on the reletting of the contract constituted the reasonable value of the work to be performed. The testimony of all the witnesses for plaintiff clearly afforded the conclusion that the bid of the Bayer-Rothgeb Company involved a reasonable price for the performance of said work and furnishing the materials therefor. There was no substantial, if in reality any, testimony to the contrary. In Bacigalupi v. Phœnix Bldg., etc., Co., 14 Cal. App. 632, 112 P. 892, involving an action for damages for the abandonment before completion of a contract for the erection and construction of a building, the court, speaking to a similar question to the one now under consideration, stated the rule to be:

> "No witness testified in terms that the accepted bid was a reasonable price or represented the reasonable cost of completing the abandoned contract; but no objection was made to this evidence. No evidence was given that the reasonable cost of completing the building was less than what it actually cost plaintiffs to complete it, or that it could have been completed for any less amount. Under the circumstances the evidence was sufficient to prove the reasonable cost. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary it tended to prove the reasonable cost. The actual cost is some evidence of the value or reasonable cost."

See, also, Angell v. Hopkins, 79 Cal. 181, 21 P. 729; Bunting v. Salz, 3 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 193, 22 P. 1132; Greenebaum v. Taylor, 102 Cal. 624, 36 P. 957; Levy v. Scott, 115 Cal. 39, 46 P. 892; Dunne Invest. Co. v. Empire State Surety Co., 27 Cal. App. 208, 150 P. 405, 411; Wallace v. Ah Sam, 71 Cal. 197, 12 P. 46, 60 Am. Rep. 534.

As stated, there is in the record substantial evidence to support the findings as to the damage sustained by reason of defendant's refusal to carry out his contract and that the cost to plaintiff for having the work called for by said contract performed represented the reasonable value or price of said work as performed by the Bayer-Rothgeb Company under its later bid.

The judgment is affirmed.

90 Cal. App. 390

MILES et al. v. ROSENTHAL et al.★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 26, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 24, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑502(6)—Record should show that motion for new trial was duly presented and decided.

The record itself should show that appellants' motion for new trial was duly presented to, and passed on and decided by, trial court.

2. Appeal and error 🔑768—Record may be treated as disclosing presentation and denial of motion for new trial, where not denied in appellees' brief.

Where counsel for appellees did not deny in his brief that a motion for new trial was presented to, and denied by, trial court, which was not shown by record, appellate court may assume such facts and treat record as so disclosing.

3. Appeal and error 🔑782—Appeal from order denying new trial must be dismissed; points arising being reviewable on appeal from judgment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 956, 963).

No appeal being authorized from order denying motion for new trial, appeal therefrom must be dismissed under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, points arising from grounds on which such motion may be made being reviewable on appeal from judgment under section 956.

4. Appeal and error 🔑731(5)—Specification, undoubtedly intended to raise question of sufficiency of evidence, in bill of exceptions certified by trial judge as containing all evidence, will be treated as sufficient.

Specification in bill of exceptions that "verdict is unsupported by the evidence to prove the truth of the charge," referring to misconduct with which defendants in libel suit charged plaintiffs, will be treated as sufficient to justify examination of evidence to determine its sufficiency to support verdict for defendants, though awkwardly expressed, in view of undoubted purpose of raising such question and trial judge's certificate that bill contains full and correct statement of all evidence, which is not voluminous.

5. Libel and slander 🔑112(3)—Evidence in libel suit held to support verdict for defendants on issue of truth (Civ. Code, § 45).

In libel suit under Civ. Code, § 45, between firms of real estate brokers, oral evidence, letter filed with realty board by defendants, and latters' complaint in prior suit against plaintiffs, held to support verdict for defendants on issue as to truth of defendants' charges.

6. Libel and slander 🔑112(2)—Evidence in libel suit held to support finding that publication of charges was without malice (Civ. Code, § 45, and § 47, subd. 3).

In libel suit under Civ. Code, § 45, evidence held to support jury's finding that publication of defendants' charges against plaintiffs by letter filed with city realty board was without malice, within section 47, subd. 3, but made in good faith under honest belief that charge was true.

7. Appeal and error 🔑916(3)—Appellate court may presume that answer to complaint, introduced in evidence, properly denied all material averments.

Appellate court may presume that answer, not in transcript, to complaint in former action against plaintiffs by defendants, who introduced complaint in evidence, properly denied material averments of complaint or tendered an issue on all material facts.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

8. Evidence 🔑271(18), 318(1)—Answer to complaint, attached to charge filed with realty board, and introduced as evidence in defendants' libel suit, held inadmissible as hearsay and self-serving.

Answer to complaint, attached to written charge filed by plaintiffs against defendants with realty board, and introduced in evidence by plaintiffs in defendants' subsequent suit for libel, held inadmissible as hearsay and self-serving.

9. Evidence 🔑155(8)—Complaint attached to, and explaining, written charge against defendants, held admissible in libel suit (Code Civ. Proc. § 1854).

Complaint attached to, and more fully explaining, written charge filed against defendants by plaintiffs before realty board, held admissible, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1854, in defendants' subsequent libel suit.

10. Evidence 🔑155(8)—Complaint, introduced as evidence in libel suit, may be considered as disproving malice in filing charge, based on facts alleged (Code Civ. Proc. § 1854).

Real estate brokers' complaint, admitted as evidence under Code Civ. Proc. § 1854, in defendant brokers' subsequent libel suit, could be considered by jury for any competent purpose, as to show that defendants' filing of charge, based on facts alleged, with realty board, was inspired, not by malice, but by conviction of duty to board as member, in honest belief that plaintiffs had committed act of such turpitude as to justify their expulsion or suspension as members.

11. Evidence 🔑332(3)—Answer to complaint held inadmissible in defendants' libel suit as showing only that plaintiffs tendered issue of falsity of charge based on facts alleged.

In real estate brokers' libel suit against other such brokers, answer to complaint in former action against plaintiffs by defendants, who introduced it in evidence to show that filing of charge, based on facts alleged, with realty board, was not inspired by malice, was not competent for any purpose, as it could only show that plaintiffs tendered issue whether charge was true or false in former action.

12. Libel and slander 🔑124(8)—Complaint in libel suit held to warrant instruction limiting jury to consideration of injury to plaintiffs' business.

In real estate brokers' action against other such brokers for libel, complaint alleging that charge published by defendants injured plaintiffs' firm in its business and reputation held to charge injury to good name and reputation of copartnership as business concern, so as to warrant instruction limiting jury to consideration of injury to plaintiffs' business as distinguished from any damage to them individually.

13. Trial 🔑253(3)—Instruction that plaintiffs claimed that libel injured them in their occupation held not to limit jury to consideration of injury to their copartnership business (Civ. Code, § 45).

Instruction that real estate brokers' action against other such brokers for libel was brought under last clause of Civ. Code, § 45, "the claim being that the alleged libel has a tendency to injure the plaintiffs in their occupation," held not to limit jury to consideration of injury to plaintiffs' business, without regard to any damage to them individually; its meaning being that plaintiffs relied on damage to copartnership as business concern through any damage to personal reputation of individual members.

14. Libel and slander 🔑50—Falsity of charge which was qualifiedly privileged was immaterial, if made without malice, in good faith, reasonably believing it to be true (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3).

In real estate brokers' action against other such brokers for libel in charge filed with realty board, instruction that, if communication was privileged within Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, falsity of charge therein was immaterial, if made without malice, in good faith, believing it true, on reasonable grounds, and that verdict should be for defendants, if they honestly believed charge to be true, held not erroneous; publication being qualifiedly privileged.

15. Libel and slander 🔑93—Defendant need only plead that qualifiedly privileged publication was made without malice.

In action for libel in qualifiedly privileged publication, defendant need only plead that publication or communication was made without malice.

16. Libel and slander 🔑101(1)—Defendants, alleging that publication was without malice, assumed burden of proving such fact.

Defendants, pleading that alleged libelous publication was made without malice, assumed the burden of proving such fact.

17. Libel and slander 🔑101(4)—Defendants, alleging truth of charge, held required to prove only their honest, good-faith belief.

Defendants, pleading in justification of alleged libelous publication that charge was true, held required to prove only that they honestly and in good faith believed it to be true.

18. Libel and slander 🔑124(2)—Instruction that burden is on plaintiffs in libel suit to show that communication was not privileged, and that charges were false and malicious, held erroneous, where answer affirmatively alleged contrary.

In real estate brokers' action against other such brokers for libel in charge filed with realty board, instruction that burden is on plaintiffs to show that communication was not privileged, and that charges therein were false and made with malice, held erroneous, where answer alleged that communication was privileged, and that charge was true and published without malice.

19. Appeal and error 🔑1064(1)—Instruction that plaintiffs must show that communication was not privileged, and that charges were false and malicious, held not reversible error, where evidence showed truth and want of malice as matter of law.

In real estate brokers' action against other such brokers for libel in charge filed with realty board, instruction that burden is on plaintiffs to show that communication was not privileged, and that charges therein were false and malicious, held not reversible error, though answer affirmatively alleged privilege, truth, and want of malice, where evidence showed, as matter of law, that charge was true and made without malice.

20. Libel and slander 🔑5—Performance of lawful act in proper way, pursuant to inexorable duty, affords no inference of malice.

The performance of a lawful act in a proper way in pursance of a duty inexorably required, as by real estate brokers in filing charge against other such brokers with realty board, as was their duty as members of such board, affords no inference of malice.

21. Libel and slander 🔑101(4)—Malice is not inferred from qualifiedly privileged communication or publication (Civ. Code, § 48).

In cases of qualified privilege, as in real estate brokers' filing of charges against other such brokers with realty board, of which both were members, malice is not inferred from the communication or publication, under Civ. Code, § 48.

22. Libel and slander 🔑124(7)—Instruction that plea of justification is not sustained, unless evidence tends to prove every element essential to truth of charge, held properly disallowed.

In libel suit, instruction that defendants' plea of justification is not sustained, unless evidence tends to prove every element essential to truth of charge, and that evidence not convincing jury of truth thereof cannot be considered as tending to mitigate plaintiffs' damage, held properly disallowed as not stating true rule.

23. Appeal and error 🔑1033(5)—Instruction on presumption of malice from proof of publication of false, unprivileged matter was harmless to plaintiffs, where communication was privileged.

In real estate brokers' action against other such brokers for libel in charge filed with realty board, instruction on presumption of malice from proof of publication of false and unprivileged matter was harmless to plaintiffs; communication being privileged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by F. S. Miles and another, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Miles & Fitzhenry, against Bernard Rosenthal and others, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Rosenthal Realty Company, and another. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Appeal from order dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

Arnold Praeger, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Samuel A. Miller, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HART, J. This action was brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for an alleged libelous writing published by the latter concerning the former and involving an attack upon their character and reputation as real estate brokers.

The questions of fact were tried by a jury, who found for the defendants. The appeal is from the judgment and from a purported order denying plaintiffs a new trial.

[1-3] The defendants first protest that the record does not show that a motion for a new trial was presented to and determined by the court below; hence "there is no appeal here from an order denying a new trial." As to this, all that the record itself discloses is that the defendants gave notice of intention to move for a new trial, and a notice that, on the 11th day of December, 1924, they "will move the court" to vacate and set aside the verdict of the jury and the judgment thereon entered. There is, however, nothing in the record to show that a motion for a new trial was ever presented to the trial court, or that said court ever passed upon or decided or made an order denying such a motion. In their opening brief, counsel for plaintiffs assert that "in due time a motion for a new trial was made on the grounds set forth in the motion of intention, and within the time allowed by law said motion was heard by the court and denied," and that no denial of said statement is made by counsel for the defendants in their brief. The record itself should, of course, show that the motion was duly presented to, and passed upon and decided by, the court. We may, upon the consideration that counsel for defendants did not deny in his brief that a motion for a new trial was presented to, and denied by, the court, assume that, in point of fact, such motion was made and denied, and that the record may be treated as so disclosing. There is, however, no appeal authorized from an order denying a motion for a new trial, and the appeal from such order here will therefore have to be dismissed. Code Civ. Proc. § 963. The points growing out of the grounds upon which a motion for a new trial may be made, where such motion is made and denied, may be reviewed upon the appeal from the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 956; Wiley B. Allen Co. v. Wood, 32 Cal. App. 76, 79, 162 P. 121.

[4] It is further preliminarily objected by the defendants that the question of the sufficiency of the evidence cannot here be reviewed, for the asserted reason that plaintiffs have not specified in the bill of exceptions "the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient." The "specifications of error" set forth in the bill of exceptions, with the exception of one, are addressed entirely to an alleged error in the ruling of the court excluding certain evidence offered by the plaintiff and alleged errors in embracing within its charge to the jury certain instructions proposed by the defendants, and excluding therefrom certain instructions proposed by plaintiffs. The specification involving the exception referred to is to the effect that "the verdict is unsupported by the evidence to prove the truth of the charge," referring to the alleged misconduct with which the defendants charged the plaintiffs and upon which this action is based. The specification is certainly awkwardly expressed, but we shall assume that it is sufficient to justify a review of the testimony to determine whether it is sufficient to support the verdict; the purpose of the specification undoubtedly being to raise that question. Besides, the trial judge has certified that the bill of exceptions contains "a full, true, and correct statement of all of the evidence admitted at the trial of the above-entitled action, and the papers used on the motion for a new trial," and, as the evidence is not voluminous, we will treat the specification sufficient in all respects to justify an examination of the evidence with the view of determining whether the decision below is bottomed by sufficient evidentiary support.

[5] The record discloses that both the plaintiffs and the defendants were, prior to and at the time of the commencement of this action, duly licensed real estate brokers, in the city of Los Angeles, and, as the entitlement of the complaint declares, each was organized for that purpose as a copartnership. It appears that, prior to and at the time of the institution of this action, there existed and was maintained, in the city of Los Angeles, as its principal place of business, a corporation, duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, under the name of the "Los Angeles Realty Board, Incorporated," and that the plaintiffs and the defendants were members thereof. The object of said realty board and the purpose for which it was formed are set forth in article II of its constitution and by-laws, as follows:

> "To secure for its members the benefit of united effort and concentrated power, to the end that the evils and annoyances connected with the transaction of business in real estate and real estate brokerage, shall be abated; to promote good-fellowship and fair-dealing in such business; to protect its members and the public in general from irresponsible, unprincipled and dishonest dealers in real estate; to promote the enactment of legislation for the protection of property rights and the dealings pertaining thereto; and to do all else in the power of the association and its members, which may tend to the upbuilding, and stability and the dignity of the business of dealing in real estate. This corporation is not organized for pecuniary profit."

Article IV of the by-laws provides that complaints against members of the board shall be in writing, "upon the regular form provided by the board," and delivered to the secretary thereof. Said article further provides that when a member is "complained against," he shall immediately be furnished with a copy thereof, and within ten days therefrom shall, in writing, answer the charge set forth therein. It is also provided that no member shall be dismissed from membership of said board without "first having the opportunity of appearing before the arbitration committee or the board of governors and being heard in self-defense." Article IV proceeds:

> "All complaints and defenses thereto shall be immediately submitted to the arbitration committee—such committee will promptly analyze each complaint, have power to subpœna principals and witnesses, and their findings shall be final, subject only to review by the board of governors. Should either party to a complaint be dissatisfied with the findings of the arbitration committee such aggrieved party may upon payment of a fee of $25 have his case reviewed by the board of governors in regular or special session.
> "Findings of the arbitration committee shall be promptly reported to the board of governors, in writing, and shall set forth clearly and concisely the allegation—the defense—and the finding of the committee."

It appears that, on the 31st day of December, 1923, the defendants instituted an action in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles against the plaintiffs to recover the sum of $5,000, which, it was alleged in the complaint in said action, was obtained by the plaintiffs in a real estate transaction to which the former and the latter were parties under circumstances which it was charged in the complaint in that action involved fraudulent conduct upon the part of the plaintiffs. Certain of the allegations of the complaint filed in said action by the defendants here (as plaintiffs therein) against the plaintiffs here (as defendants therein) involved the alleged libelous statements of and concerning the plaintiffs herein of which they here complain. The complaint in said action is too lengthy in its statement of the case to justify reproducing herein, only in substance, the allegations thereof which are important in their relation to the case at bar. It will suffice, for the purposes of the decision here, to explain generally and briefly such allegations. It is therein alleged that the plaintiffs and one J. M. Hardman, on the 11th day of October, 1923, entered into an exclusive option agreement with one Curry, by the terms of which Miles & Fitzhenry (plaintiffs here) and said Hardman were to have and receive an option from said Curry for the sale of a certain lease for the price of $95,000 net to the said Curry; that said agreement expressly provided that Miles & Fitzhenry and Hardman were to receive no commission on the sale of said lease. The terms and conditions of the payments on the purchase price of said lease were prescribed by said option agreement, and the option was to expire on October 22, 1923, but before said date the time for the expiration of said agreement was, on the same terms and conditions, extended to and including November 6, 1923. Between the date of the execution of said agreement and the 6th day of November, 1923, said Hardman proposed to Bernard Rosenthal, a member of the defendant copartnership herein, that his firm purchase an interest in said option agreement, and, after negotiations between Hardman and the defendants here regarding the proposition so made by Hardman, said defendants, on the 31st day of October, 1923, entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs whereby the former agreed to, and finally did, purchase the interest of plaintiffs here in said exclusive option agreement for the sum of $4,000, which sum the defendants here then paid to plaintiffs here. The Rosenthals thereupon became the owner of the half interest of Miles & Fitzhenry in said agreement; Hardman being the owner of the other half interest. On October 31, 1923—the day on which the defendants here purchased and paid for the half interest of the plaintiffs here in said option, and about six hours subsequently to such purchase and payment—the plaintiffs and said Hardman approached said Curry, and stated to the latter that it was impossible for them to sell said lease for the sum of $95,000 net to him (Curry), and at the same time said to the latter that they (said plaintiffs and Hardman) had a purchaser who would purchase said lease for $95,000, "and (quoting from the complaint in said action) that they would proceed to sell the lease to said prospective purchaser if the said W. E. Curry would agree to pay to them the sum of $5,000 as a commission for services rendered in the sale of said lease; that in truth and in fact the said lease had already been sold to the plaintiffs herein at least five or six hours prior to the making by these defendants of said representations to the said W. E. Curry, and that the said plaintiffs herein assumed and agreed to perform all the terms and conditions of said option agreement of October 11, 1923, and that as a result of the agreement to assume and carry out the terms and conditions of said option agreement of October 11, 1923, and further by reason of their having paid to the defendants, Miles & Fitzhenry, the sum of $4,000, the plaintiffs became entitled both as agents and as purchasers of said option agreement to any and all sums of money to be paid to the defendants herein by reason of said transaction. Upon information and belief plaintiff alleges that, for the further purpose of misleading the plaintiffs herein, and said W. E. Curry, the defendants Miles & Fitzhenry had it appear that the defendant Edward J. Peil had rendered services in effecting the sale of said lease, and therefore authorized the payment by said W. E. Curry to said Edward J. Peil of said sum of $5,000 as commission; that, however, said Edward J. Peil has rendered no services in connection with this transaction; that upon information and belief the plaintiffs further allege that the defendant Edward J. Peil is now, and was at all times herein mentioned, employed in the office of the defendant Miles & Fitzhenry as their agent; that prior to the filing of this cause of action, and to wit, on or about the 21st day of December, 1923, the plaintiffs purchased of and from the defendant James M. Hardman his interest in and to said option agreement of October 11, 1923, and extensions to November 6 and of October 31, 1923, and is now the owner and holder of said option agreement and is entitled to all benefits and proceeds thereof; that the plaintiffs herein have paid into escrow the sums of money set out in the option agreement of October 11, 1923, and the extension thereof dated October 31, 1923, and have carried out all the terms and conditions on their part to be performed."

The complaint in the present case alleges, among other things:

"That on or about the 4th day of January, 1924, the defendants herein willfully, intentionally, and maliciously wrote and published a certain letter concerning the plaintiffs herein, which said letter is in words and figures as follows, to wit:

" 'January 4, 1924.

" 'Los Angeles Realty Board, City—Gentlemen:

" 'Complaint against Miles & Fitzhenry.

" 'Misrepresentation and subterfuge in the sale and transfer in a certain leasehold located on Cahuenga avenue between Hollywood and Sunset boulevard.

" 'Endeavor to collect from both sides without the knowledge of both.

" '(See attached legal instrument.)

" 'Rosenthal Realty Co.

" 'By Bernard Rosenthal.'

"That said letter was delivered to the said Los Angeles Realty Board and was read by divers persons.

"That, by the publication of said words and language as aforesaid, the defendants intended to, and did, charge and assert, and to be understood as charging and asserting, and by the readers of said letter in fact was understood as charging and asserting, that the plaintiffs had been dishonest and corrupt in their dealings, and had been guilty of a breach of the Real Estate Brokers Act of the state of California, chapter 51 of the Laws of 1923, approved April 27, 1923.

"That said charge as made and published by the defendants and as understood by the persons reading said letter, and by the defendants intended to be so understood, was and is false, malicious, and unprivileged, and did and does expose the plaintiffs to hatred, contempt, and obloquy by imputing to them a dishonest and disreputable course of conduct in their said business. That said charge published by defendants as aforesaid was maliciously made, and was intended to defame said firm and injure it in its business and reputation.

"That, by reason of the publication aforesaid, the business of the plaintiffs was injured, and the reputation of said business defamed and damaged, in the sum of $50,000."

The answer of the defendants to the said complaint admits that on the date stated in paragraph 3 of the last-mentioned pleading defendants wrote the letter, in said paragraph referred to, "addressed to the Los Angeles Realty Board, a copy of which is set out in the complaint, but deny that they wrote and (or) published the same willfully and (or) maliciously"; admits that said letter was delivered to said Los Angeles Realty Board; and avers that it was written and delivered to said board in the discharge of the duty of defendants "to the general public and other persons engaged in the business of buying and selling real property in the city of Los Angeles and throughout the state of California, and as a privileged communication." The answer (paragraph 4) specifically sets up the defense that the letter as set out in paragraph 3 of the complaint was written and delivered by the defendants to said realty board "as a privileged communication."

As a separate and special defense, the defendants allege that both they and the plaintiffs are members of the realty board above mentioned, set forth certain provisions of the constitution and by-laws thereof, which provisions are hereinabove, in substance, presented, and proceed further to allege that it was in pursuance of their duty as members of said board, as prescribed by said constitution and by-laws, "and for no other reason," that they (defendants) delivered to the secretary of said board the letter hereinabove set forth. It is in said answer further alleged that said letter and the complaint contained therein against the plaintiffs were so filed and delivered without malice, and that "the same was and is a privileged communication." As "a further and separate defense," the answer alleges:

"That the charge against the said plaintiffs contained in the said letter of January 4th, 1924, written by these defendants, and delivered to the said Los Angeles Realty Board, was and is true, and said letter was written and delivered without malice, and as a privileged communication."

The plaintiffs' action is, of course, founded on section 45 of the Civil Code which provides:

"Libel is a false and unprivileged publication by writing, printing, picture, effigy, or other fixed representation to the eye, which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation."

The defendants, as has been shown, pleaded that the letter filed with the realty board was and is a privileged communication, and that the same was made in the manner indicated without malice. Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3. So much of said section as directly concerns the present consideration defines, in part, a privileged publication to be one made "in a communication, without malice, to a person interested therein, by one who is also interested, or by one who stands in such relation to the person interested as to afford a reasonable ground for supposing the motive for the communication innocent, or who is requested by the person interested to give the information."

We have reproduced hereinabove copious quotations from the complaint, a copy of which, as seen, was attached to the written charge of misconduct filed before the realty board by the defendants against the plaintiffs. That pleading, or a copy thereof, was undoubtedly so filed for the purpose of amplifying or explaining the charge made against the plaintiffs. The allegations of said complaint are also important in their bearing upon the ruling of the trial court in excluding certain evidence offered by the plaintiffs, and to which ruling attention at the appropriate place herein will be given.

The evidence, both oral and documentary, conclusively supports the verdict. The fact that the plaintiffs held an option on the Curry lease and the fact that they sold said option to the defendants for the consideration of $4,000 are not denied. There is ample proof from which the jury, believing such proof as presumptively they did, were justified in finding, as impliedly they did so find, that the plaintiffs, within a brief time after selling to defendants their right of option to purchase said lease, procured from Curry an agreement to the effect that they could and would sell the lease to a prospective buyer for the sum of $95,000, provided he would pay them (plaintiffs) the sum of $5,000 for consummating such sale. As to this agreement, it should be stated that it was in writing, and ostensibly was made with one Edward J. Peil, who, however, the evidence without conflict shows, was an employee of the plaintiffs at the time of its execution. The agreement was signed by Curry, and beneath his signature were these indorsements and in the order here given:

"Witness: Edward J. Peil.
"Accepted: C. Albert Fitzhenry."

At the time of the execution of the above agreement, Fitzhenry, Miles, Peil, and Hardman were present, and witnessed and took part in the transaction. Curry, testifying as a witness for the defendants, declared that he was not on that, or any other occasion, told either by Fitzhenry, Miles, Hardman, or Peil that the plaintiffs had sold their option to purchase the lease to the defendants. And, notwithstanding that both Fitzhenry and Hardman, the latter (so the evidence shows) operating conjointly with the plaintiffs in the several transactions, were called to the witness stand by the plaintiffs and questioned concerning certain phases of the transaction, were not asked a single question by their attorney relative to this latter transaction with Curry. Indeed, counsel for plaintiffs so restricted the examination in chief of those witnesses that counsel for defendants, as the trial court properly held, could not competently inquire into the facts of said transaction on cross-examination. Nor was there offered by the plaintiffs any testimony regarding said transaction or any attempt made by them to make the transaction accord or appear to accord with the proper conception of fair dealing on the part of the plaintiffs in the transaction. From these circumstances and those characterizing the transaction itself, the jury were warranted in concluding as their verdict implies that they did conclude, that the said transaction could not be explained by the plaintiffs consistently with those ethical considerations which should be the ruling force behind all business transactions between man and man, and which, as the evidence shows, it is the cardinal purpose of the realty board of the city of Los Angeles, to which both parties to this action belong, to inculcate in and require of its members that they, as real estate brokers, carry into all their transactions with any of the public with whom thus they have dealings.

[6] That there is testimony from which the jury were legally authorized to infer and definitely conclude that the publication of the communication in the manner indicated was without malice on the part of the defendants, but that it was made in good faith and under an honest belief that the charge against the plaintiffs therein contained was true, an impartial reading of the record evidence will leave no room for doubt. The plaintiffs, upon applying for membership in the realty board, referred said board to the defendants as vouchers of the fitness of the plaintiffs for membership of the organization, and were, by the defendants, strongly recommended to that organization as in all respects eligible to be received as such members. This circumstance is important, in that it constitutes conclusive proof of the fact that, prior to the happening of the transactions involved herein, the personal relations between the plaintiffs and the defendants were of an amicable character; that, in other words, prior to the time mentioned, there did not exist between them that feeling of personal hostility which often arises between individuals that are rivals in the prosecution of the same kind of business enterprises. Again, the fact that the defendants instituted an action against the plaintiffs to recover the $5,000 which Curry agreed to pay them as a commission for selling the lease is itself a circumstance tending strongly to show that, rather than being actuated by malice in complaining of the plaintiffs to the realty board, the defendants honestly believed that the plaintiffs had in the transaction committed a wrong, and thus had violated the very first of the objects to promote and maintain which the realty board had been organized and was being maintained. So believing, and having reasonable grounds for such belief, it was the duty of the defendants, as members of the realty board, to complain to said board of the conduct of the plaintiffs in the transaction and to file with the board a complaint in writing setting forth the nature of the charge. In this connection, it should be stated that Bernard Rosenthal, a member of the copartnership defendant, testified that he first went to the secretary of the realty board and verbally complained of the conduct of plaintiffs in the transactions, but was told by said secretary to put his charge in writing, as the bylaws of the organization required, and that thereupon he filed with the board a copy of the complaint in the action of defendants against the plaintiffs to recover the $5,000 referred to, charging against the latter the alleged misconduct in the transactions involved herein. Moreover, Bernard and Joseph Rosenthal each testified that, at the time of filing the charge against plaintiffs with said board, he bore no malice against the plaintiffs or any of them, and that he "bore none now."

The plaintiffs introduced testimony to the effect that, in a conversation over the telephone with Hardman, after the discovery by the defendants of the $5,000 transaction between Curry and (ostensibly) Peil, Bernard Rosenthal referred to the defendants as "crooks," and threatened that he "would get them." It was further shown that one of the Rosenthals made complaint of the transaction to certain members of the Masonic Lodge in which Miles, of the plaintiff copartnership, was then progressing through the degrees, with the purpose, obviously, of preventing Miles from proceeding further in the matriculation of his membership of that body. Miles himself was present when the charge was made to the Masonic members. These circumstances were offered, of course, upon the assumption that they tended to show that the defendants nourished a malicious feeling towards the plaintiffs, growing out of the transactions involved herein. These circumstances are not necessarily inconsistent with the defense interposed by the defendants that the charge filed with the realty board was true, or with the further defense that the communication was privileged and published without malice. With regard to the part Peil took in the $5,000 transaction with Curry, it is well to note that the plaintiffs did not deny or attempt to contradict the testimony that he (Peil) was in their employ at the time that transaction occurred, and that it was carried on and completed in the presence of Fitzhenry, Miles, and Hardman. Peil himself was not called as a witness, and no explanation essayed of why he was not. The jury could well have concluded from the circumstances attending that transaction, which took place shortly after the plaintiffs had sold their interest in the option to defendants, that Peil, in said transaction, was not acting for himself but for the plaintiffs, and that they used him therein as a mere makeshift to conceal, if thus it could be done, any malversation on their part in the deal.

Further consideration herein of the evidence is not required. It is enough to say that the evidence upon all the essential issues submitted by the pleadings, as well as those worked in by the proofs, is such as to absolutely forbid interference by a court of review with the result arrived at below, in so far as are concerned the evidentiary considerations of the record. We are well justified by the record in saying that, in the facts, this case, in so far as the transactions giving rise to it are concerned, finds a striking counterpart in the case of Tate v. Aitken, 5 Cal. App. 505, 512, 90 P. 836, as will be perceived on reading the opinion therein.

[7-11] The defendants introduced in evidence, under the sanction of the trial court, the complaint in their action against the plaintiffs for judgment for the $5,000 which Curry agreed to pay to them or (ostensibly) to Peil. It was, it will be kept in mind, a copy of said complaint which was attached to the complaint filed by defendants with the realty board against the plaintiffs. The latter thereafter offered in evidence the answer to said complaint, and the court sustained an objection by the defendants to the admission thereof, on the ground that the answer did not constitute competent evidence, in that it was self-serving. Said answer is not in the transcript here, but it may be presumed that it properly denied the material averments of the complaint, or tendered an issue upon the material facts. In any event, however, we agree with the trial court that said answer would be and was, as to the instant case, hearsay and self-serving. But the complaint, being a part of the written charge filed against the plaintiffs before the realty board, and, as above stated, explanatory, in a more amplified form, of the charge than was the brief written charge itself, was admissible under section 1854 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In that view, the answer to said complaint would not be admissible, since it in no way or sense bore any connection, certainly no direct connection, with the act of the defendants in preferring the charge against the plaintiffs before the realty board, and therefore it would not be admissible under the terms of the section of the Code just mentioned. The complaint in said action, being admissible and admitted under said section, became subject to consideration by the jury for any competent purpose which it might subserve in the determination of the issue which they were required to decide. It undoubtedly tends to show (and the jury had the legal right to consider that pleading on that question) that the filing of the charge against the plaintiffs with the realty board was inspired, not by malice, but by a conviction of duty they owed to said board, as members thereof, arising out of an honest belief that the plaintiffs, also members of said organization, had committed an act in a real estate transaction which was characterized by a degree of turpitude sufficient to justify either their expulsion or suspension as members of the board. In other words, the complaint in said action, being founded on precisely the same transaction and exactly the same facts as those constituting the basis of the charge filed with the realty board, became, upon its introduction into the record, competent evidence of no little potency in probative force that the defendants were not actuated by malice in making the complaint against the plaintiffs to the realty board. The effect of the answer to said complaint, presuming, as we may, that it denied each and every material averment of said complaint, would only be to tender in that action an issue upon the question whether the charge was true or false, and, obviously, all that said answer could accomplish here, if admitted in evidence in this case, would be to show that in the other action the plaintiffs here, as defendants there, had by answer tendered such issue, which would prove nothing material to the issues in this case or tend to do so. It certainly would not tend to prove in the present action that the defendants, in preferring the charge against the plaintiffs before the realty board, were prompted by malice. Said answer was not competent evidence for any purpose or for any reason in the case at bar.

charge filed with the realty board "did and does expose the plaintiffs to hatred, contempt, and obloquy by imputing to them a dishonest and disreputable course of conduct in their said business," still it is clear that, when that language of the complaint is read and considered in connection with other allegations of that pleading, the real essence or gravamen of their objection to the charge is that the effect of its publication was to injure and degrade the good name and reputation of the copartnership as a business concern. In confirmation of this conclusion, we need only to refer to the last sentence in paragraph 5 and also to the language of paragraph 6 of the complaint. The language of paragraph 5 particularly here referred to is hereinabove presented, as is also paragraph 6 of said pleading, which expressly alleges that the damage done by reason of said publication was to the business of the plaintiff corporation. But the instruction in effect necessarily embraces the proposition that it would be the duty of the jury to consider the damage, if any, done to the personal character and reputation of the members of the copartnership, for, obviously, only because of the damage or injury to the personal character and reputation of the members as real estate brokers could there be damage or injury done to the copartnership as an artificial entity, and an intelligent jury could not otherwise understand the instruction. What undoubtedly was meant to be stated in the instruction, and what the instruction rationally construed does say, was that the plaintiffs relied in this action upon the damage, if any, which resulted to the copartnership as a business concern, through any damage which had been done to the personal character and reputation of the individuals constituting the copartnership.

[14] It is next claimed that the court misdirected the jury in instructing them that, if they found that the communication in question was privileged within the meaning of subdivision 3 of section 47 of the Civil Code, the fact that such communication contained a false charge against the plaintiffs is immaterial, "provided you find that said charge was made by the defendants without malice, in good faith in their belief of its truth, and upon reasonable grounds for their belief, your verdict would be for the defendant." This instruction is not an erroneous statement of the law applicable to cases where the publication complained of comes within the rule, as does the case here, of qualified privilege. Snively v. Record Publishing Co., 185 Cal. 565, 198 P. 1. The same is to be said of another given instruction, of which complaint is made, to the effect that, even if the jury found that the charge was not true, the verdict should be for the defendants, if they found that the latter "honestly believed it to be true."

[15-21] The court instructed the jury that "the burden of proof is on the plaintiffs in this case to show that the communication by the defendants to the realty board complained of was not a privileged communication, and that the charges made therein against the plaintiffs were false and were made with malice." This instruction, say plaintiffs, involves a misstatement of the rule applicable in cases of the character of the one before us.

As seen, the answer herein alleges that the communication is privileged; that the charge therein made is true; and that it was published without malice. In Snively v. Record Pub. Co., supra, it is said that, even where the complaint does not allege that the charge against the plaintiffs was made and published with malice, if the defendants allege in their answer that "the publication was on a privileged occasion and was made without malice," they thus directly put in issue the question of actual malice; that in such case, as "actual malice was an essential part of that defense, it was necessary for the defendants to prove such absence in order to sustain this defense." In the instant case, as we have seen, the plaintiffs expressly charged that the communication was filed with the board with the purpose of maliciously injuring the plaintiffs. If the defendants had merely denied that the publication was made with malice, we would be inclined to the conclusion that the burden would be upon the plaintiffs to prove the existence or presence of malice in the publication; but, however that may be, the defendants went further than that—indeed, further than the law required them to go—for, as is lucidly pointed out by Mr. Justice Curtis, in the very recent case of Maher v. Devlin (Cal. Sup.) 263 P. 812, 819, all that is necessary in such a case as the present is to plead that the publication or communication was made without malice; whereas, the defendants here allege that the publication was privileged, that it was true, and made without malice. We are of the opinion that thus they assumed the burden of proving that the communication was made without malice, but that, notwithstanding that they pleaded in justification that the charge was true, all that they were required to prove in that particular was that they honestly and in good faith believed it to be true. Obviously, the allegation of the answer that the charge was true necessarily carried the statement that the defendants honestly believed it to be true. However, the instruction now being considered involved, under the circumstances of this case, an erroneous statement of the law; but the error so committed is not such as to require a reversal, for the reason that we are clearly justified in the conclusion at which we have arrived on a painstaking consideration of the record that it must be held, as a matter of law, that the evidence shows that the charge contained in the communication is true, and that it was made by the defendants without malice. We have hereinabove reviewed the evidence, and it speaks for itself on this proposition in no uncertain terms. It is not necessary here to recapitulate the evidence or the analysis thereof, which has already been given. We may, though, with no impropriety emphasize the proposition that, in filing the charge against the plaintiffs with the realty board, the defendants, honestly believing the same to be true, did only what it was their bounden duty to do as members of that organization. If they had failed or omitted to pursue that course, they would have been guilty of a flagrant violation of the obligations to which they subscribed when they were initiated into membership of said board, and for which they would have been subjected at the least to censure at the hands of that organization, and possibly to expulsion from further affiliation therewith. The performance of a lawful act in a proper way in pursuance of a duty inexorably required can afford no inference of malice in the performance of such act. To the contrary, the irresistible inference in such case is that such act was done or performed not only without malice, but in response to an imperative or binding duty or obligation. It may be added that, in cases of qualified privilege, to which class of cases the one at bar belongs, the rule is that malice is not inferred from the communication or publication. Civ. Code, § 48.

[22] It is claimed that it was error for the court to disallow a proposed instruction to the effect that the plea of justification by the defendants is not sustained, "unless in your judgment the evidence tends to prove every element essential to the truth of the charge implied to the plaintiffs. * * * And, if the evidence offered by defendants in support of their defense that the alleged defamatory matter is true falls short of convincing you that such charge is true, you cannot consider such evidence as tending to mitigate the plaintiffs' damage." From what has been said above, the foregoing instruction does not embrace a statement of the true rule.

[23] Plaintiffs' instruction No. 8 is not pertinent to the evidence in this case. We need not further consider it. The court's instruction on the subject of the presumption of malice following from the proof of the publication of false and unprivileged matter contains a correct statement of the rule in unprivileged cases, but was not pertinent to the issues herein. It was harmless in its effect upon the rights of the plaintiffs. Indeed, if anything, it was favorable, rather than unfavorable, to the plaintiffs.

JEWETT et al. v. ALBIN et al. (EKMAN et al., Interveners). (Civ. 6126.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 31, 1928.

1. New trial 🔑155—Power to hear motion for new trial within two months after service of notice of entry of judgment held not defeated by unsuccessful party's prior notice of intention to move for new trial (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 659, 660).

Power of trial court to hear motion for new trial within two months from service of notice of entry of judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 660, held not defeated, causing fatal delay in service of bill of exceptions, by giving of notice of intention to move for new trial by unsuccessful party prior to receiving notice of entry of judgment; time for giving notice of intention under section 659 not being involved.

2. Estoppel 🔑116—Proof of waiver must include proof of knowledge of underlying facts.

Proof of waiver must include proof of knowledge of the facts upon which waiver is based.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Findings contrary to undisputed evidence are sustainable only if evidence is insufficient as matter of law to support contrary findings.

Where findings are made contrary to undisputed evidence, they are supportable only in case the evidence offered is insufficient as a matter of law to support findings in favor of unsuccessful party.

4. Equity 🔑1—Court's discretion to grant or refuse equitable relief must be exercised in accordance with the evidence.

Discretion exercised by court in granting or withholding equitable relief is exercised in accordance with the evidence and on definite principles and precedents, and is not arbitrary or whimsical.

5. Injunction 🔑62(3)—Change of conditions due to presence of stores, garages, and apartment houses and lack of demand for residential property held to require withholding equitable relief to restrain violation of restrictive covenants.

Change of conditions in neighborhood of tract by construction of gas stations, stores, apartment houses, and rooming and boarding houses and want of demand for residential property held to require withholding of equitable relief sought to enjoin violation of restrictive covenants limiting use of property for residences for single families, since granting of an injunction would result in imposing unjust burdens on defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ralph H. Clock, Judge.

Action by Louisa Jewett and others against George H. Albin and others, wherein Rose A. Ekman and others intervened. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants and interveners appeal. Reversed.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Frank P. Doherty, A. C. Routhe, B. Zum Brunnen, Shepard Mitchell, and Leslie E. Clawson, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Tanner, Odell & Taft and Fred H. Taft, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. Before stating the facts of this case we will first consider respondents' motion to dismiss the appeal. This motion is based upon the claim that the proposed bill of exceptions was not presented in time and that the notice of appeal was not filed in time.

[1] The trial was had without a jury, and resulted in a judgment for plaintiffs, which was entered November 21, 1924. On November 24 respondents served on appellants a written notice "that the findings and judgment in favor of plaintiffs were signed and filed November 20, 1924. Appellants on December 1, 1924, served and filed their notice of intention to move for a new trial. On January 23, 1925, respondents served notice of entry of judgment. On March 17, 1925, the motion for a new trial was presented and denied. This was within two months from the service of the notice of entry of judgment on January 23, 1925, but much more than two months from November 24, 1919, when notice was given that findings and judgment had been filed. Thereafter, on March 27, within ten days after the order denying a new trial, notice of appeal was served and filed. On May 19, 1925, the proposed bill of exceptions was served upon respondents. It is not claimed that the proposed bill of exceptions was served too long after March 17, the day on which the motion for a new trial was actually denied, but that it, as well as the notice of appeal, should have been served and filed respectively within ten days and two months after notice of filing of judgment and findings November 24, 1924, or at least within that length of time after December 1, 1924, when notice of intention to move for a new trial was served and filed. It is claimed that the notice of intention was a waiver of notice of entry of judgment, and therefore the time within which the court had power under Code of Civil Procedure, § 660, to pass on the motion for a new trial commenced running at that time. The decisions are to the contrary, holding that the two months' period commences to run only from the time expressly stated in Code of Civil Procedure, § 660. Moore v. Strayer, 175 Cal. 171, 165 P. 530; Strehlow v. Mothorn, 197 Cal. 112, 239 P. 850; Hutton v. Chapman, 197 Cal. 288, 240 P. 764.

Respondents rely on Prothero v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 439, 238 P. 357, which holds that actual notice of entry of judgment starts running the ten days' time in which a notice of intention to move for a new trial must be made under Code of Civil Procedure, § 659. The question here raised, however, relates to the limitation of time on the power of the court to pass on a motion for a new trial as provided in Code of Civil Procedure, § 660, and not to the time within which the notice of intention to move for a new trial must be given under Code of Civil Procedure § 659. In Strehlow v. Mothorn, supra, a distinction is pointed out between a limitation upon the power of the court and a limitation upon the right of a party to move for a new trial. It should also be noticed that Code of Civil Procedure, § 660, says "after * * * service on the moving party of notice of the entry of the judgment," while section 659, Code of Civil Procedure, says "after receiving notice of the entry of the judgment." One may receive notice by obtaining knowledge without service, but is not served with notice by obtaining actual knowledge.

Respondents' points raised against the perfecting of the appeal are therefore not well taken.

The plaintiffs in this action, respondents here, obtained a permanent injunction against appellants based on building restrictions contained in deeds by which a tract of land called Westmoreland tract was originally conveyed to the several lot owners. The judgment decreed that all the restrictions were valid and subsisting and inured to the benefit of plaintiffs and all other lot owners in the tract. It enjoined all the defendants "from using any lot (in the tract) or the structures or buildings on said lots, as a rooming house or boarding house or apartment house, or for any business, calling, or occupation other than as a residence for a single family," and from violating any of said restrictions.

One of appellants' contentions which involves an interpretation of the restrictions is that whatever relief might be properly granted in equity against construction of an apartment house, its use as such was not actually prohibited by the restrictions and that the restrictions do not limit buildings to use of a single family. The restrictions follow:

> "(1) The property hereby conveyed shall be used for residence purposes exclusively and no building or structure pertaining to or for the conduct of business of any kind whatsoever shall ever be erected thereon.
> "(2) No residence of less than two full stories above the basement shall be erected or placed upon said premises, and no residence shall be erected or placed upon said premises that shall cost less than four thousand dollars ($4,000).
> "(3) The residence to be built * * * shall" —certain setback lines established, not involved here.
> "(4) Prescribes height of fences not involved here.
> "(5) No more than one residence shall ever be erected or placed," etc.
> "(6) No double or tenement houses or flats nor any kind of a residence except a residence designed for use as a single residence, shall ever be erected or placed upon the premises hereby conveyed.

"(7) No oil well, etc.

"Upon a breach of either or any one of the foregoing conditions, the title to said property hereby conveyed and to the whole thereof shall become at once divested from the second party herein, his heirs or assigns and shall revert to and revest in the parties of the first part, their heirs or assigns.

"It is further agreed by the parties hereto that the premises hereby conveyed are part of a tract intended to be used exclusively as a first class residence property, and it is agreed that the conditions hereinbefore recited are intended for and are for the benefit of the remainder of said tract and of the owners thereof, and that a breach of any one of said conditions may be enjoined or prevented by any person owning any property in the tract of which this a parcel."

Clark and Bryan opened the tract in 1903 or between 1901 and 1903, and deeds each containing the same conditions and restrictions were executed by them to the various purchasers of lots in the tract. The restrictions have no time limit. Defendants Albin eventually became the owners of lot No. 21, upon which was situated a dwelling house. In May, 1923, the defendants Albin obtained a building permit to rebuild the said residence into an eight-family apartment house, and, commencing on May 16, 1923, vigorously prosecuted the work. Their certificate of title obtained allowed it. The city zoning ordinance allowed it. A first mortgage was obtained for $28,000, and defendants proceeded to make improvements which are said to be valued at between $65,000 and $85,000. The Albins had also obtained a quitclaim deed to their lot No. 21 from the original owners, Clark and Bryan, conveying the reversionary interest described in the original deeds. On August 2, 1923, when the improvements had progressed to a point where the building was ready to receive the exterior coat of stucco, the several plaintiffs, who owned and occupied five lots in the tract, commenced this action against defendants Albin and against the owners of fourteen other lots in the tract who alleged to have threatened to or to have actually been violating the restrictions in one way or another. Before the judgment was obtained, defendants Albin had completed the improvements, at least as to outward appearances.

The complaint, besides the charges against the Albins, alleged that the owners of other designated lots threatened to conduct rooming and boarding houses; that an owner of another lot had permitted the running of a school for defective children and threatened to continue; and that another owner had conducted and threatened to continue to conduct an apartment house. As to those defendants who were alleged to have threatened, the evidence in the case showed that they had actually done the things alleged to have been threatened, although the court's findings only go as far as the allegations of the complaint. These violations set forth from the evidence are as follows:

Lot 16 owned by appellant Dudley: Used as a rooming house for two years at least.

Lot 15 owned by appellant Wyche: Used as a rooming house with signs advertising that fact displayed in front of it, for about three or four years.

Lot 12 owned by appellant Taylor: Used as a rooming house for two or three years, displays signs advertising that fact; was formerly used for certain church activities.

Lot 18 owned by appellant Ralphs: Used for several years as a school for feeble-minded children.

Lot 19 owned by appellant Poland: Apartment house operating for about three years.

Lots 24, 25 owned by appellant Walsh: Boarding and rooming house, 25 to 30 roomers and boarders.

Lot 53: Rents rooms.

Lot 63: Apartment house; sign advertising that fact displayed on premises.

Lot 62 owned by appellant Cain or by appellant Parlan: Used as an apartment house or rooming house; displays sign advertising this fact. Originally built 20 years ago as a double or duplex residence; for past 12 years used as a rooming house.

Lot 65 owned by Hamlin: Used as a rooming house.

Lot 90 owned by appellant Young: Rented to occasional roomers.

Lot 96 owned by appellant Halldin: Used as a boarding house; displays sign; formerly used as a fraternity house.

Appellants contend that the judgment grants to the plaintiffs greater rights than the deed restrictions provide. Numerous authorities are cited which hold that an apartment house is a building used for residence purposes exclusively, and it is argued that therefore the Albins' apartment house does not violate the clause in restriction No. 1, which states that the property conveyed "shall be used for residence purposes, exclusively." The only other clause in the deed which refers to use of a building as distinguished from the construction and erection of a building is that contained in the last paragraph of the deed which is not numbered nor referred to as a restriction but is in the form of an agreement as to the intention of the original parties. This clause states that the tract is "intended to be used exclusively as a first-class residence property." Authorities are also cited to the effect that this clause is not violated by an apartment house. Restriction No. 6 prohibits the erection of an apartment house or a residence not "designed for use as a single residence." Appellants urge that this clause does not prescribe the use to be made of a building after erected, especially if its outward appearance conforms to the building restriction; that such deed restrictions are strictly construed; and that the judgment here went further than is authorized by the deed in enjoining the use of the buildings of the Albins and of other defendants. It is specially urged on behalf of all the appellants that the injunction by limiting the use of the buildings of all of the defendants to "a residence for a single family" interpolated into the deed a condition which is not to be found therein.

The foregoing contentions affect differently the several defendants in this case. Their actions complained of include running of a boarding house, of an apartment house, renting rooms, conducting a school, erecting and occupying a duplex house, and erecting and using an apartment house. Most, but not all, of the buildings so used were originally designed and built for a single dwelling or residence. The contentions made, and above outlined, might be good as to some appellants and not to others because of the diversity of conditions affecting them.

[2] It is further contended that the plaintiffs have waived the benefits of the restrictions by their long acquiescence in the many violations of them over a period of years, without protest, and also that plaintiffs are guilty of laches, particularly with respect to the Albans in that building operations were openly and actively carried on under an apartment house permit, duly posted, for almost two months before any objection was raised, appellants in the meantime expending a large amount of money, some of which was lent by Brunnen, mortgagee, intervener and appellant. Some of the plaintiffs were called as witnesses at the trial by the defendants and examined in respect to the extent of their knowledge of the several violations of the restrictions which had been taken place in the tract and in respect to the erection of the Albin apartment house. But not all the plaintiffs were so examined, some of them did not appear at all at the trial. These points therefore would not be available to the appellants with equal force with respect to all of the plaintiffs, even though available as to those plaintiffs who appeared and were examined at the trial, unless it must be inferred from the nature of the various violations of the restrictions that plaintiffs knew of them. Proof of waiver must include proof of knowledge of the facts upon which the waiver is based.

In connection with their point of waiver, appellants contend that the trial court erred in making findings against their defense, that conditions in the neighborhood of the tract and in the tract itself had so changed during the 22 years which had elapsed since the opening of the tract of 1903 until the time of trial that a court of equity should not grant equitable relief to the plaintiffs. This defense is one which is available to all of the appellants and against all of the plaintiffs alike. It amounts to an attack upon the findings of the trial court.

[3] All of the evidence upon the issue of the changed conditions in the tract and in the neighborhood of the tract was offered by the defendants. The cross-examination of these witnesses did not materially qualify their evidence on this issue. No rebuttal on this issue was offered by the plaintiffs. The evidence on this issue is without conflict. The record therefore does not present a case of findings made upon conflicting evidence, but, on the other hand, the findings are supportable only in case the evidence offered is insufficient as a matter of law to support findings upon this issue in favor of the defendants.

The evidence in the transcript touching upon this point follows: The tract is bounded on the north by Tenth street, on the south by Eleventh street, and on the east by Hoover street. Three streets run north and south through the tract, being Elden avenue near the west followed by Magnolia avenue and Arapahoe street. The tract is comparatively small, being a strip 3½ blocks long containing 56 lots in all. It was stipulated that Tenth street, bounding the tract on the north, had been ordered widened by the city council, making it a 100-foot boulevard and a main traffic artery. Some of the plaintiffs were called as witnesses by the defendants. The testimony they gave related to the extent of their knowledge of the various violations of the building restrictions which had taken place in the tract and not to the point under discussion. This testimony contained some admissions of knowledge and some denials and testimony from which the inference might or might not be drawn that they had knowledge of these violations by their general knowlege gained in going to and from their homes and over the streets in the tract. One of these plaintiffs lived diagonally across the street from the Albins' lot.

The defendant Albin testified. He bought lot No. 21 in 1917. He narrated his negotiations leading up to the construction of the apartment house, his investigation of the title, his securing a loan, his visit to the building department of the city of Los Angeles, and his information that the district had been zoned under the city ordinance so as to permit apartment houses. He described the activities connected with the construction of the building in a way which was obviously intended by his counsel to establish the inference that the neighborhood well knew what the nature of the structure he was building was to be. He said he had made repeated efforts to sell the lot; that it apparently had no value. He estimated the value of the lot according to the tax receipt at $5,000, the value of the completed apartment house at $85,000, and stated the total incumbrances were $36,000. He described the several violations of the restrictions in the tract which are above set forth.

Witness Clark, one of the original subdividers of the tract, testified that he bought the property in 1901; that it was then a pasturage and the Los Angeles city limits then ended on the east side of Hoover street; that he subdivided other tracts which adjoined this tract both on the north and on the south side in about 1898 and in 1901. These tracts were originally used for residential purposes. One of them went into business about ten years afterwards.

Witness Walsh, one of the defendants, a real estate broker, testified that the only demand for lots in the tract for residential purposes was purely to move an old house on. He described the character of the surrounding neighborhood in adjacent tracts. He said Hoover street, beginning at Ninth street and down to Pico, is used for gas stations, stores, apartment houses, rooming houses, and boarding houses. Pico is entirely for business. Ninth and Hoover is a business center, with stores and garages. Pico from Hoover street straight through westward has old houses. East of Hoover street is used for stores for quite a distance and inside property for multiple dwelling houses, apartment houses, and flats. He further testified that the plan to make Tenth street a boulevard had the effect of discouraging people from owning single residences on account of pending assessments. He said the property on the south side of Eleventh street, known as the Lone Star tract, was used for apartment houses and flats. South of Eleventh street the Lone Star tract has eight or nine apartments and many flats. The Pico frontage is entirely used for stores and garages. North of Tenth and west of Hoover is used for flats, apartments, boarding houses, rooming houses and stores. He estimated the value of the Albins' apartment house at $60,000. From one side view and from the front view it did not appear to be an apartment house, but from another side looking down the driveway it could be seen that it was an apartment house from outward appearances. He also testified concerning some of the violations within this tract which are set forth hereinabove. He said the property to the north of the tract was not exclusively residential, that there were three art schools on Magnolia, and that there were two or three clubs, a good many boarding and rooming houses, and some houses remodeled for apartments. His own lots within the tract at the corner of Arapahoe and Tenth street were leased as a boarding house and had been so for about a year.

Witness Whatnall, director of city planning of the city of Los Angeles, testified that he had made a study of the neighborhood before the zoning ordinance was passed. Objection to much of his testimony was sustained. It related to the reasons and considerations which entered into the city planning and zoning ordinances. He stated, however, that the ordinance was based on the then existing uses in the vicinity. He described the Tenth street boulevard project as including other streets and extending from the city limits, Miles avenue east to the Country Club boulevard, thence easterly to the Los Angeles high school, practically from the east to the west side. The zoning ordinance, as he testified, zoned Tenth street as business and the remainder of the Westmoreland tract as for multiple dwellings.

Defendant Cain testified that he had owned lot 62 in the tract for 21 years, and that upon purchasing it he had erected a duplex or double residence, which had been occupied as separate apartments, one by his own family and one for his mother's family.

In Downs v. Kroeger, 200 Cal. 743, 254 P. 1101, the Supreme Court sustained the action of the trial court in withholding equitable relief against violations of deed restrictions upon the ground that changes in conditions occurring since the restrictions were created made the enforcement of such restrictions unjust and inequitable. Jackson v. Stevenson, 156 Mass. 496, 31 N. E. 691, 32 Am. St. Rep. 476; Trustees v. Thacher, 87 N. Y. 311, 41 Am. Rep. 365; McClure v. Leaycraft, 183 N. Y. 36, 75 N. E. 961, 5 Ann. Cas. 45, are therein cited and quoted with approval upon this doctrine. The doctrine is also recognized and stated in Miles v. Clark, 44 Cal. App. 539, 187 P. 167, and in Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) footnote under section 1295, and was applied in connection with abandonment and waiver in Los Angeles Terminal Land Co. v. Muir & S. P. R. R. Co., 136 Cal. 36, 68 P. 308.

The evidence in the instant case shows changed conditions in the neighborhood of the tract to even a greater extent than that reviewed in Downs v. Kroeger, supra, and in addition shows changed conditions in the tract itself. The tract is much smaller and therefore much less capable of maintaining singly its exclusive character. The period of time which has elapsed is much greater.

[4] The discretion which is exercised by a court in granting or withholding equitable relief is not an arbitrary or whimsical discretion, but is to be exercised in accordance with the evidence in the case and on definite principles and precedents. 21 Corp. Jur. 34; Johnson v. Poteet (Tex. Civ. App.) 279 S. W. 902. The evidence in the Downs Case called for the withholding of equitable relief, and therefore the evidence in this case, standing without conflict, entitled the plaintiff to the same treatment.

[5] The evidence here being uncontradicted, the findings should have been favorable to this defense. The testimony shows that, during the lapse of time since 1903, conditions have so changed, in the tract itself, on the opposite side of the streets bounding the tract and touching each block thereof on either two or three sides, and also in the neighborhood surrounding the tract, as to require the court to withhold equitable relief as unjust and burdensome out of proportion to any benefit that could be derived by the plaintiffs from the judgment. The restrictions are not limited in time, but are perpetual, and the property owners in this tract may be required to see their buildings decay with no definite knowledge of when the legal status of the neighborhood may change and therefore not knowing what character of improvements or repairs may profitably be made. They must either have relief in this action or some similar action at an uncertain time in the future, or must remain subject to the whim of the last property owner in the tract who shall concede that conditions have sufficiently changed to warrant an abandonment of the restrictions.

The conclusion we have arrived at upon this point requires a reversal of the judgment as to each of the appellants, and it is therefore unnecessary for us to decide the other points made and segregate and divide them as they might be found to be available and applicable to the several defendants as they might be grouped according to the diverse circumstances and facts affecting them.

We concur: STURTEVANT, J.; NOURSE, J.

FERBRACHE v. POTTER et al. (Civ. 6215.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 31, 1928.

1. Quieting title ⟹10(2)—Where deed of plaintiff's predecessor antedated that of defendants', and hence was superior, plaintiff could maintain action to quiet title (Code Civ. Proc. § 738).

Even though plaintiff, in action to quiet title, is not the legal owner of the property in dispute, where deed of plaintiff's predecessor antedates that of defendants' predecessor, deed of plaintiff's predecessor was superior, and, under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, action was maintainable to determine who had superior equity.

2. Boundaries ⟹48(8)—Acquiescence in fence held not to constitute agreement that it was boundary line, where evidence was insufficient to show that there was any uncertainty as to dividing line.

Evidence in action to quiet title held insufficient to support finding that dividing line between plaintiff and defendant was uncertain and that parties intended to locate true line between them, and hence mere acquiescence by plaintiff in existence of fence did not amount to an agreement that fence was an accepted boundary line.

3. Adverse possession ⟹89—Defendants held not to have acquired adverse possession by location of fence, where plaintiffs and not defendants paid taxes on land, including disputed area.

Where defendants in action to quiet title, and their predecessors paid taxes on 200 acres, amount called for in their deeds, without including any portion of disputed area, and plaintiff and his predecessors paid taxes on 565 acres, which must have included land in dispute, held that defendants did not have title by adverse possession by reason of location of a fence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action to quiet title by J. A. Ferbrache, substituted for Frank C. Staniford, trustee, against Stephanna Potter and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hugh K. McKevitt, of San Francisco, and Fry & Jenkins, of San Jose, for appellant.

C. L. Witten, of San Jose, and W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is the second appeal in this action. In the former appeal (Staniford v. Trombly, 181 Cal. 372, 186 P. 599) the court held that the evidence did not sustain the findings, that the findings that there had been a boundary agreement, and that plaintiff was estopped to deny defendants' title, or that defendants had acquired title by adverse possession, were not sustained. The judgment was reversed, and the action went back to the lower court to be retried. It was retried, and is now here on appeal from a judgment again entered in favor of defendants on the second trial.

When the action was tried the second time, it was tried upon the same pleadings of the first trial and upon the same points that had been made and presented upon that trial. The defendants continued to contend that a boundary line agreement had been made with respect to the lands in controversy; that plaintiff was estopped to controvert defendants' title to the property in controversy by virtue of the boundary line agreement and by virtue of long acquiescence in defendants' claim of title by adverse possession and by adverse possession. In addition to these claims, made on the former trial, the defendants sought in the second trial to establish their actual record title to the disputed area.

[1] Plaintiff and defendants own adjoining lands, plaintiff to the south and defendants to the north. The basis of plaintiff's contention is his deed, which fixes the north line of the land granted to him as the line from S5 to ¾-inch iron pipe (H Flag) and from S5 easterly to F1—¾-inch iron pipe is a point on the southerly line of the Solis rancho 80 ch. from S34—S5, ¾-inch iron pipe, and F34 are all fixed points, and S5 is a patent corner, a government mark.

The above is the description in the original deed from Moore to Matthis. Subsequently the same description is repeated in deeds from Matthis to Riddell, from Riddell to Riddell, from Riddell to Staniford, and from Staniford to plaintiff, and is fairly well authenticated and not controverted by any evidence in the chain of title, but is controverted by the deed from Moore to Gano.

On October 6, 1859, Moore conveyed to Gano the lands along the westerly or southerly side of the Solis rancho from point S7 a distance of 122 chains, which, according to McMillan's testimony and the findings, overlap the lands conveyed to Matthis on January 30, 1861, and afterwards conveyed to Riddell, plaintiff's predecessor. In other words, Moore conveyed to Gano lands he afterwards conveyed to Riddell's predecessor, according to the testimony and map of McMillan. This Gano's deed is in a distinctly different line of title. His land was afterwards sold under execution sale to one E. Auzerais and found its way afterwards into the hands of one A. J. McKerron under descriptions which merely referred to the Auzerais deed. The effect of the finding is to accept as binding the course and call of the Gano deed and to discard the course and call of the Matthis deed. The Gano deed is not in the line of plaintiff's title. Even if correct, it is a finding merely that plaintiff is not the owner of the disputed area. As a finding that defendant is the owner, it is without support, for, if Moore could not convey land which he had already conveyed to Gano in 1859 to Matthis (plaintiff's predecessor in interest), in 1861, he could not convey to Arthur (defendant's predecessor in interest) in 1867.

If we concede that Gano and his successors held the legal title to the land in dispute, or a part thereof—with which title, however, we are not concerned—still Matthis' deed antedates Arthur's deed and is therefore superior. "An action under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine adverse claims, or, as it is usually termed, an action to quiet title, may be maintained to determine which party has the superior equity." Tuffree v. Polhemus, 108 Cal. 670, 41 P. 806; Buchner v. Malloy, 155 Cal. 253, 100 P. 687.

This disposes of the only question presented on this appeal which was not urged on the former appeal. If, therefore, upon the retrial of the case there was not the additional evidence produced requisite to establish the agreed boundary line as claimed, that plaintiff was estopped by virtue of long acquiescence to controvert defendants' title, or that defendants have acquired title to the area in dispute by adverse possession, the judgment must again be reversed. On the other hand, if the necessary evidence was presented which was lacking in the former trial, the judgment should be affirmed.

Respondents in their brief do not contend that the evidence offered in the second trial on the question of estoppel differs from that introduced in the first trial, or that any additional evidence was presented to establish the claim of estoppel, which evidence the reviewing court on the former appeal held lacked the essential element of estoppel, namely, false statements or concealments; respondents contenting themselves with directing our attention to two points only—other than the new one discussed—namely, "agreement as to boundary line" and adverse possession.

[2] As to the question of an agreed boundary line, respondents set forth in their brief the testimony of George Arthur Trombly as supplying the necessary facts lacking in the former trial, and have directed our attention to no other testimony or evidence that the boundary line between the lands of the parties was uncertain and disputed and that the line claimed was agreed upon as the true boundary line. The testimony of George Arthur Trombly, set forth in respondents' brief, is as follows:

> "There was a fence there prior to the time the picket fence was built to keep my stock separate. It started up and passed close to tree 5 and run down to what is designated as the 'big rock.' There was the old fence that was marked between two places. That was put up to keep Riddell's stock out and Arthur's stock inside. It run from somewhere in the locality of tree 5 down to where it is marked here as the 'big rock,' and, after my father moved up onto the place, then they established the line through here."

Respondents further quote from the testimony of the same witness as additional evidence produced that a boundary line agreement had been entered into between the predecessors in interest of plaintiff and defendants as follows:

> "The picket fence was built about 1876 or 1878. I worked on a part of the fence myself. My father and a hired man, my brother and I built part of it, and an old German fellow that lived there, by the name of Ossity, built the rest of it for Mr. D. C. Riddell (predecessor in interest of appellant). The picket fence started from tree 5; I don't know how far it extended toward the southern boundary of the Solis rancho. I don't know the exact distance at the end of it, but it was a picket fence and partly a brush fence up to within 150 to 200 yards of the Solis and Las Animas grant. The brush fence was supposed to be straight with it where the picket fence is. The place where the brush fence ended was brush and rocks and heavy timber; too rough to build anything but a brush fence. It was supposed to be in a straight line with that fence and as a continuation of the other as I marked the line that is supposed to be here. I didn't help build it but I helped my father work on the fence, but the brush fence this man Ossity and his son and a hired man was the ones that did the work on it to the end of it."

With this addition to the evidence, the court found, as it did in the former trial, that the fence was not built upon an agreed boundary line to settle any dispute, uncertainty or controversy arising concerning the true dividing line, the court finding:

> "That at the time said fence was built, and also for some time before then, the stock owned by one or the other of said parties would wander or stray over the land of the other, causing annoyance or trouble both to the owner of the land and to the owner of the cattle, and that to prevent this annoyance or trouble Dewitt C. Riddell and Peter Trombly agreed to build a fence to prevent the straying of the stock, and that a certain line was agreed upon, upon which to erect this fence both by Dewitt C. Riddell and Peter Trombly, the former to build the south half of said fence and the latter to build the north half thereof, and that, agreeable to this arrangement, and in either the year 1876 or in the year 1877 or in the year 1878, the fence was built by said Dewitt C. Riddell and said Peter Trombly upon such line. Said fence was not built upon an agreed boundary line between the Riddell tract and the Trombly tract to settle any dispute, uncertainty, or controversy arising over or out of the true location of the dividing line between the said two tracts of land."

It is true that the court also found, as it did at the first trial:

> "That the true location of the boundary line between the Riddell tract and the Trombly tract was uncertain at the time the fence line was so located, and that said parties intended to locate the true line between them."

The finding that the fence was built to prevent the straying of stock from one tract to the other and was not built upon an agreed boundary line to settle any uncertainty arising over the true location of the dividing line is inconsistent and irreconcilable with the finding that the parties intended to locate the true line between them. "Where there are contradictory findings about matters material to the merits of the case, and the determination of which, one way or the other, is essential to the correctness of the judgment, there the judgment cannot stand. Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 459 (18 P. 872) 21 P. 11. No judgment can properly be entered when the court finds both for the plaintiff and the defendant on a material issue." Fanta, etc., v. Maddex (Cal. App.) 252 P. 630.

It is useless, however, to pursue this discussion further, as this question was determined on the former appeal and unless the evidence here quoted establishes the fact that the dividing line was uncertain and the parties erected the fence intending to locate the true dividing line between their respective tracts, this question must again be determined adversely to respondent. In the testimony of George Arthur Trombly, above quoted, all that has any bearing on the intention of the parties to establish the true dividing line is contained in the statement:

> "There was the old fence that was marked between two places. That was put up to keep Riddell's stock out and Arthur's stock inside. It run from somewhere in the locality of tree 5 down to where it is marked here as the 'big rock,' and, after my father moved up onto the place, then they established the line through here."

This evidence falls short of being sufficient on which to base a finding "that the parties intended to locate the true line between them," and does not add anything material on this question to the record presented on the former appeal; and, further, the finding that "said fence was not built upon an agreed boundary line between the Riddell tract and the Trombly tract to settle any dispute, uncertainty, or controversy arising over or out of the true location of the dividing line between the said two tracts of land" is supported here, as it was in the former record on appeal, by the evidence. "The mere acquiescence in the existence of the fence and the occupancy of the land to the north of it would not amount to an agreement that it was on an accepted boundary line. And the large area of the irregular parcel subtended by the fence and the creek to which it extended would go far to indicate that the builders of the fence were fixing a line 'for occupancy and not for title.'" Staniford v. Trombly, 181 Cal. 372, 375, 186 P. 599, 600.

[3] As to defendants' claim of title by adverse possession, there is no evidence that they paid all taxes levied or assessed upon the land claimed. It was stipulated and conceded at the trial that the records of the assessor's and tax collector's offices show that practically every year from 1874–75 to 1909–10 the property has been described in such an uncertain manner that it is impossible to ascertain what line bounds the northerly or westerly boundary of the Riddell tract or the southerly or easterly boundary of the Trombly tract. The northerly or westerly line of the Riddell tract is bounded in the assessor's record by the land of Trombly, while the southerly or easterly line of the Trombly tract is bounded in said record by the land of Riddell or Riddell Bros., and Riddell paid taxes on 565 acres of land and Trombly paid taxes on 200 acres of land, the acreage called for respectively in their deeds. Our attention is directed by respondents to the testimony of George Arthur Trombly as establishing payment of taxes on the area in controversy as follows: "I paid the taxes on it (area in dispute) ever since 1898." This statement, "area in dispute," inserted parenthetically by the author of the brief, is not borne out by the record. The witness testified:

> "I can locate the 20 acres that was conveyed from Lydia L. Trombly and William T. Trombly to George A. Trombly. * * * I paid the taxes on it ever since 1898. * * * In Solis rancho 20 acres of land, bounded north by Trombly (reading receipt No. 8889). That's the piece right there.
> "Q. 8889 assessed to George Trombly. It seems to be described 20 acres of land (reading). A. That is the same one. There is some places they call it bounded by Trombly and some by the Watsonville road."

The area of land in dispute, according to the testimony of plaintiff's surveyor, Herrman, contains about 165 acres, and the surveyor McMillan, called by defendants, testified that it "includes near 30 acres in there, somewhere in there, roughly speaking. Of course, I would like to have the privilege of correcting that if it is not the correct amount, because that is assumed." It is therefore apparent that, if the 20 acres upon which George Arthur Trombly paid the taxes evidenced by tax receipt No. 8889, and which sometimes is described as bounded by Trombly and sometimes by the Watsonville road, as stated by George Arthur Trombly, is included in the area in dispute, he did not pay taxes on the entire tract in controversy. We are unable, however, from either map printed in the transcript—one introduced by plaintiff and the other by defendants—to locate this 20 acres. It is not material, however, as the court found that, after said deed was made by John H. Moore to said George T. Arthur (Trombly's predecessor), every assessment made to George T. Arthur or to the said Peter Trombly, or to his successors in interest, in each case stated that the lands being assessed were 200 acres; and the court finds that the deed from the said John H. Moore to George T. Arthur (Trombly's predecessor) included an acreage of 200 acres, without including parcels A or B (area in dispute), and also found that "neither George T. Arthur nor Peter Trombly, nor any of their or either of their successors in interest ever paid any taxes at any time on any land which was not expressly bounded on the south by the land of Dewit C. Riddell or Speer Riddell (plaintiff's predecessor) or the successors in interest of said Dewit C. Riddell and Speer Riddell or by one of them." The court thus found that after the deed to Arthur, every assessment made to Arthur or Trombly stated the lands being assessed were 200 acres, and that the deed to Arthur included 200 acres without including any portion of the disputed area, and such finding is supported by evidence and the stipulation as to the assessments. The defense, therefore, here, as on the former appeal, must fail "because defendants and their predecessors paid taxes on property comprising but 200 acres (the amount of land called for in their deeds), and appellant and his predecessors in interest paid taxes on 565 acres which must have included the land here in dispute. The defendants therefore do not hold title by adverse possession." Staniford v. Trombly, 181 Cal. 372, 376, 186 P. 599, 600.

As to appellant's assigned error of law, that the court erred in overruling the objection of plaintiff to the testimony of George Arthur Trombly given to show an estoppel, it may be said that, while such evidence does not establish an estoppel, the testimony complained of was admissible in support of defendants' claim of adverse possession, as it dealt with the use of the land by defendants.

What has been said renders a discussion of appellant's second assignment, that the court erred in permitting the witness McMillan to testify concerning the "Auzerais line," unimportant.

We find no evidence in the record calling for a different ruling than that made on the former appeal.

The judgment therefore is reversed.

PEOPLE v. KUDER et al. (Cr. 1539.)

As Modified April 24, 1928.

1. Criminal law ⚷1015, 1081—Filing of individual motions in arrest of judgment by defendants, tried and convicted under one indictment, did not necessitate separate appeals by state, and hence one notice of appeal was sufficient.

Where five defendants, charged and tried under one indictment, were convicted by same jury in one verdict and filed individual notices of motion in arrest of judgment, all in substantially identical language, and trial court made one order granting motion, from which state prosecuted single appeal filing single transcript, held, that mere presentation of question whether indictment stated facts sufficient to constitute public offense by each defendant individually did not convert prosecution into five separate cases, necessitating filing of five separate appeals, and hence appeal was not dismissable because only one notice was given.

2. Criminal law ⚷1015—Defendants convicted under one indictment, filing individual motions in arrest of judgment which were granted in single order, could not complain of single appeal from order.

Where defendants, tried under one indictment and convicted in one verdict, filed individual motions in arrest of judgment and court entered single order granting arrest, to which no objection was interposed nor attempt made to assert that order was prejudicial, held, that defendants could not complain in motion to dismiss state's appeal from order so granted of treatment of their motions below, nor of appeal therefrom as being one proceeding.

3. Criminal law ⚷1081—Notice of appeal by state from order granting arrest of judgment held sufficient, despite insufficient entry of clerk (Pen. Code, § 1241).

Notice of appeal given by state's attorney from order granting arrest of judgment announced in open court at conclusion of ruling, that "We give notice at this time of appeal, to save our rights," and notice in writing thereafter being served and filed that state appealed from an order granting defendants' motion in arrest of judgment held sufficient despite incomplete minute notation of appeal by clerk of court, since Pen. Code, § 1241, provided that absence of entry of announcement of appeal should not invalidate appeal.

4. Clerks of courts ⚷66—Criminal law ⚷643—Clerk of court, ordinarily, has no judicial powers; certified report of official reporter is prima facie evidence of proceedings reported by him (Code Civ. Proc. § 273).

Ordinarily, clerk of court is but ministerial officer and is clothed with no judicial powers, whereas certified report of official reporter is prima facie evidence of proceedings reported by him by virtue of Code Civ. Proc. § 273.

5. Criminal law ⚷1081—Notice of appeal on ground that court erred in granting defendants' motion in arrest of judgment held sufficient.

Notice of appeal held not insufficient in that grounds therefor were not specified, where trial court granted motion in arrest of judgment on sole ground that indictment did not state public offense and appeal was specifically based upon ground that court erred in granting defendants' motion in arrest of judgment; there being no showing that respondents were misled by insufficient notice.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Chas. L. Allison, Judge.

J. M. Kuder, E. B. Fishel, U. R. Fishel, C. G. Luke, and Stephen Bedford were convicted of a violation of the Corporate Securities Act. From an order granting defendants' motions in arrest of judgment after conviction, the People appeal, and defendants move to dismiss the appeal. Motion denied.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

J. M. Friedlander, Corporation Com'r, H. A. I. Wolch. Asst Corporation Com'r, and Vernon S. Gray, Deputy Corporation Com'r., all of Los Angeles, amici curæ.

Arthur L. Veitch, of Los Angeles, for respondent Kuder.

Estudillo & Schwinn, of Riverside, for respondents E. B. Fishel and U. R. Fishel.

P. N. McCloskey, of San Bernardino, for respondent Luke.

William Guthrie and R. E. Hodge, both of San Bernardino, for respondent Bedford.

CRAIG, J. The five defendants and respondents herein were jointly indicted, tried by a jury, and convicted of an alleged violation of the Corporate Securities Act St. 1917, p. 673, as amended. The verdict was returned on June 24, 1927, that:

> "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find the defendants guilty as charged in the indictment."

The trial court fixed June 29, 1927, as the date for sentence. On June 24, after the rendition of the verdict, the defendant E. B. Fishel filed a motion in arrest of judgment. Thereafter, and on June 29th, Luke, Kuder and Bedford filed motions to vacate the verdict and for a new trial, and each of the Fishels filed motions for a new trial; on the date last mentioned Kuder, Bedford, and Luke filed motions in arrest of judgment, and on July 1st, U. R. Fishel filed a motion in arrest of judgment, at which time all of the motions were presented and argued by counsel for the respective defendants. Thereupon a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day, and the transcript of the clerk of the trial court recites the following order as having been then made:

> "This being the time heretofore continued to for the further hearing on motions for new trials, motions for arrest of judgment and for pronouncing judgment, the defendants are present with their counsel and the district attorney is also present.
> "Motions for arrest of judgment of each and all defendants herein are granted on the ground that the indictment does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense."

The motions to set aside the verdict and for a new trial were not acted upon. The district attorney announced at the time of the trial court's ruling: "We give notice at this time of appeal, to save our rights." Entry was made in the clerk's minutes that: "The district attorney gives notice of appeal." Thereafter and on July 6, 1927, the district attorney filed the following notice in writing:

> "Written Notice of Appeal by the Plaintiff from an Order Granting Defendant's Motion in Arrest of Judgment.
> "Supplementing the oral notice of appeal given and made in open court on the 1st day of July, 1927, by Geo. H. Johnson, district attorney in and for the county of San Bernardino, state of California, for and on behalf of the people of the state of California, at the time of the granting of defendants' motion in arrest of judgment, written notice is hereby given by the people of the state of California that they appeal to the District Court of Appeal of the state of California, Second appellate district, from an order granting defendants' motion in arrest of judgment, made and entered on the 1st day of July, 1927."

On the same date a "Statement of Grounds of Appeal, and Application under section 1247 of the Penal Code of the State of California," was filed, specifying as "general grounds": "That the court erred in making an order granting defendants' motion in arrest of judgment." The statement and application further reads as follows:

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

> "The people of the state of California designate that, in order to properly present their appeal, it will be necessary to have all of the phonographic reporters' notes transcribed covering the entire proceedings of the trial, together with all records and documents filed in said cause, and the clerk's transcript, as required by the Penal Code of the state of California; and plaintiff hereby requests that an order of the court be made accordingly."

Subsequently, and within the statutory time therefor, a transcript was filed, and the appellant served and filed its opening brief.

The respondents Fishels, Luke, and Bedford each now present separate motions in this court, wherein the respondent Kuder joins by stipulation, that the plaintiff's appeal be dismissed, and they assert as grounds for such dismissal that: (1) The purported notice of appeal did not specify or refer to the order or judgment from which appeal was taken. (2) But one notice of appeal was given, and but one transcript, and one brief filed in a matter involving five purported appeals, from five separate and distinct orders. (3) The notice does not meet the requirements of section 1247 of the Penal Code, fails to state in general terms or at all the grounds of appeal or points upon which appellant relies, and does not constitute a legal notice of appeal.

[1] The principal ground upon which these motions are based is, as succinctly stated on behalf of the respondent Fishels, that:

> "The conclusive interpretation of the action of the trial judge is that five orders were made. It must be conceded that, five separate motions being made, each motion should be taken care of by a separate order. This was the duty of the trial judge. In support of the judgment of the trial court, the presumption of regularity must be indulged in, and this being so, we must presume that the trial judge did his duty by making one order for each of the motions."

It is insisted that since a single appeal is insufficient to obtain a review of separate causes, tried together, where separate judgments have been rendered, separate transcripts should be filed, and distinct appeals prosecuted. An apt illustration of the respondents' theory is presented by the case of Washington v. State, 32 Ga. App. 72, 122 S. E. 629, wherein it was said that the court having separately passed upon each motion, the two distinct and separate judgments overruling the two distinct and separate motions for a new trial cannot be reviewed in one bill of exceptions. The cited case, it is argued, "is on all fours" with the instant one. We are unable to agree with the respondents' asserted analogy between several individual orders or judgments, based upon separate trials or motions, arising from consolidated cases, which was the situation in the case of Washington v. State, supra, and that of a single order, granting an arrest of judgment to five defendants, jointly indicted and convicted of a united and concerted violation of law, in one transaction, although represented by different counsel, as the record here shows the proceeding to have been presented, conducted and concluded.

The indictment in this case charged that the five named defendants were accused of the crime of a violation of the Corporate Securities Act, a felony, in that they did on or about the 30th day of September, 1925, willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, fraudulently, and feloniously authorize and direct and aid in the issue and sale of, and cause and assist in causing to be issued, executed and sold, certain stock certificates and securities, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such cases made and provided. They were tried together upon the foregoing indictment, and were convicted by the same jury, in one verdict. Individual notices of motion in arrest of judgment were served and filed on behalf of each defendant, by his respective counsel, but all were in substantially identical language, seeking the same result, and the arguments of defendants' various counsel were presented simultaneously. The trial court, as we have observed, made its order granting the "motion in arrest of judgment," as appears by the transcript of the official reporter.

We think the opinion in State v. Boylston, 138 La. 21, 69 So. 860, is clearly applicable to the facts of the instant case. There, three indictments were returned, to which exceptions were taken by three motions to quash; the same questions of law were presented in the three cases; and, although not consolidated, they were argued together, and the trial court by one opinion and decree granted the motion in each case. In denying motions to dismiss an appeal from such order upon the ground that there should have been three separate orders and appeals therefrom, the Supreme Court of Louisiana said:

> "It is evident, therefore, that, as the opinion and decree were identified, by title and number, with, and were intended to apply alike to the three cases which had been argued together, and in which the same motion to quash had been sustained, so the motion and order of appeal, similarly identified, were intended to be applied to the opinion in its relation to the three cases, respectively; and, as defendant does not, and cannot, well deny the application of the decree to each of the cases, he cannot be heard to deny the application of the motion and order of appeal to the decree, as so applied to the cases. * * * We do not consider, however, that there was any greater irregularity in deciding and appealing the cases, as was done, than there was in arguing them together, since the convenience of the litigants was equally subserved, and the cases no more lost their respective identities in one instance than in the other."

But one case, presented under one indictment, and in which a single verdict was rendered, constituted the basis of the question before the trial court, to wit, as to whether or not the indictment stated facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. This being so, it is inconceivable that the mere presentation of that question by each defendant individually could any more convert the prosecution and conviction into five separate cases than would the fact that each defendant individually pleaded "not guilty" to the indictment. And especially is this emphasized by the record herein, which discloses that certain defendants requested and were denied a severance, and that thereafter all counsel agreed that:

> "All motions made, and all evidence introduced, either orally or documentary, and all evidence offered, shall be deemed to have been made and offered by and on behalf of each and all of the defendants, unless the contrary appears."

[2] Conceding merely for the sake of argument that each of the defendants would have been entitled upon request to an individual verdict, and a separate ruling upon each motion filed, no such request was made, no objection was interposed to the action of the trial court in sustaining their contention by a single order, and they do not attempt to assert that the verdict or order as entered was prejudicial. Hence respondents cannot now complain of the treatment of their motions below, nor of the appeal therefrom, as being one proceeding. People v. Gayle (Cal. Sup.) 259 P. 750.

[3, 4] The argument that the notice of appeal was insufficient is equally without merit. Counsel for the people announced in open court at the conclusion of the ruling: "We give notice at this time of appeal, to save our rights." Thereafter notice in writing was served and filed, that the people of the state of California appealed "from an order granting defendants' motion in arrest of judgment." But one order having been made, and the district attorney having appeared on behalf of the people, there can be no doubt as to the identity of the order from which an appeal was taken, nor as to the party appealing. The entry made by the clerk of the court recited that: "The district attorney gives notice of appeal." It is contended that this falls far short of the statutory entry under section 1241 of the Penal Code, which requires that:

> "Any announcement of appeal made in open court by either the defendant or the people, must be by the clerk immediately entered in the minutes of the court."

It is to be observed, however, that the section mentioned contains the further provision:

> "But the failure of the clerk to so enter the same in the minutes shall in no way affect or invalidate the appeal."

The phonographic transcript, as heretofore stated, discloses that the district attorney, as counsel for the people, announced that "We give notice at this time of appeal, to save our rights," which can bear no other construction that the people of the state of California appealed from the order then made by the trial court. It is true that the brief notation of the court clerk consisted of the mere fact that counsel for the people announced that he appealed, but the transcript of the county clerk also contains the further notice in writing, and it appears that the appeal was perfected, and that respondents appeared and filed briefs therein. It has uniformly been held that ordinarily the clerk of a court is but a ministerial officer, and is clothed with no judicial powers (8 R. C. L. 626; Wolf v. Mulcrevy, 35 Cal. App. 80, 169 P. 259; Rose v. Lelande, 20 Cal. App. 502, 129 P. 599), whereas the certified report of the official reporter is prima facie evidence of the proceedings reported by him (Code Civ. Proc. § 273). The authorities cited by respondents involved cases wherein the certified record of the county clerk contained defective entries which prejudicially affected the rights of parties to appeals, and it was held that the injured party was entitled upon motion in the trial court to have the record so amended as to speak the truth. We cannot say, therefore, that in the face of the official stenographic record, an incomplete minute notation by the court clerk should be permitted to prejudice the parties' legal rights, when it is expressly provided by statute that the absence of any entry by him shall not have such effect.

[5] It is also contended that the notice of appeal is insufficient in that the grounds of appeal are not specified. As already observed, the trial court granted the motion in arrest of judgment upon the sole ground that the indictment did not state a public offense, and the appeal was specifically based upon the ground that "the court erred in making an order granting defendants' motion in arrest of judgment." It requires no exertion of more than ordinary reasoning to conclude from this as the people had specified the only ground which was available, or in fact, existent, the appeal was founded upon the contention that the court had erred in ruling that the indictment did not state a public offense. Further, respondents do not attempt to assert that they were, or could have been, misled thereby.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

OUTRAM v. CHAPMAN. (Civ. 5225.)★

Rehearing Denied May 8, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 6, 1928.

Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Finding of trial court, based on conflicting evidence, held binding on appellate court.

Finding of trial court in plaintiff's favor, based upon conflicting evidence, held binding on appellate court on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Jessie M. Outram against H. C. Chapman for money had and received. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry M. Lee, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff alleged in her complaint that defendant became indebted to her in the sum of $750 for money had and received for her use and benefit; that one-half of this sum had been paid, and the balance was still due and payable. The trial court made findings in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment rendered thereon. Defendant, with one other, was the owner of a parcel of land which plaintiff agreed to purchase. An instrument dated October 23, 1923, was drawn up by Kells & Grant, real estate brokers, which both parties signed, and which contained a number of provisions such as are usually found in instruments of this kind. In the document receipt was acknowledged by the brokers of the sum of $750 "as deposit and part payment on account of the purchase" of the lot. Apparently both plaintiff and defendant believed it was necessary to complete the transaction within 30 days from October 23, for both testified that there were some negotiations for an extension of time beyond this date. It is not necessary to here set forth the details of this agreement, since neither party complied with its terms. Plaintiff did not complete her cash payment, and defendant did not tender a deed. On December 8, 1923, defendant sold the property to another party through the instrumentality of Kells & Grant. Plaintiff would clearly be entitled to the return of all of her deposit, unless she forfeited the right to demand one-half of it by the taking of the option on the property hereinafter mentioned.

Kells & Grant, on November 24, 1923, obtained from defendant a written option on the lot in question by which they secured the exclusive right to purchase it until December 3, 1923. For this option, which was obtained in their own name, they paid to defendant the sum of $375 out of the deposit of $750 theretofore made by plaintiff, and returned to plaintiff the sum of $375. Defendant now contends that Kells & Grant were acting as agents of plaintiff, and were authorized by her to obtain the option for her and make the payment from her deposit. Ample evidence was introduced to support defendant's position, and, if it had been believed by the trial court, judgment would doubtless have been rendered for defendant. There was, however, a sharp conflict of testimony on the subject of the option. Plaintiff testified that she did not authorize Kells & Grant to pay to defendant the sum of $375, and had never heard of the option before the commencement of the action. We are therefore confronted with the ordinary case of a conflict of evidence in which the trial court found in plaintiff's favor, and in which we are bound by the findings of the lower court. Except in the testimony of the witness Lint, which is contradicted by Mrs. Outram, there is nothing in the evidence which discloses an authorization, either express or implied, on the part of the brokers to obtain the option and pay for it out of plaintiff's funds.

The judgment is affirmed.

COACHELLA VALLEY COUNTY WATER Dist. v. STEVENS. (Civ. 3386).†

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court May 24, 1928.

1. Waters and water courses 🔑107(3)—Complaint in action to restrain defendant's taking subterranean water from own land for other than domestic purposes held not to state cause of action.

Petition in action by a county water district to restrain defendant from taking water from his own land for other than domestic purposes held not to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, since it contained no allegations that defendant was digging wells where he had no right to sink them; mere statement that defendant was tapping subterranean water sources not establishing fact that he was proceeding to do what he had no right to do.

2. Pleading 🔑8(2)—Allegation that defendant proposed to take and spread subterranean water on land and waste it held conclusion and not statement of fact.

In action by county water district to restrain defendant from taking water from his own land from underground sources on theory that it interfered with rights of riparian users, an allegation that defendant proposed to spread water on his land and waste the same held simply a conclusion and not a statement of fact.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑101—Owner of land above belt saturated with percolating water is entitled to reasonable use thereof, though use interferes with neighbor's use.

Owner of land lying above belt saturated with percolating water is entitled to reasonable use thereof on his own land, though use interferes with water percolating in or to neighbor's soil.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑101—Owner of land above belt saturated with percolating water has no right to take and carry such water to distant lands.

Owner of land lying above belt saturated with percolating water has no right to carry water to distant lands for purposes of sale, etc.

5. Statutes 🔑109—Whatever is germane to purposes of act may be held as included within title, though not specifically mentioned.

Whatever is germane to the purposes of an act may be held as included within the title, even though not specifically mentioned therein.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑107(3)—Water district held not proper plaintiff in action to restrain landowner's taking subterranean water from land within district, where district owned no land affected (St. 1913, p. 1049, § 12, subd. 6, as amended by St. 1923, p. 312, § 1).

Where county water district, organized pursuant to St. 1913, p. 1049, § 12, subd. 6, as amended by St. 1923, p. 312, § 1, brought an action to restrain an owner of land within such district from using water, which he procured by sinking wells into saturated belt, for such purposes as he desired, held, that the district was not a proper party plaintiff, since it owned no land in such district.

7. Waters and water courses 🔑107(3)—Water district held not proper plaintiff in action to restrain landowner's use of privately owned percolating waters within district, on theory plaintiff represented public (St. 1913, p. 1049, § 12, subd. 6, as amended by St. 1923, p. 312, § 1).

County water district organized under St. 1913, p. 1049, § 12, subd. 6, as amended by St. 1923, p. 312, § 1, held, not proper plaintiff, on theory it represented the public, in action to restrain landowner's use of percolating waters within district, where it desired waters to be used in irrigating lands of private owners, since such waters were not public property.

8. Waters and water courses 🔑216—Statutory provisions affecting water district's water rights apply only to property in which district has ownership or pecuniary interest (St. 1913, p. 1049, § 12, subd. 6, as amended by St. 1923, p. 312, § 1; Const. art. 4, § 24).

St. 1913, p. 1049, § 12, subd. 6, as amended by St. 1923, p. 312, § 1, relative to county water district's rights as to water use, applies, in view of Const. art. 4, § 24, only to property owned by or in which water district, as such, has ownership or pecuniary interest.

9. Waters and water courses 🔑107(1)—That landowner would waste water unless restrained gave district no right of action, where it owned no land affected (St. 1913, p. 1049, § 12, subd. 6, as amended by St. 1923, p. 312, § 1).

In action by county water district, organized pursuant to St. 1913, p. 1049, § 12, subd. 6, as amended by St. 1923, p. 312, § 1, to restrain landowner within district from certain use of water percolating beneath surface of his land, complaint's allegation that defendant would spread water over certain lands and waste same held, in view of St. 1907, p. 122, not to give district right of action, where it was not owner of any lands affected.

10. Waters and water courses 🔑101—That many landowners might be adversely affected by landowner's use of percolating waters held not to make private right to use subject to public regulation (St. 1913, p. 1049, § 12, subd. 6, as amended by St. 1923, p. 312, § 1).

Mere fact that number of landowners in water district organized pursuant to St. 1913, p. 1049, § 12, subd. 6, as amended by St. 1923, p. 312, § 1, might be adversely affected by landowner's use of waters percolating beneath his land, held not to make his private right to use thereof subject to regulation as public property.

11. Waters and water courses 🔑107(3)—Statute relative to joinder of parties held not to support water district's action to restrain landowner's use of percolating waters, where district owned no land (St. 1913, p. 1049, § 12, subd. 6, as amended by St. 1923, p. 312, § 1; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 369, 382).

Code Civ. Proc. § 382, providing for suit by one for benefit of many persons under certain circumstances, and section 369, relative to defense by trustee, held not to support action of county water district organized pursuant to St. 1913, p. 1049, § 12, subd. 6, as amended by St. 1923, p. 312, § 1, seeking to restrain owner of land within such district from using percolating waters as he desired, since, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 379, and Const. art. 4, § 25, subds. 19, 33, the district, owning no land, had not such interest as required for suit.

12. Waters and water courses 🔑107(1)—"Police power" held not to authorize water district's action against landowner to restrain use of percolating water.

"Police power" of state held not to authorize county water district's action against landowner to restrain his use of water, where district owned no land, since police power must have for its foundation public peace, health, safety, or welfare of the state.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by the Coachella Valley County Water District against Prescott T. Stevens. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. L. Carnahan and J. M. Stevens, both of Los Angeles, and Thomas C. Yager, of Indio, for appellant.

W. G. Irving and Sarau & Thompson, all of Riverside, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. The complaint in this action sets forth that on or about the 16th day of January, 1918, the appellant was and ever since said date has been a duly incorporated county water district in the county of Riverside, state of California, and was so incorporated under an act of the Legislature, entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation and organization and management of county water districts, and to provide for the acquisition of water rights or construction thereby of waterworks and for the acquisition of all property necessary therefor, and also to provide for the distribution and sale of water by said districts," approved June 10, 1913, and amendments thereto; that said water district is situate wholly within the county of Riverside and includes within its exterior boundaries a number of sections of land particularly mentioned and described commencing at a place near the north boundary line of Riverside county, from whence the exterior boundary lines of said district are mentioned and set forth showing that it comprises a tract of land in said county lying in a southerly and southwesterly direction therefrom embracing the lands lying in the valley from which the district derives its name. The complaint then describes the valley referred to as extending from a certain mountain known as and called "San Gorgonia" on the northerly line of said Riverside county in a southeasterly direction some 60 miles to the shore of the Salton Sea. The height of the mountains surrounding the valley, the width of the valley, its elevation above sea level, and the natural incline of the valley are all particularly described. It is then alleged that the Whitewater river is a natural stream of water flowing in a well-defined channel along the course and over the land particularly described in the complaint; that said stream rises on the southerly and easterly slopes of San Gorgonia Mountain and other mountains adjacent thereto, and thence flows southerly down through and across the lands described as lying within the Coachella Valley County water district.

It is further alleged in the complaint that during the rainy season large quantities of water and snow fall upon the slopes of the mountains referred to and are thence carried down through the Whitewater river toward the sea. The lands within the district are described as being mostly arable, and with water, susceptible of being brought up to a high degree of cultivation, but that without water said lands are arid and unproductive. The complaint further alleges that some 13,000 acres of land within said district have been cultivated and irrigated, and that, if sufficient water were available, at least 72,000 acres of land lying in said valley might be brought under cultivation and valuable crops raised thereon; the fact that the annual rainfall within said district is but light, and the necessity for irrigation is alleged, and the source of water for irrigation described as the Whitewater river hereinbefore mentioned, having its origin and course as stated; that the water in said river in its course from the said San Gorgonia Mountain runs in a good surface stream until it reaches a certain described tract of land belonging to the defendant in this action, where it encounters a dike or strata of soil impervious to water, which causes it to accumulate in a subterranean reservoir, and from this place in the stream on down in its course to the Salton Sea the bed of the stream is porous and of such a character as permits the water to sink beneath the surface and also of such a character that it takes up and holds the water coming down in said Whitewater river to such an extent that large quantities thereof are rendered available for irrigation; that the water so finding its way into and saturating the masses of gravel and other material underlying the plain of said valley and along the course of said river has been extracted and withdrawn therefrom, at great expense, by means of pumps operating by motors and engines, and that for many years wells have been so operated along said valley, and subterranean waters taken from said plain and used by the owners of lands and the inhabitants of towns and villages in said valley for domestic purposes and for irrigation, and that such subterranean water constitutes the only course from which landowners can obtain water for the uses mentioned. The complaint then sets forth that the amount of water which can be obtained from the subterranean sources is insufficient for irrigating the lands lying within said valley that could be profitably utilized if water could be obtained for the irrigation thereof, and that any diminution or depletion of the underground waters in said plain or in the amount of water supplying and replenishing the same would necessarily diminish the amount of water produced therefrom by pumping, and would deprive the owners of the land in said district of water necessary for the uses and purposes hereinbefore mentioned.

The complaint then alleges that the defendant is and for more than 20 years preceding the beginning of this action his predecessors have been the owners of certain lands particularly described in the complaint, and that said lands are not suitable for cultivation; that no part of the water of said stream is necessary for irrigating the same, and that the only beneficial use that can be made thereof is for domestic purposes, and that a constant flow of one-fiftieth of a cubic foot per second of time is reasonably sufficient for such purpose. It is then alleged that along the northerly boundary line of the land belonging to the defendant there is a natural dike in the soil, impervious to water, extending to, or near, the surface of the ground and across the channel of Whitewater river; that said dike causes all water flowing thereto in said stream or percolating therefrom to the soil beneath and adjacent to said stream, to rise, at and where said dike exists, to or within 15 feet of the surface of the ground, and thereby forms a natural underground reservoir or basin above said dike, and from said reservoir said water flows as a running stream in a narrow and well-defined channel over said dike to the lands below; that within three months preceding the beginning of the action said defendant has entered upon his lands at and about said dike and over said natural reservoir, and without the consent of the plaintiff or of any owner of land riparian to or appropriator or user of water in said stream along the course thereof below said land of defendant, or of any other inhabitant of said district, and against the protest of the plaintiff and the will of said owners of land riparian to said stream and the appropriators and users thereof and of said inhabitants of said district, has begun to construct and drill and complete upon said lands of defendant, and at, upon, or near to said dike, and over and within said natural reservoir, a well, or wells, and that defendant intends thereby to pump or otherwise obtain all waters flowing in said stream, or retained in said reservoir and to build and construct dams and other works and ditches for the diversion of said or a large portion of the water flowing or percolating therein and through the soil above, and thence, by means of dams or other works, ditches, pipe lines, and other conduits, to take, divert, appropriate, and carry away from said stream and from said reservoir and away from said lands riparian to said stream along the courts thereof below said reservoir to section 10, in township 4 south, range 4 east, and other lands adjacent thereto, and southerly and southeasterly therefrom all of the waters so impounded to the amount of 60 cubic feet per second constant flow, and to spread and waste the same upon and over said lands; and that unless restrained from so doing, said defendant will so complete said wells and dams and other diversion works and take, divert, appropriate, and carry away said waters to said lands, and thereby deprive the plaintiff, the appropriators, and present users of said waters of the use and benefit thereof, and that unless restrained from so doing, said defendant will sink and complete said wells, construct dams, ditches, and other diversion works, and take and carry away therefrom to said section 10 all of said water to the amount hereinbefore alleged, and there spread and waste the same upon said land.

The complaint further alleges that prior to the year 1922 the defendant, Stevens, and his predecessors in interest claimed and now claims a right in and to the waters of Whitewater river which said waters were diverted from said stream in the northeast quarter of section 24, township 3 south, range 3 east, S. B. B. & M.; that thereafter, and on or about the 15th day of March, 1922, the defendant Stevens changed and caused to be changed his point of diversion aforesaid and is now threatening to divert and diverting said water from a point approximately 17,000 feet up the bed of said stream from said original point of diversion, thereby taking and removing said waters from the bed of said Whitewater river, changing the natural course thereof, preventing the riparian use of a subsurface flow from said waters, and decreasing the flow of the waters in said Whitewater river, to the great and irreparable damage and injury of the plaintiff herein.

The complaint concludes with a prayer for an injunction restraining the defendant from completing his wells, from pumping water from the reservoir underneath his lands referred to, from taking waters from said reservoir for other than domestic purposes, and also for an injunction restraining the defendant from changing the point of diversion of the waters alleged to have been taken therefrom by appropriation, as just herein stated, and also that it be decreed that the owners of land in said Coachella Valley have a superior right over the defendant as riparian owners of the waters herein referred to.

To this complaint the defendant, Stevens, demurred, setting forth as follows: That the Coachella Valley County water district, plaintiff herein, has not legal capacity to sue for the reason that it appears affirmatively in the complaint that the plaintiff has no right, title, or interest in or to any real or personal property situated within the boundaries of said district, or in or to any water or water rights used for any purpose within said district, and is not authorized by law to prosecute said action; that the plaintiff is not the real party in interest; that said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that there is a defect or misjoinder of parties plaintiff in said action, for the reason that the persons who are alleged in said complaint to be the owners of the riparian lands therein described and who are alleged to own and possess rights to appropriate water from the Whitewater river, etc., are not named as parties plaintiff.

The demurrer interposed by the defendant, Stevens, was sustained without leave to amend, and on the 20th day of January, 1925, judgment was entered in favor of the defendant for his costs and dismissing the plaintiff's complaint. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

[1-4] The foregoing résumé of the complaint shows clearly that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. It contains no allegations or statement of facts showing that the defendant is digging wells where he has no right to sink the same, nor are there any statements of fact that the defendant is not entitled to draw water from the subterranean sources underneath his own property. The mere statement that the defendant is proceeding to sink wells upon his own land, to tap subterranean sources of water thereunder, and also the waters percolating and saturating the soil under his own lands, establishes the fact that the defendant is proceeding to do just what he has a legal right to do. It requires no citation of authorities to show that an owner of land has a right to sink wells thereon to obtain a water supply for use upon his real estate. There are no facts contained in the complaint from which it can be reasonably concluded that the defendant proposes to take any water beyond the confines of the watershed of the Whitewater river or beyond the watershed contributing to the Coachella Valley. The mere allegation that the defendant proposes to spread water upon his land and waste the same is not a statement of any fact, but is simply a conclusion. There is nothing in the complaint to the effect that the defendant is wrongfully sinking any wells upon his own land or is wrongfully taking any water, or is taking any water, or proposes to take any water to which he is not entitled. From the facts alleged in the complaint that the defendant is sinking wells upon his own lands, it is evident that no allegations can be truthfully made that the defendant is wrongfully sinking wells thereon, or that taking water therefrom would be wrongful. Even if the facts alleged in the complaint are sufficient to bring this action within the rule announced in Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 70 P. 663, 74 P. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35, the defendant, as the owner of land lying above the belt or strata which has become saturated with percolating water, is entitled to a reasonable use thereof on his own land, notwithstanding such reasonable use may interfere with water percolating in or to his neighbor's soil. The limitation as to such owner's right is that he shall not make an unreasonable diversion of such waters percolating therein, and, as further said in the case just referred to, such waters cannot be carried to distant lands for purposes of sale, etc. In other words, all the owners of land lying above a saturated belt are entitled to make reasonable use of the waters found beneath their own lands. No facts are stated in the complaint showing that the defendant was not, or is not making reasonable use of all waters extracted and proposed to be extracted by means of wells sunk or being sunk upon premises belonging to himself.

It may also be stated here that there are no facts set forth in the complaint showing that the plaintiff is the owner of any of the lands within the district, or that the plaintiff is the owner of any water or water rights therein, or that any of the acts or contemplated acts of the defendant will in any manner whatsoever injure any property rights of the plaintiff.

Notwithstanding the want of merit in the complaint as shown by the foregoing statement of particulars, it is evident, as shown by the opinion of the trial court giving reasons why the defendant's demurrer should be sustained, and also from the fact that the demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, the trial court, in its ruling, went directly to the vital defects in this action aimed at by the demurrer, to wit, that the plaintiff has no capacity to sue in this action.

This action is based entirely upon the assumption that the Coachella County water district has a legal right to become either plaintiff or defendant or intervene in any controversy affecting simply the private rights of the private landowners owning land within the territorial boundaries of the water district, though none of the waters referred to in the complaint belong to the plaintiff. The plaintiff owns no land. It is simply a water district. The title of the act under which the water district was incorporated specifies that such a district may acquire water rights, may construct waterworks, and may provide for the distribution and sale of water, but there is no pretense in this action that the Coachella water district has acquired any water rights, has constructed any waterworks, or is selling or distributing any water, or that it has any interest whatever that will be interfered with by the alleged acts of the defendant. The right of the plaintiff to institute and prosecute this action for the settlement of private disputes concerning water and the preventing of one landowner taking, from the waters beneath the surface of his land, waters that would otherwise percolate to and saturate the soil beneath another landowner, is based upon subdivision 6 of section 12 of the act approved June, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1049), as amended by the act of the Legislature approved May 11, 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 312, § 1). This subdivision is in the following words and figures, to wit:

> "To store water for the benefit of the district; to conserve water for future use; to appropriate, acquire and conserve water and water rights for any useful purpose; to commence, maintain, intervene in and compromise, in the name of the district, and to assume the costs of any action or proceeding involving or affecting the ownership or use of waters or water rights within the district used or useful for any purpose of the district or a benefit to any land situated therein; to commence, maintain, intervene in, defend and compromise actions and proceedings to prevent interference with or diminution of the natural flow of any stream or natural subterranean supply of waters used or useful for any purpose of the district or a common benefit to the lands within the district or its inhabitants; and to commence, maintain and defend actions and proceedings to prevent any such interference with the aforesaid waters as may endanger the inhabitants or lands of the district."

On the part of the appellant it is contended that this subdivision authorizes the maintenance of this action by the water district, even though it has no ownership whatever in the lands involved or in the waters in controversy, or in the waters about to be taken and used by defendant. On the part of the respondent it is urged that the subdivision referred to gives no such authority; that such authority, if given by the subdivision, is not included within the title of the act, is not germane thereto or to anything contained therein, and is therefore, to that extent, unconstitutional. The title of the act, as it appeared in 1913, and as it was carried down by successive amendatory acts, is as follows:

"An act to provide for the incorporation and organization and management of county water districts, and to provide for the acquisition of water rights or construction thereby of waterworks and for the acquisition of all property necessary therefor, and also to provide for the distribution and sale of water by said districts."

[5] We do not need to cite authorities to the effect that whatever is germane to the purposes of the act may be held as included within the title, even though not specifically mentioned therein. For instance, the title of the act provides for the acquisition of water rights, which would necessarily include the power to purchase water rights and the power to appropriate water. The title of the act also provides for the construction of waterworks, which would include, as germane thereto, provisions relative to the raising of money with which to construct such waterworks. The title also provides for the acquisition of property necessary for the construction of such works. Germane to the title would be the acquiring of real estate upon which to construct the works, such as dams, ditches, etc. The act further provides for the distribution and sale of water by the district. This would necessarily include, as germane thereto, all the regulations as to the distribution and sale of water and the use thereof by the parties to whom it might be sold, or for whose use distribution is made. Also the title of the act would include all provisions relative to the organization and management of the property of the district; that is, of property belonging to the district, and not simply property lying within the territorial boundaries of the district. It may be here stated that the argument of the appellant seems to proceed upon the theory that the rights of the water district extend to all the lands and waters lying within the territorial limits of the water district, irrespective of the fact that it has absolutely no ownership therein.

Turning our attention to subdivision 6 of section 12, as amended in 1923, we find that it provides for storing water for the benefit of the district; conserving water for future use; that a district is empowered to appropriate, acquire, and conserve water and water rights; to commence, maintain, intervene in and compromise in the name of the district and assume the costs of any action or proceeding involving or affecting the ownership or use of water or water rights within the district, and used or useful for any purposes of the district or of benefit to any lands situated therein. These provisions, if interpreted to relate to any property, whether land, water, or water rights, would be germane to the purposes mentioned in the title; but, if the provision relative to compromising suits between private individuals, or beginning or defending suits to settle mere disputes between private individuals, it is evident that the title contains nothing to which such a power would be germane. The district, after acquiring any water or water rights useful for the district or useful for the common benefit of the district, would have a right to maintain actions to prevent interference therewith, and would have a right to compromise and settle any actions in which the ownership of the district in and to the water or water rights might be involved.

[6] We do not think that the inclusion, within subdivision 6 of section 12, of language which might possibly be construed to refer to any waters used or useful for any lands within the district or its inhabitants, refers to any waters other than those in which the district, as a district, has an ownership. It certainly cannot be held that it was the intent of the Legislature to create a legal entity which might play the part of a super-plaintiff or a super-defendant in settlement of mere private rights, or that such a super-plaintiff or super-defendant should exercise the prerogative of settling, compromising, or adjusting mere private disputes. The different provisions of the subdivision of the section referred to must all go back and relate to the purposes for which water districts may be created, and when we go back to the title of the act and read therefrom the purpose or purposes, we find that it is for the acquisition of water rights, for the construction of waterworks, and for the distribution and sale of water by said districts, which includes, of course, the management of the machinery of the corporation. There is not a single intimation in the title that the Legislature had in view the creation of a legal entity which might appear either as plaintiff or defendant in disputes over private water rights between private individuals, concerning water which might be used within the territorial limits of a water district in which the district, as a district, had neither ownership nor right of possession nor any legal right to the control thereof. If the contention of the appellant is correct, that the district is a legal entity authorized to appear in actions involving only private rights, the question is immediately presented, On which side should the district appear? Should it appear as plaintiff, or should it appear as defendant? If it has a right to advance the costs of such an action, should it finance the plaintiff's side of the case, or should it finance the defendant's? In any of these situations, if the district has a right to create itself a party, either as plaintiff or defendant, in the settlement of mere private rights, then the Legislature has created a corporation with power within itself to determine the extent of the private rights of individuals in and to property in which the corporation known as the district has absolutely no ownership or pecuniary interest whatever.

There is nothing in the complaint which shows any public interest, but the facts alleged therein do show that no facts can be alleged establishing any public interest or ownership in and to the waters under the defendant's lands and premises. This is clearly shown by the case of San Bernardino v. Riverside, 186 Cal. 7, 198 P. 784, where it is said:

> "The original title to percolating water was in the owner of the land in which it is found. * * * That the title and ownership of land extends to the center of the earth and includes everything in the cone having the superficial boundaries of the land for the base and the center of the earth for its vertex."

It is further held that water under lands lying within the municipality of the city of San Bernardino is private property, and that the water so underneath the land could remain private property until it is taken from the owners of the land and devoted to public use in some manner provided by law. It is further held in that case that the declaration in the amendments to the Code that all water within the state is the property of the state does not affect or limit private ownership to subterranean water such as is involved in this action. It is further held in that case that a city situate in an artesian basin which overlies a part of the subterranean waters of the basin has no right to such waters on the theory that the underlying waters of the basin are by law subject to public use for the common benefit of the overlying lands and the inhabitants of the basin, and that the city is substituted to the individual rights of landowners for the benefit of all, since the water is private property, and the rights of the city as a municipality are not to be measured either by the law regarding riparian rights or by the law concerning the rights of the landowner in water underlying his land.

[7] The case of San Bernardino v. Riverside, supra, applied to the case at bar, establishes clearly that the Coachella water district has no interest, ownership, or control whatever of the waters percolating beneath the surface of the soil owned by the defendant in this action; that such waters are not public; that, not being public, no action can be maintained in relation thereto on the theory that the plaintiff represents the public and is appearing for and on behalf of the public. The case to which we have just referred takes up and determines the limits of ownership of landowners in and to subterranean waters, and holds that they cannot be taken outside of the watershed supplying or feeding such subterranean waters, which questions, however, are not involved in this action. What we have said leads unavoidably to the conclusion that if appellant's construction of subdivision 6 of section 12 of the act of 1913, as amended by the Legislature in 1923, is correct, then and in that case the subdivision is violative of section 24 of article 4 of the state Constitution.

[8, 9] This conclusion, however, is avoided by construing, all and singular, the terms of the subdivision referred to as applying only to property owned by or in which the water district, as a water district, has an ownership or pecuniary interest. That the district must, in order to prosecute an action in relation thereto, have a pecuniary ownership or interest, and not simply a desire to see one or the other of the private parties, prevail. The allegation in the complaint that the defendant will spread water over certain lands and waste the same does not give the plaintiff a right of action. In this particular the appellant refers to the act approved March 6, 1907, and the amendatory acts thereto (Stats. 1907, p. 122), relative to wasting artesian water. Such wasting is made a misdemeanor, and prosecution therefor could only be had in an action begun by and on behalf of the people of the state of California, and this only upon the assumption that the defendant obtains and thereafter wastes artesian water.

Reverting again to the fact that the pleadings show that the defendant is the owner of land within the territorial limits of the water district, whether he is taking water by appropriation or by means of sinking wells, he is doing all those acts in relation to his own property and is not diverting any water to any land outside of the district or the watershed of the Whitewater river. We may appropriately quote from 25 California Jurisprudence, p. 1008 et seq., § 13:

> "The right to make use of the water of streams constitutes private property, whether the right originates in riparian proprietorship or appropriation on private or public lands. An appropriation under the Code is private property within the meaning of the Code sections. The same rule applies to underground waters." [Here the text-writer quotes from the case of San Bernadino v. Riverside, 186 Cal. 7, 198 P. 784, the substance of what we have heretofore set forth taken from said case.] * * * "Inasmuch as riparian rights are real property and part and parcel of riparian lands to which they attach, the ownership thereof can be divested only by grant, prescription, condemnation, contract, or estoppel. Legislative enactment cannot have the effect of destroying the rights of the riparian owner, nor may such rights be taken for public use without compensation to the proprietor."

[10] Many authorities are there cited, supporting the text. The mere fact that there may be a number of landowners in the Coachella Valley in Riverside county possessing private water rights does not, by reason of mere numbers, make the private rights possessed by such landowners public property.

Again, if appellant's interpretation of subdivision 6 of section 12 of the amended act of 1913 relating to water districts is correct, and if the latter portion of said subdivision explicitly gives water districts the right to appear as either plaintiff or defendant in actions involving private water rights between private individuals, it would lead to the conclusion that that portion of subdivision 6 which purports to give such right of action to the corporate entity known as the district is violative of subdivisions 19 and 33 of section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution, for the reason that the subdivision purports to grant to the corporation a special and exclusive right which is not granted to any other kind of corporation within the state, that is, the right to maintain such an action as is presented in this cause, the right to take sides in private disputes, and also, if such a right can be granted, subdivision 33 of said section and article of the Constitution would necessitate that a law of that kind must be general.

In support of the contention that the district has a right to prosecute or defend actions of this kind, our attention is called to section 369 and section 382 of the Code of Civil Procedure; section 369 relating to the right of an executor or administrator or trustee of an express trust to appear and defend in actions relating to the property of which such representative is a trustee. We do not quite see the applicability of this section, for the reason that the plaintiff is not a trustee of any property owned by any private individual in the district. It is empowered to acquire property, but it is not empowered to act as a trustee. If it were empowered to act as a trustee, the question would arise on which side of a private controversy should the district appear. Would its appearance on either side in controversy depend upon the judgment or the wish, whim, or caprice of the officers of the district? If a trustee of the private water rights owned by residents of the district, then the plaintiff would be in the position of representing both sides of the controversy, and necessarily could not be authorized to appear in behalf of either one.

[11] Section 382 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not, in our opinion, furnish any support for this action. The interest referred to in that section does not mean simply a partisan interest or a desire to see one or the other side of a controversy prevail, but refers to an interest pecuniary in character or dependent upon some legal right or title. As said in Carey v. Brown, 58 Cal. 180, quoting from page 183:

> "It seems to us that the Code permits one to sue or defend for the benefit of many persons, only in cases where they are so united in interest with the person who brings the action or defends against it, as to make them necessary parties under the first clause of section 382, Code Civ. Proc., which precedes the clause that authorizes one to sue or defend for many."

If the defendant in this action, in the exercise of his private rights to take water from the subsoil of his land, is trenching upon, or proposes to trench upon, the private right of some other person or persons owning lands within the Coachella Valley, their rights only are affected, and not the right of the corporation or entity known as a district, because, as we have shown, the district has no ownership, pecuniary interest, legal right, or title in or to any such waters. No pretense is made that it has ever acquired any such ownership or title. Section 379 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as provided in section 369 of the Code, to which we have just referred as not being applicable to this cause.

[12] In support of its contention that the judgment of the trial court is erroneous, several cases having to do with the police power of the state are set forth in appellant's brief. Under this heading, section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution declares that water appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution is a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the state; that irrigation districts, water districts, and reclamation districts are organized for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of the Legislature in its desire to provide for the general welfare of the state. We are again cited to the fact that wasting of water from artesian wells is a public offense, and that one of the paramount interests of the state is in the storage, conservation, and diversion of water. With these statements we agree, but that does not change the fact that the police power of the state must have for its foundation the public peace, the public health, the public safety, and the public welfare of the state, and not merely ascertaining and determining whether one or a number of individuals possess or does not possess a prior private right. As we have heretofore shown, the declaration of the Legislature concerning the waters of the state in nowise affects waters held in private ownership. In one of the cases cited by the appellant we find a complete answer to its contention. In the opinion filed by Justice Shaw in denying a rehearing in the case of Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. on page 733, 151 P. 418, we find the following:

> "The very foundation of the conception of police power is that it must exist and can only exist to protect the public from evil, hurt, or mischief, and to promote the public interest or welfare or the public convenience. It may well be said, therefore, that it can be exerted upon the individual only when he, or his property, causes, or is likely to cause, evil, hurt, or mischief to the public or to the public interest, or interferes with the public welfare or convenience. No one would seriously dispute the proposition that the private property of a person cannot be taken from him, under the police power, solely because its possession by the public, or by another individual, would be a greater public benefit than its possession by the original owner."

That there is no public interest in the waters referred to in this case, see, also, San Bernardino v. Riverside, supra. To take up and differentiate all the cases cited by the appellant, from the case at bar, relative to the exercise of police power by the state, would unduly extend this opinion. However, we may refer to two of them, to wit, Kansas v. Colorado, 185 U. S. 125, 22 S. Ct. 552, 46 L. Ed. 838, and Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U. S. 208, 21 S. Ct. 331, 45 L. Ed. 497. These cases both had to do with the public health and welfare of the respective states. In the case of Missouri v. Illinois it is distinctly pointed out that it is not the province of the government to interfere in any matter of private controversy between individuals, or to use its great powers to enforce the rights of one against another, but that the wrongs complained of must affect the public at large. It is evident that the public cannot be affected in any degree by a determination of whether the defendant, Stevens, or some other individual may pump privately owned subterranean waters in the Coachella Valley. We have not taken up and considered whether this proceeding, if allowable as claimed by the appellant, would be violative of section one of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, as urged by the respondent, nor have we considered the question as to whether anything contained in this proceeding is other than due process of law, for the reason that such questions are not considered essential to a decision herein.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

I concur: HART, J.

PEOPLE v. PISCITELLA. (Cr. 1442.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 2, 1928.

1. Burglary ⚷9(2)—Crime of burglary held complete on first entry with intent to remove safe, though removal was not effected until second entry (Pen. Code, § 459).

Where defendant and others broke into store with intent to remove safe and failed to take safe because of its weight, but, after securing other companions, broke into store a second time and removed safe, crime of burglary was complete on first entrance into building with intent to remove safe, under Pen. Code, § 459.

2. Criminal law ⚷507(3)—Witness participating in second entry, but not first entry, held not "accomplice" to offense under first entry, and testimony was effective to corroborate accomplice (Pen. Code, §§ 32, 1111).

Witness not participating in first entry into store with intent to remove safe and not connected with parties to that offense before same was committed, but aiding in removing safe after second entry, though an accessory, under Pen. Code, § 32, to offense under first entry, was not an "accomplice," under section 1111, defining accomplice as one liable to prosecution for identical offense charged against defendant, and testimony of witness was effective to corroborate testimony of accomplice.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Accomplice.]

3. Criminal law ⚷407(2)—If accused fails to deny accusation indicating admission of its truth, accusation is admissible with evidence of accused's conduct.

Statements of third persons are not admissible in evidence simply because they are made in presence and hearing of accused; but, if it is proved that accused failed to deny accusation under circumstances which may be construed as admission of its truth, or failed to act as it might reasonably be expected an innocent person would act, evidence of statement is admissible in connection with evidence of conduct in face of accusation.

4. Criminal law 🔑511(1)—Evidence held to corroborate testimony of accomplice and support conviction for burglary based on original entry.

In prosecution for burglary, inference of guilt reasonably to be drawn by jury from conduct of defendant in face of statements made in his presence accusing him of burglary, together with fact that defendant transported associates to place where previous entry into building had been made, and conduct on arrival there connecting defendant with original entry, held sufficient to corroborate testimony of accomplice charging defendant with burglary and supported conviction for burglary based on original entry.

5. Witnesses 🔑388(2)—Evidence to impeach testimony of accomplice held properly rejected, where no foundation was laid for impeachment.

Evidence of statements made by accomplice tending to show motive for testifying falsely offered to impeach testimony of accomplice held properly rejected, where no foundation was laid for attempted impeachment.

6. Criminal law 🔑863(2), 865(1)—Instruction requiring jurors to listen to fellow jurors and decide case on evidence, made after jury voluntarily stated they stood eleven to one for conviction, was not erroneous, as indicating guilt or coercion.

Where jury reported inability to agree and requested further instructions in prosecution for burglary and stated that they stood eleven to one for conviction, which statement was not made in response to any question by court, instruction that jurors should not be arbitrary, but should listen to arguments of fellow jurors and decide from evidence, not sympathy or prejudice, held not prejudicial error, as indicating evidence pointed to defendant's guilt, or as indicating coercion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Dick Piscitella was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Edward M. Fellows, of Santa Clara, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel B. Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CASHIN, J. Defendant was charged by an information with the crime of burglary and upon trial was convicted. An appeal was taken from the judgment, and it is urged as grounds for reversal that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, that certain remarks of and an instruction by the trial court to the jury, and a ruling upon the admissibility of testimony offered by the defendant were prejudicially erroneous.

According to the testimony of Frank Lauricella, a witness for the prosecution, he with the defendant and one Di Bello, at about 1 o'clock a. m. of December 25, 1926, entered a feed store conducted by Paul Cribari in San Jose, with the intent to remove therefrom a safe containing a sum of money; the safe and its contents being owned by Cribari. An entrance was effected by opening a window, through which they were enabled to unlock the door of the building. After entering it was found that owing to its weight they were unable to remove the safe. They then left the building and drove in an automobile to a resort in San Jose, where they met and procured the assistance of John Taminelli and Tony Barelona. Following this meeting and on the same night the three first mentioned, accompanied by Taminelli and Barelona, again visited the building. On this occasion the lock of the door was broken by Di Bello. An entry was again made and, all the parties assisting, the safe was placed in the automobile and carried away. Tony Barelona was also called as a witness for the prosecution, and testified to meeting the defendant with Di Bello and Lauricella in front of the resort referred to by the latter, and that the three last mentioned were seated in an automobile owned and driven by the defendant; that at the request of the occupants of the automobile the witness entered the same and was driven by the defendant to the Cribari premises. He further testified to a conversation had between the parties previous to their arrival at the Cribari place; his testimony in this connection being as follows:

"Q. After you got into the car where did you go; any particular place? A. No.

"Q. Where did you go? A. Drove around the block a couple of times and we stopped. I don't know whether it was the second or third street where Paul Cribari's was.

"Q. Before you went out to Second street was there any conversation occurred? A. I heard some one say in the car—I don't know whether it was Dick—they went there the first time, somebody said they went out, could not do it, and they came over and got Jack Taminelli and myself.

"Q. What did they say they could not do? A. They could not lift the safe or something.

"Q. Did they say why they came to see you? A. After I was in the car they said they came over for me and Jack to help them because they could not lift the safe.

"Q. When was the first time you knew anything about the burglary? A. That was the same night.

"Q. The same night. You mean when they came to get you? A. Yes.

"Q. Was that the first time that you heard of it? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. At the time you had the conversation, going back a moment, in the automobile going down there who was present at that time and heard the conversation? A. All of us.

"Q. By 'all' you mean who? A. Dick Piscitella, Frank Lauricella, Joe Di Bello, and John Taminelli and myself."

The witness further testified that after his arrival at the Cribari premises he assisted the defendant and the others in removing the safe; his description of this transaction being in substantial agreement with the testimony of Lauricelli. Other witnesses testified to having seen Lauricelli and the defendant together in the latter's automobile shortly before 2 o'clock on the morning the offense was committed.

At the close of the case for the prosecution the district attorney elected to rely for a conviction upon the first entry into the building, and it is urged by the defendant that the corroboration of the testimony of the witness Lauricelli, who admittedly was an accomplice in the commission of the offense, was not sufficient to justify a conviction.

The only evidence in corroboration of that given by the witness Lauricelli which raised more than a suspicion of guilt was that of Barelona; and it is contended that the latter was also an accomplice, and, further, that his testimony, in so far as it related to the first entry into the building, was insufficient to show more than the fact that a crime was committed, and did not tend to connect the defendant therewith.

[1-4] The crime of burglary was complete upon the first entrance into the building with intent to remove the safe. Pen. Code, § 459; People v. Sharp, 58 Cal. App. 637, 209 P. 266. Admittedly Barelona did not participate in the first entry, nor was he connected with the parties to that offense before the same was committed. Under section 32 of the Penal Code he was an accessory thereto; but, as held in People v. Collum, 122 Cal. 186, 54 P. 589, under the laws of this state an accessory is not an accomplice, nor was he such within the following definition found in section 1111 of the Penal Code, namely:

> "An accomplice is hereby defined as one who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial in the cause in which [his] testimony * * * is given."

The statements testified to by the witness Barelona were made in the presence of the defendant by one of his companions, and in effect charged him with having participated in the original burglary. The statements of third persons are not admissible in evidence simply because they were made in the presence and hearing of the accused; but if it is proved that he failed to deny an accusation under circumstances which may be construed as an admission of its truth, or that he failed to act as it might reasonably be expected that an innocent person would act, evidence of the statement is admissible in connection with evidence of his conduct in the face of the accusation. People v. Lew Fat, 189 Cal. 242, 207 P. 881; People v. Matthew, 194 Cal. 273, 228 P. 424; People v. Bradley, 23 Cal. App. 44, 136 P. 955; People v. Porter, 64 Cal. App. 4, 220 P. 20. As the court said in People v. Yeager, 194 Cal. 452, 486, 229 P. 40, 54:

> "Such evidence is not admissible for the purpose of proving the truth of the accusatory statements, but rather as indicating a consciousness of guilt on the part of the accused by allowing an imputation opposed to the presumption of innocence to pass unchallenged. It is for the court in the first instance to determine whether the import of the statements is such that it would furnish a foundation for proof of conduct, and it is then for the jury to decide whether the accused was aware the statements were made, whether, under all the circumstances shown, they call for a disclaimer, whether the accused did reply to them, and whether, if he did not do so, such failure showed criminal intent or a consciousness of guilt. If these propositions of fact are resolved in favor of the prosecution the item of conduct should be given the effect to which upon the entire case it is entitled."

And as held in the following case, an implied admission of guilt may have as much weight as one made in express terms; the evidentiary value in any case being a matter for the jury to determine. People v. Shelest, 62 Cal. App. 213, 216 P. 389. The inference of guilt reasonably to be drawn by the jury from the conduct of the defendant in the face of the statements made in his presence, together with the fact that he transported his associates to the place where it was evident from the conditions described by Barelona a previous entry into the building had been made, and his conduct upon their arrival there, tended strongly to show his connection with the original burglary and were sufficient to corroborate the testimony of Lauricelli, his accomplice.

[5] The defendant sought to impeach the testimony of the witness Lauricelli by evidence of statements made by the latter tending to show a motive for testifying falsely. No foundation was laid for the attempted impeachment and the testimony was properly rejected.

After the jury retired for deliberation they reported that they were unable to agree, and, according to the bailiff, requested further instructions. When brought into court their foreman announced that they had been unable to agree and that they stood eleven to one for conviction. The latter portion of the statement was not made in response to any quesion asked by the court. The court thereupon instructed the jury, the material portion of its instructions being as follows:

> "There was not any intimation whatever as to how you stood. I indicated to you that I did not think you had been out long enough. There is one instruction that I should perhaps have given you, but I looked into your faces and perhaps concluded that it was not necessary. And that was that while it was your duty, the duty of each one of you, to have your individual opinion in a case upon reason, upon the law, don't be arbitrary. You cannot be arbitrary. Eleven cannot be arbitrary; one cannot be arbitrary.

You should be tolerant. You should listen to the arguments of your fellow jurors. You should listen to the statement of the facts of the case as produced here on the witness stand, and after a full consideration of all of the facts and upon the reasoning of your fellow jurors, if any one of you should be convinced—it makes no difference whether for conviction or against conviction—if you should be convinced you are wrong, then it is your duty upon your oaths to change your vote and vote in accordance with your conviction in the case, honest conviction. You cannot decide a criminal case upon sympathy or upon some suspicion or upon something that you see in the case that you do not like exactly, provided you are convinced from the evidence itself, from the legal phases of the case, that your opinion in the case is well founded and your conclusion is right, right from the legal standpoint, from what the court has told you about the law. And it is your duty to decide it from the evidence, and do not decide it upon prejudice or upon sympathy or upon anything outside of the evidence itself. You are bound under your oath to take the evidence as it is produced to you, and the law as given you by the judge, and reach your conclusion, reach a legal conclusion. That is the administration of the law. Anything short of it is not. * * *"

[6] The defendant, in view of the statement made by the foreman of the jury, assigns these remarks and instructions of the court as being prejudicially erroneous.

We find nothing therein which indicated that the trial court viewed the evidence as pointing to the defendant's guilt, nor does the language used indicate coercion. The facts were closely analogous to those in People v. Miles, 143 Cal. 636, 77 P. 666, and People v. Rhodes, 17 Cal. App. 789, 121 P. 935, and we are satisfied that the defendant suffered no prejudice.

After an examination of the entire record, including the evidence, we are convinced that the verdict is fully supported and that there are no grounds for reversal.

KETCHUM v. MASSA et al. (Civ. 5073.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 10, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Conflicting evidence as to cause of automobile accident cannot be revalued by appellate court, and trial court's determination is final.

Where evidence was in decided conflict as to cause of collision between plaintiff's and defendants' trucks, appellate court cannot revalue evidence, and determination of trial court is final.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Whether defendants' driver was intoxicated at time of collision is for trial judge, where evidence conflicts.

Whether driver of defendants' truck colliding with plaintiff's truck was intoxicated is, under conflicting evidence, for trial judge trying case without a jury.

3. Automobiles ⚷243(3)—Evidence that driver of defendants' truck colliding with plaintiff's truck was intoxicated held admissible to enable court to judge driver's testimony as to cause of accident.

In action for property damages resulting from collision of automobile trucks owned by plaintiff and defendants, evidence that driver of defendants' truck was under influence of intoxicating liquor was properly admitted to enable court to properly judge such driver's testimony as to cause of accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by E. R. Ketchum, doing business under the firm name and style of the Atlas Transfer, against G. D. Massa and another, doing business under the firm name and style of the Independent Fish Company, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants named appeal. Affirmed.

Loucks & Phister, of San Pedro, and C. W. Pendleton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Thomas P. White and Vincent C. Hickson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This is an action for property damages resulting from the collision of two autotrucks. The trial was before the court sitting without a jury, and plaintiff was awarded judgment. The defendant Frank Julio defaulted, and neither he nor Jane or John Doe are in this appeal. Motion for new trial was denied, and the remaining defendants appeal, specifying three points.

[1] Point 1: "Plaintiff's negligence was the approximate [proximate] cause of the accident." A heavy truck with trailer, belonging to plaintiff and being driven for him, was proceeding northerly on a paved street. Another truck, belonging to defendants Massa and Memeghine, doing business as the Independent Fish Company, was being driven southerly for them on the same street. Defendants claim that plaintiff's truck was on the wrong side of the road and that defendants' truck was turned to the left, to avoid a head-on collision. Plaintiff claims that his truck was on its right side of the road and that defendants' truck cut in front, attempting to pass to the left. The right front of plaintiff's truck and the right rear wheel of defendants' truck came together. There was some evidence that certain places in the street, in the immediate vicinity of the accident, were dug up. There is also evidence that the tracks of plaintiff's truck showed this vehicle to have at all times been traveling on its right side of the street. This brings to light a decided conflict of testimony, and under the familiar rule this court cannot attempt to revalue the evidence. The determination of the trial court is final in the case.

[2, 3] Point 2: "Evidence of Intoxication." Evidence pro and con was received by the court as to whether or not the driver of defendants' truck was under the influence of intoxicating liquor. The determination of the trial court on this subject, like all other disputed points of fact, lies with the trial judge. Defendants further complain that the testimony was not admissible at all and that its admission was prejudicial, but the court had a right to know whether or not defendants' driver was intoxicated, in order properly to judge his testimony as to the cause of the accident. The evidence was properly admitted.

Point 3: "Findings not supported." We have already passed upon this subject under point 1 as to the cause of the accident. Defendants further complain that there is no evidence that the use of the truck was worth $10 per day for 20 days while it was being repaired, or that it was necessary to take 20 days in its repair. They further contend that the truck may have been just ready to re-enact the part of the deacon's one-horse shay, immortalized by Holmes. Suffice it to say that ample testimony is in the record to support every finding of the court, and the findings support the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

KENNEDY v. MINARETS & W. RY. CO. et al.

(Civ. 3460.) ★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 31, 1928.

1. Negligence 🔑21—Failure of defendant, properly setting fire, to tend it with reasonable prudence constitutes actionable negligence.

Actionable negligence may be established in action for setting fire by proof that defendant, after properly setting it, failed to manage and tend it with reasonable prudence and ordinary care appropriate to the circumstances.

2. Negligence 🔑21—Nature of smoldering substance, nearness of combustible material, and other conditions must be considered in determining whether failure to extinguish fire was negligence.

Character of smoldering substance and nearness of combustible material, and circumstances and conditions generally, must be taken into consideration in determining whether ordinary care has been exercised to extinguish smouldering fire.

3. Negligence 🔑134(2)—Direct proof of place of origin is not required in action for setting fire.

In action for setting fire, direct evidence is not required in order to justify jury in reaching a conclusion as to the origin of the fire.

4. Negligence 🔑134(1)—Plaintiff's burden to establish defendant's negligence in setting fire need only be by preponderance of evidence, without necessity of demonstration or absolute certainty.

While burden of proof is upon plaintiff to prove fire was caused by defendant, in action for negligently setting fire, proof need only be by the preponderance of evidence, and demonstration or absolute certainty is not required.

5. Railroads 🔑482(3)—Verdict for plaintiff held sustained by evidence, in action against railroad, burning grass and rubbish along way, for negligently setting fire to plaintiff's land.

In action against railroad company, engaged in burning grass and rubbish along its right of way, for damages for negligently setting fire to plaintiff's land, evidence of failure of defendant's employees to extinguish fire in log and of proximity of dry grass and other nearby fires held sufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff.

6. Railroads 🔑481(1)—In action against railroad for burning of land July 17, alleged result of fire set July 7, evidence of fire in immediate vicinity on 15th held admissible.

In landowner's action against railroad for setting fire to plaintiff's land through burning of rubbish along right of way on July 7, evidence of occurrence of fire on July 15 held admissible, where defendant's fire left burning stumps and logs, and fire which damaged plaintiff's premises occurred on July 17, especially where evidence of the fire on the 15th was elicited from one of defendant's witnesses without objection.

7. Damages 🔑137—$8,505 actual damages for setting fire held not excessive, in view of evidence of destruction of 2,720 acres of pasture land, fences, cattle, and trees on plaintiff's premises.

In action against railroad for setting fire, verdict for plaintiff for actual damages for $8,505 held not excessive where evidence showed destruction of 2,720 acres of pasture land, of several hundred rods of fences, and of some cattle, together with a large number of trees.

8. Damages 🔑227—In action for negligently setting fire, court may instruct jury to render verdict for treble damages, or may itself allow treble damages on jury's finding of actual damages (Pol. Code, § 3344; Civ. Code, § 3346a).

Under Pol. Code, § 3344, and Civ. Code, § 3346a, permitting treble damages for negligently permitting a fire to extend to other property, court may instruct jury to ascertain actual damages and then treble the same, or may instruct jury to find actual damages and then may itself allow treble damages based on the jury's finding, in action for setting fire.

9. Railroads ⚿483—Award of treble damages held proper in action against railroad for negligent failure to extinguish fire, causing damage to plantiff's land (Pol. Code, § 3344; Civ. Code, § 3346a).

In action against railroad for negligence in setting fire and allowing it to spread to plaintiff's premises by failure to extinguish it, ruining pasture land, fences, and woods, court's allowance of treble damages made on basis of jury's finding as to actual damages held proper, under Pol. Code, § 3344, and Civ. Code, § 3346a, permitting treble damages for negligent setting fire or suffering it to extend to another's property.

10. Damages ⚿227—Proof of negligence alone warrants imposition of treble damages for setting fire (Civ. Code, § 3346a; Pol. Code, § 3344).

Element of negligence alone justifies imposition of treble damages for setting fire or permitting it to spread, under Civ. Code, § 3346a, and Pol. Code, § 3344.

11. Damages ⚿227—Statute imposing treble damages for setting fire held valid exercise of police power (Pol. Code, § 3344; Civ. Code, § 3346a).

Pol. Code, § 3344, and Civ. Code, § 3346a, providing for imposition of treble damages against person negligently setting fire to his own woods or negligently suffering fire to extend beyond his own line, held valid exercise of state's police power and not in violation of Constitution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by Rose R. Kennedy against the Minarets & Western Railway Company and others. From an adverse judgment, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Harry I. Maxim, of Madera, and Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts and Dan F. Conway, all of Fresno, and Herbert J. Goudge, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Barcroft & Barcroft, of Madera, and Conley, Conley & Conley, of Fresno, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. In this action the plaintiff obtained a verdict against the defendant Minarets & Western Railway Company, a corporation, for actual damages in the sum of $8,505, which amount the court thereafter, upon motion, trebled under the provisions of section 3344 of the Political Code and section 3346a of the Civil Code, and thereupon entered judgment. From this judgment the defendant Minarets & Western Railway Company, a corporation, appeals.

The record shows the plaintiff to be the owner of 3,600 acres of land and the lessee of about 600 acres of land situated in the foothills of Madera county, and that the defendant Minarets & Western Railway Company is a corporation and at the time mentioned in the complaint was operating a railroad from a point near Friant, in the county of Fresno, to and extending in a general northeasterly direction into the county of Madera, to a point at or known as Central Camp; that the general course of the line of railroad in the county of Madera was along and near the lands belonging to the plaintiff situate in the county of Madera; that on or about the 7th day of July, 1925, the defendant Minarets & Western Railway Company, by its agents and employees, was engaged in burning grass and rubbish along its right of way in the county of Madera; that on or about said 7th day of July, 1925, while the said railroad company, through its agents and employees, was engaged in burning grass and rubbish along its said right of way, a sudden gust of wind carried the fire beyond the right of way belonging to the railway company, which at the place described is of a width of 100 feet, and set fire to dry grass and rubbish beyond the railway company's right of way. The fire thus started burned over about 160 acres of land belonging to a person other than the plaintiff in this action. Thereafter and on or about the 15th day of July, 1925, another fire took place at or near the scene of the first fire and burned over an area of about 1 acre before it was extinguished. Thereafter and on the 17th day of July, 1925, a third fire occurred (which is the fire involved in this action), which burned over 2,720 acres of land belonging to the plaintiff, which lands were mostly covered by pasturage, but had standing and growing thereon brush and also a certain quantity of timber, which timber the testimony shows to be fit for firewood as hereinafter stated. The fire on the 17th also consumed fences belonging to the plaintiff of some miles in length. Also, the testimony tended to show that two calves and one cow belonging to the plaintiff were burned in said fire. This action is prosecuted to recover the damages occasioned by the fire on the 17th, and which is alleged to have occurred by reason of the negligence of the said defendant, its agents, and employees, in not extinguishing the fire that occurred on the 7th of July, 1925; the theory of the case being that the railway company negligently failed to extinguish fire from certain stumps and logs lying upon the area covered by the first fire and set on fire thereby. The defendant denies that it negligently or otherwise failed to extinguish the fire which occurred on the 7th day of July, 1925, and upon this appeal, sets forth that the testimony is insufficient to support the verdict, on the theory that the fire of the 17th was occasioned by the negligence of the defendant railway company; that the testimony is insufficient to show that the plaintiff suffered the actual damages awarded; that the court erred in the admission of certain testimony; and that the court erred in awarding treble damages.

The testimony shows, practically without contradiction, that after the fire of July 7, 1925, a number of stumps of trees, and particularly a certain bull pine log some 18 or 20 feet in length and about 2 feet in diameter, were left without the fire therein being completely extinguished; that the bull pine log around which the major portion of the testimony circulated was left smoking on the 8th day of July, 1925; and that this bull pine log was within from 3 to 5 feet of a tract of unburned dry grass and also near a clump of underbrush. The record also shows without contradiction that a fire occurred within close proximity to the lot just mentioned and the stumps referred to, on the 15th day of July, 1925, and that on the 17th day of July, 1925, when the fire was first discovered, it was within about 20 feet of the bull pine log mentioned herein. No eyewitness saw the beginning of either the fire on the 15th or of the fire on the 17th of July. There is testimony to the effect that smoke was seen coming from the bull pine log three or four days after the 7th of July, and there is also testimony from a witness on behalf of the defendant that the bull pine log was not on fire on the 17th, at the time the fire was discovered in the dry grass and underbrush within 20 feet thereof.

The appellant sets forth at length extracts from the testimony of different witnesses upon which it bases its claim that the origin of the fire is not traceable to a fire left in the bull pine log herein referred to or to any of the burning stumps of trees left upon the premises included within the area of the first fire. This necessitates a summary of the testimony. A witness by the name of Walker testified that he saw the fire on the 7th day of July, 1925; that he was present at the scene of the conflagration; that he went to the place where the bull pine log lay, and that it was burning; that he saw some men there who were covering the log with dirt; that he said to them that was no way to fight the fire in the log, that the wind would come along and blow it off and blow sparks to the adjacent land; that he told the men there was a spring of water about 150 yards away; that the log was about 18 to 20 feet long and about 2 feet in diameter; that there was a good deal of smoke coming from the log late on the evening of the 7th; that the log was from 3 to 4 feet from the grass line.

A witness named Otis Boss testified that he saw the log on the night of the fire after the grass fire was put out; that the log was still smoking; that it had been covered, or about half of it covered with dirt; that sometime after that, he did not remember the date, he saw the log and it was still smoking; that he saw the log after the big fire on the 17th and it was then burning; that at the time he saw the log before the big fire it was about 3 or 4 feet from the grass line; that after the big fire there was no grass near the log in question; that after the fire of the 7th he saw the log in question three or four times, but that he did not try to put out the fire in the logs; that he thought there was danger in it, but he thought the railroad company had men to watch the logs.

The witness Mrs. Nancy Boss testified that she saw the log in question after the fire of the 7th; that it was still smoking three or four days after the fire on the 7th; she saw no smoke coming from any other quarter except in the direction of the bull pine log; and that before the 17th she did not see smoke coming from any other direction than that in which the bull pine log was located.

The witness Neal Boss testified that he was over the fire line of the 7th, two or three days after it stopped; that he saw logs burning and lots of smoke; that he was at the location of the bull pine log a day or two after the fire of the 7th; that it was partly covered with dirt, and that it was burning at that time; that he saw the bull pine log after the 17th of July; that some of it was still left and was smoldering some; that he did not see smoke coming from any other place except from the log just mentioned, after the 17th, the day of the big fire; that the log in question was 4 or 5 feet from the grass line; that there was a spring of water 150 or 200 yards away; that the spring would have furnished sufficient water to have put out the fire.

The witness J. B. Baker testified that he had lived 25 years in the neighborhood where the fires appeared; that it often happened that a whirlwind would carry fire a long ways.

The witness Kitchell testified that he saw oak stumps burning, one oak stump between 8 and 10 feet in height; that he did not see any one attempting to put out the fire in the particular oak stump.

The witness Hannagan testified that the fire of the 7th burned over about 200 acres; that he went past there every day after the fire; that he noticed several logs burning, but did not notice any one log particularly; that he saw the start of the fire on the 17th, and it appeared to come from the direction of the location of bull pine log.

Rose R. Kennedy, the plaintiff, testified as to a smoke coming from the bull pine log for several days after the fire of the 7th.

The witness Sutherland testified that he saw the bull pine log on the 18th and 19th of July; and that the bull pine log was burning; that more of the log was then burned than had been burned by the fire of July 7th.

James Hughes, an employee of the defendant, testified that he saw logs smoking or burning on July 8th.

Charles Enlow, a witness called on behalf of the defendant, testified that he put some additional dirt on the smoking log in question after the railroad men left; that they left bare spots on the log; that when he got to the log first, they were chopping it off, some of them, and some of them were shoveling dirt on it, and punching out the fire, they were smothering out the fire that was on it at that time; that some of the log was left bare; that it was still smoking when the railroad men left. This witness also testified as to two small fires which occurred about the 15th in the same neighborhood; that he assisted in putting out the fire of the 15th; that the fire of the 15th covered about an acre and a half of ground.

Paul Enlow, another witness for the defendant, testified, on cross-examination, that there were stumps or trees left burning after the fire of the 7th; that the men went away leaving things burning. We here give the questions propounded to this witness and his answers:

> "Q. And they left several stumps burning, did they? A. I think they did.
> "Q. And they went away? A. Yes; but they were out of danger.
> "Q. I know they were, but when they went away, they went away leaving things burning? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. And they did not take any pains to put that out? A. I don't know whether they did afterwards or not.
> "Q. Well, they didn't while you were there? A. No, sir.
> "Q. They went away? A. Lots of them they did put out, and lots of them they did not."

Mr. O'Connor, a witness called on behalf of the defendant, testified as to what was done toward putting out the fire in the bull pine log on the 8th of July; that it was covered with dirt.

The witness Hughes, called by the defendant, testified that he went there on July 8 with two Mexicans; the log was smoldering some and they covered it with dirt; that there was a little smoke coming from another log in the gulch about 150 or 200 feet away; that they cleaned out the grass away from the log in the gulch 20 or 25 feet.

The witness Patton, called by the defendant, testified that the fire in the stumps and in the log was put out by the 10th of July; that he left on the evening of the 10th of July and did not see any smoke coming from the log in question; that he left about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the 10th. There was also testimony to the effect that the 17th of July was a record day for heat. The testimony further shows that at the time of the year in question the whole country was exceedingly dry. Testimony was also admitted as to the fact of there being a severe electrical storm eight hours after the fire of the 17th, but as there appears nothing in the record showing any connection between the electrical storm and the fire which we have been discussing, this subject may be dismissed without further comment. The testimony also shows that at the time the employees of the defendant railway company were engaged in burning grass and rubbish along the highway belonging to the company, the men had with them a car containing a water tank holding about 6,500 gallons of water, but so far as the record shows, no water was used from this tank in putting out the fires in the stumps of trees or fallen logs referred to in the testimony. The only method used in safeguarding against the spread of the fire or its being carried by gusts of wind was by covering the fallen logs with dirt. There was also testimony on the part of the employees of the defendant that they had put out the fires in the stumps and logs within the area covered by the first fire, and also that they had put out the fire in the bull pine log of which we have made particular mention.

Upon this testimony, a résumé of which we have given, it is strongly urged by the appellant that the jury was unwarranted in drawing the inference that the fire of the 17th was communicated to the adjoining dry grass by any fire left smoldering in the bull pine log; that it is unreasonable to infer that the fire smoldered in said log from the 7th to the 17th of July. As against this, there is ample testimony for the jury to conclude that the bull pine log was on fire as late as the 18th or the 19th of July, 1925, which would necessitate the conclusion, if the appellant's theory is correct, that the fire started some feet away from the bull pine log and was communicated to it from the burning dry grass testified to by different witnesses as being distant from the log some 3 to 5 feet. The conclusion is unescapable that the fire went either from the grass to the log or from the log to the grass. The testimony in the record is amply sufficient to show that the log was on fire for a few days after the 7th of July, just how long the testimony does not show. And as we have just stated, the testimony is such that the jury could not escape coming to the conclusion that the log was on fire after the 17th of July. There is no explanation in the record as to how the fire started on the 15th of July. The record does show, however, that it started within the vicinity of smoldering stumps, or of stumps which had been smoldering not far from the bull pine log nor very far from the logs situated within the gulch mentioned by one of the witnesses. There is some testimony to the effect that the fire on the 17th started in the vicinity of a log lying in the gulch referred to by witnesses, which was also smoldering after the fire of the 7th. So far as we have been able to discover, no witnesses testified as to how long a fire will smolder in a log of the variety under consideration in this case. If there is any such testimony in the record, counsel at least have failed to call our attention thereto. The jury had before it, however, testimony from which they could conclude that the following facts were established: That the bull pine log was set on fire on the 7th of July; that it was on fire three or four days thereafter; that a fire occurred on the 15th, origin unknown; that a fire occurred on the 17th, and that the bull pine log was burning on the 18th; that prior to the fire of the 17th, dry grass had been left at a distance of only 3 to 5 feet from the smoldering log. The country in question, at the time of the year involved, was exceedingly dry; gusts of wind were not uncommon; that a whirlwind would carry sparks to a considerable distance. From the premises thus laid down the jury had the duty of drawing an inference as to the origin of the fire of the 17th. That the fire in the bull pine log might have been readily extinguished by putting a little water thereon seems to be unquestioned. The testimony in the record also leads to the conclusion that covering a log with dirt instead of putting out the fire tends to cause it to smolder for a considerable period of time.

In the case of Paiva et al. v. California Door Co., 75 Cal. App. 323, 242 P. 887, this court had before it an action involving inferences as to the origin of a fire. In that case the plaintiff contended that the defendant negligently left smoldering fires in two stumps near the west boundary line of its land, and that the evidence warranted the inference that fire was communicated from one of these stumps to the inflammable pine needles and leaves covering the land where the fire was discovered. This court said:

> "There is no direct evidence that either of these stumps was burning on Monday morning. If they were burning at that time, in the absence of any other evidence as to the origin of the fire, it might be inferred, reasonably that the high wind carried sparks or pieces of burning material from one of the stumps to the place where the fire started."

The court then set forth the evidence tending to show that there was fire in these stumps, and held, after a summary of the evidence, that the question as to the origin of the fire and that the fire might have followed from being blown from said stumps to the adjoining combustible material by the wind was a question to be submitted to the jury, and, in the absence of explanation as to how the fire started, it was not unreasonable to infer that the origin of the fire was in said smoldering stumps. In the Paiva Case the defendant's employees were engaged in burning on defendant's property on Saturday, and quit work at about 3 o'clock on that day; that a fire broke out on the premises involved, Sunday night; that the fire which did the damage in the Paiva Case started some time on the following Monday. The testimony in the Paiva Case also showed that a very high wind was blowing on the day the fire started. In considering the question as to leaving smoldering fire in stumps, this court further said:

> "It is not intended, of course, to express any opinion as to the weight of the evidence produced at the trial, but, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, as is required on a motion for a nonsuit, sufficient [evidence] appears to prove a prima facie case in favor of plaintiff. It cannot be said as a matter of law that it is not negligence to leave burning stumps unguarded during the dry season in close proximity to lands covered with trees, brush, leaves, and grass. It is reasonably to be anticipated that a wind may carry sparks from the burning stumps to the inflammable materials on the adjacent lands."

In Young v. San Joaquin Light & Power Co., 257 P. 152, this court had before it an action involving damages alleged to have been caused by a fire negligently left to smolder by the defendant. It is there held that the leaving of a smoldering fire within 10 or 12 feet of inflammable material when a wind was blowing from the fire toward the plaintiff's property presented to the trial court a question of fact as to negligence, and also a question of fact as to the cause of the fire, and that the trial court was justified in concluding that from such facts the fire under consideration was caused. It may be stated further that in that case the testimony showed that the premises where the fire started were inclosed by a fence where the gate through which entrance was usually had thereto was ordinarily kept locked. The testimony in the Young Case showed that for some little time after the fire had been started by the defendant's employees, smoke was seen rising from the premises. In the case just cited this court took up and referred to a number of other cases relative to the negligence of the defendant in starting and negligently leaving fires unguarded (citing, also, the case of Paiva v. California Door Co., supra). The court also cited cases as to inferences to be drawn as to negligence of a defendant from not taking proper precautions to extinguish a fire which had been lawfully started.

character that a fire might be retained therein for a considerable period of time and fanned by a gust of wind, a strong wind, or a whirlwind, and sparks therefrom carried to combustible substances nearby. The nearness of the combustible substance would also present a question to be considered in determining whether ordinary care had been taken to extinguish the smoldering fire. In this case, where the combustible substances were shown to have been within 3 to 5 feet, and the fire was smoldering in a substance likely to retain fire for a considerable period of time, the care required to be ordinary care might, as to dissimilar circumstances and where the damage was not so close or imminent, be classed as the highest possible degree of care. In other words, the circumstances and conditions must be taken into consideration to determine whether ordinary care has or has not been exercised. Again, direct evidence is not required in order to justify a jury in reaching a conclusion as to the origin of a fire. In the case of Dibble v. San Joaquin Light & Power Co., 47 Cal. App. 112, 190 P. 198, we find the following:

> "Appellants also claim that there is no evidence to show that the employees in question either started the fire or failed to extinguish it, or that they negligently permitted it to spread. While it is true there is no direct evidence as to the origin of the fire, the trial court had the right to make any logical, reasonable deduction, which the admitted facts and the undisputed testimony of the witness McCabe permitted. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 176, 116 P. 530. It is a fair inference that the flames which destroyed plaintiff's property were communicated thereto by the fire, which originated on the right of way of defendants, and which had its origin in one or other of the instrumentalities used by defendants' employees in their work. Reuter v. San Pedro, etc., Co., 37 Cal. App. 277, 283, 174 P. 927; St. Paul Fire, etc., Co. v. Southern Pac. Co., 30 Cal. App. 140, 142, 157 P. 247; Fay v. Cox, 45 Cal. App. 696, 188 P. 623; Toledo, etc., Co. v. Fenstermaker, 163 Ind. 534, 72 N. E. 561, 562; Roundtree v. Mt. Hood, etc., Co., 86 Or. 147, 168 P. 61. It is equally clear to us that the employees of defendants were guilty of gross carelessness in not properly controlling and extinguishing the fire when their attention was directed by McCabe to the probability of its spreading. It was burning in tall, dry grass near the adjacent fields of stubble and grain, and it should not have required any warning to apprize them of this imminent danger."

In the case of Cobb v. Twitchell (Fla.) 108 So. 186, 45 A. L. R. 865, the court, in considering testimony as to negligently leaving a fire, stated the rule as follows:

> "In the absence of a controlling statute, such negligence will not be presumed, but must be proved; the burden being upon the party alleging it. Such negligence, however, may be predicated not alone upon the circumstances under which the fire was kindled, or upon a failure to observe requisite precautions preliminary thereto, but may be established as well by appropriate proof that the defendant, after properly setting out the fire, failed to manage and attend it with reasonable prudence and ordinary care appropriate to the circumstances" (citing a number of authorities).

And further, as to the question of care in extinguishing a fire, said:

> "Upon the state of facts before us and in the absence of mitigating circumstances, a jury might reasonably conclude that the defendant or his servants did not observe reasonable prudence and ordinary care under the circumstances in that they were not sufficiently thorough in extinguishing the original fire, or that the fire guard constructed by them, in its dimensions or manner of construction, was not adequate or suitable under the circumstances," etc.

The fire in the case of Cobb v. Twitchell was one that broke out a few hours after the agents of the defendant had supposed it was extinguished. The fire they had started and supposed they had extinguished was near dry grass, brush, and other combustible material. None of the witnesses seem to know how the fire started two hours after they had supposed it had been extinguished. Appended to the case of Cobb v. Twitchell, supra, is an extended note wherein may be found a number of cases having to do with damages occasioned by fires, and supporting the text of the case from which we have just quoted.

[4] In the case of Viera v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 10 Cal. App. 267, 101 P. 690, an action involving damages by fire, the court, in considering the sufficiency of proof, used the following language which is applicable to the case at bar:

> "The burden was upon plaintiff to prove that the fire was caused by defendant; that it was also due to defendant's negligence; but such proof need only be by a preponderance of evidence, and such as to satisfy and produce conviction in an unprejudiced mind. The law does not require demonstration, or absolute certainty, because such proof is rarely possible. Moral certainty only is required. We must call in aid of the verdict all deductions which the jury could make from the facts proved. Nearly all cases are determined on the reasonable probability of the fact being as found."

In Hudspeth v. St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co., 172 Mo. App. 579, 155 S. W. 868, in an action involving damages occasioned by sparks from a railroad engine where a barn situate some distance from a railroad track was burned, the court, in speaking of the proof required, held as follows:

> "There was no direct proof that defendant's engine, which passed a short time before the fire was discovered, actually emitted sparks or fire, nor any positive testimony that such sparks, if emitted, could, on the day in question, have been blown the distance to plaintiff's hay and remained hot enough to ignite it. The evidence to make out liability on the part of the defendant was, as is usual in these cases, purely circumstantial. Nevertheless the probable origin of the fire may be shown by circumstantial evidence; provided the circumstances relied upon are consistent and tend in a substantial way to support the claim of plaintiff, and make it probable, and justify a reasonable inference, that the fire was caused by sparks from defendant's engine" (citing Campbell v. Railroad, 121 Mo. 340, 25 S. W. 936, 25 L. R. A. 175, 42 Am. St. Rep. 530; Waddell v. Railway Co., 146 Mo. App. 604, 124 S. W. 588; Foster v. Railroad, 143 Mo. App. 547, 128 S. W. 36; Market v. Railroad, 139 Mo. App. 456, 122 S. W. 1142; Tapley v. Railroad, 129 Mo. App. 88, 107 S. W. 470; Lead Co. v. Railroad, 123 Mo. App. 394, 101 S. W. 636; Wright v. Railroad, 107 Mo. App. 209, 80 S. W. 927).

What we have here said is also supported by the following cases: Bowles v. Hickson, 22 Cal. App. 264, 133 P. 1149; Reuter v. San Pedro R. R. Co., 37 Cal. App. 277, 174 P. 927; McGillivray v. Hampton, 39 Cal. App. 726, 179 P. 733.

[5] The jury in this case had before it the question as to the reasonable probability of the fire being communicated to the nearby grass from the smoldering fire left in the bull pine log. In addition to what we have said, the testimony shows that the grass in the neighborhood of the log was very short, and also had been burned around the log by the fire of July 7th, leaving an intervening space of between 3 and 5 feet. Under all the circumstances disclosed, we think the jury was warranted in coming to the conclusion that it was reasonably probable that the fire started from the log and was communicated from the log to the adjoining short grass, rather than the short grass communicating any fire to the log on July 17th. We think the testimony is also sufficient to justify the jury in concluding that the agents of the defendant had not used reasonable precautions in extinguishing the fire in the burning log. In this particular the evidence tends to show that what was done would cause the fire to smolder for a considerable period of time rather than to extinguish it. We also think that the jury was justified in concluding that the fire smoldered during the entire period of time in the bull pine log; the testimony showing that there was a smoldering fire in the log some days after the fire of July 7th, that a fire occurred on the 15th in the same neighborhood, that a fire occurred on the 17th, and the log was shown by the testimony to be still on fire on the 18th of July, laid the foundation justifying the jury in reasonably concluding that the origin of the fire of the 17th was from the fire left smoldering in the bull pine log.

[6] The appellant urges that the admission of testimony as to the fire which occurred on July 15th was prejudicial and constitutes sufficient ground for reversal. This contention we think untenable. The fires mentioned were all so closely connected as to constitute a series of circumstances tending to show the origin of the fire. The fire of the 7th of July left burning stumps and logs. In the immediate vicinity of these burning stumps and logs a fire occurred on the 15th, and again on the 17th, and, as shown by the testimony, burning logs were on the premises on the 18th of July. The objection urged by the appellant we think completely answered in 12 California Jurisprudence, p. 533, § 10, which reads as follows:

> "Where it is claimed that a fire was caused by sparks thrown from an engine, it is permissible to introduce evidence of other fires caused by the same engine in the same vicinity and about the same time, or to show facts tending to prove that other fires were so caused. The admission of such evidence is a question of policy and expediency in view of the pressing necessity of resorting to circumstantial evidence in a case in which direct evidence is not ordinarily to be had. So, also, evidence of fires emitted or dropped by other engines of the defendant in the vicinity and about the time of the fire is admissible, particularly when the particular engine throwing the sparks which caused the fire complained of is not identified. Questions as to the proximity of time and place to which the proofs must be confined can only be determined in view of the circumstances as the testimony is offered. Evidence of other fires within a few days of the fire in question is proper."

The record in this case, however, further shows that after making objection to the testimony of one witness concerning the fire of the 15th, evidence was elicited from one of the defendant's witnesses showing all the circumstances of the fire of the 15th of July, and this testimony was all admitted without any objection on the part of the appellant. The objection of the appellant as to the ruling of the court in excluding testimony as to an entirely disconnected fire upon premises belonging to another party at a considerable distance from the scene of the fire in controversy is likewise without merit.

[7] The appellant also contends that the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, finding actual damages, is unwarranted by the testimony. The record, as we have stated, shows that 2,720 acres of pasture land was destroyed. The record also shows that in addition to the pasture land several hundred rods of fences were destroyed; also two calves and one cow. There is also testimony in the record which we have heretofore stated, that upon the premises within the burned area were a large number of trees suitable for firewood; that these trees were all burned. The testimony of different witnesses was to the effect that these trees would yield about 25,000 tiers of firewood of a value of between 50 and 60 cents per tier. The appellant in its summary of the damages shown by the testimony sets forth the following figures: "Pasturage, $2,720; fences, $1,000; stock, $125; total, $3,845." No figures whatever are inserted showing the estimated damage or loss occasioned by the burning of the standing trees. The testimony as to the trees shows an amount which, added to the statement of the appellant, would largely exceed the actual damages allowed by the jury. It is also to be observed that the appellant does not include in its estimate of damages any of the testimony relative to the injury to the pasture land. The record contains evidence that the injury to the real estate was something over $4 per acre; that the market value of the land preceding the fire was something over $12 per acre; and that after the fire it was of the value of only $8 per acre. These figures, amply supported by the testimony, show that the jury was warranted in finding actual damages in the sum named in its verdict.

[8, 9] Appellant finally urges that the court erred in awarding treble damages, and in this particular cites a long list of cases having to do with punitive damages in cases where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, as specified under section 3294 of the Civil Code. It would serve no useful purpose to take up and analyze the different cases cited by the appellant, and it is sufficient to say that none of them are based upon Code provisions such as we have in the state of California. The cases relied upon by the appellant have to do only with ordinary trespasses where punitive damages are allowed when the trespass has been accompanied by malice, express or implied.

Section 3346a of the Civil Code reads:

> "Every person negligently setting fire to his own woods, or negligently suffering any fire to extend beyond his own land, is liable in treble damages to the party injured."

The same identical words appear in section 3344 of the Political Code. Consideration of these sections has been had by the Supreme Court of this state in the following cases: Sampson v. Hughes, 147 Cal. 62, 81 P. 292; Galvin v. Gualala Mill Co., 98 Cal. 268, 33 P. 93; Garnier v. Porter, 90 Cal. 105, 27 P. 55. The sections of the Code quoted and the case cited, as well as the case of Paiva v. California Door Co., supra, show that two questions are involved: First, negligently setting fire; second, negligently permitting the fire to escape and burning the property belonging to others. The cases also cited show that in the procedure awarding treble damages, all that is required is that certainty in the fixing of the damages be shown; that is, that the court may instruct the jury to ascertain the actual damages, to find the actual damages, and then treble the same, or may instruct the jury to find actual damages and then when the verdict of the jury is brought in fixing the actual damages, treble damages may be allowed by the court. In this case the verdict of the jury was for actual damages, and upon this finding of the jury as to actual damages, treble damages were allowed. Thus, absolute certainty in the procedure was obtained.

[10, 11] The statute under consideration includes only the element of negligence, and when that is found justifies the imposition of treble damages. That such statutes are constitutional is supported by the overwhelming weight of authority. In Eastman v. Jennings McRay Logging Co., 69 Or. 1, 138 P. 216, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 185, the constitutionality of a similar act was considered and the act upheld. This case, as reported in Ann. Cas. 1916A, supra, is accompanied by an extended note quoting the cases upholding such statutes. The principle upon which such statutes are upheld is thus stated:

> "It is within the power of the Legislature to impose on railroad companies an absolute liability for fire started by locomotives." St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Shore, 89 Ark. 418, 117 S. W. 515, 16 Ann. Cas. 939, and note; Union Pacific Ry. Co. v. De Busk, 12 Colo. 294, 20 P. 752, 3 L. R. A. 350, 13 Am. St. Rep. 221, and note.

And it has been held that the power extends to the imposition on such companies of liability for treble damages irrespective of negligence. Jensen v. South Dakota Ry. Co., 25 S. D. 506, 127 N. W. 650, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1015, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 700. The exercise of such a power is justified, however, only on the peculiar dangers of fire attendant on the operation of railroads. In the reported case it is held that a statute imposing on an individual an absolute liability for actual damages from a fire started accidentally or unavoidably is invalid. The validity of a statute imposing a double or treble liability for damages resulting from the destruction of property by fire occurring through the negligence, willfulness, or malice of the person who kindles it, or allows it to get beyond his control, has uniformly been sustained (citing a long list of authorities). As will be observed by studying the note referred to, the statutes differ somewhat in phraseology, some of them making the allowance of double or treble damages depend upon either negligence, willfulness or malice. None of them, however, require the presence of all three of the elements just stated. Our statute includes only the element of negligence. See, also, the case of Jensen v. South Dakota Ry. Co., 25 S. D. 509, 127 N. W. 650, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1015, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 700, and cases cited in an appended note. The danger from fires in a dry country like California is so great as to justify the police power of the state in imposing treble damages, and in no country is the necessity for greater care being exercised against the spread of fires than in the San Joaquin Valley during the summer months where conditions are always favorable for extensive conflagrations and the absence of moisture rendering the extinguishment of fires, when once started, so difficult. All of these considerations justify the exercise of the police power of the state in imposing damages, such as to insure the reasonable care and precautions necessary under the conditions so existing.

Finding no cause for reversal herein, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WOODS. (Cr. 1589.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 10, 1928.

Criminal law 🔑419, 420(1)—Testimony as to codefendant's statement admitting that he committed murder with which defendant was charged held hearsay.

In prosecution for murder, testimony of witness that she heard codefendant admit to defendant's wife that he, and not the defendant, had committed the murder, held incompetent, as hearsay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Ray Woods was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Stanley Visel and Martin S. Ryan, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant and one Leon Davis were jointly charged by indictment with the crime of murder. At the time of the trial Davis, known as Butch, had not been apprehended. Woods was tried alone and convicted by the jury of the crime of manslaughter. The trial court denied his motion for new trial, and this appeal is from the verdict and judgment, and from the order denying said motion.

The only point seriously contended for as a ground for reversal is that the following testimony offered on behalf of the defendant should have been received, and that it was error to deny a subsequent tender to prove the conversation suggested by the questions propounded to the witness:

"Q. Did you have any conversation at that time with this man you call Butch? A. Well, I didn't particularly have a conversation; Mrs. Woods was talking to him.

"Q. You were present at that time? A. I was present.

"Q. Tell us what was said."

Objection to the question upon the ground that it called for hearsay, and was incompetent and improper, was sustained. Thereafter a tender of proof was made on behalf of the defendant that the witness would swear that she overheard appellant's codefendant admit to Mrs. Woods that he (Davis), and not Woods, committed the murder.

It has repeatedly been held that such evidence is hearsay and incompetent, and we think the rulings of the trial court proper in the instant case. People v. Flood, 41 Cal. App. 373, 182 P. 766; People v. Raber, 168 Cal. 316, 143 P. 317.

We have read the transcript carefully, and are satisfied that the evidence is amply sufficient to warrant the verdict.

The judgment and order denying motion for new trial are affirmed.

We concur: WORKS, P. J.; THOMPSON, J.

PEOPLE v. CALKINS. (Cr. 1604.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 9, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑1130(2)—Reviewing court need not notice appellant's points, where particular error is not pointed out.

On appeal from conviction for rape, reviewing court is not required to notice points that "trial court committed error in its ruling," that entire action in giving and refusing instructions was erroneous, and that evidence is insufficient to support verdict.

2. Criminal law 🔑730(6)—Argument relating to incidental and collateral matter in rape case held not misconduct justifying reversal, where on objection court informed district attorney argument was unwarranted.

In prosecution for rape, argument of district attorney relating to incidental and collateral matter held not misconduct constituting ground for reversal, where on objection court informed him argument was unwarranted, but gave no express direction to jury to disregard it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edward T. Bishop, Judge.

Delmar Calkins was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ira L. Brunk, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Warner I. Praul, of Los Angeles, for the People.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. [1] Defendant, who was convicted of rape, appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. His brief is almost devoid of argument. As to ten alleged errors, he contents himself with setting forth in an appendix to his brief the rulings complained of and declaring as to each one that "the trial court committed error in its ruling." He also states that the entire action of the trial court in giving and refusing instructions was erroneous, without assigning any reason for this statement, and claims that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, without pointing out any deficiency therein. We are not required to notice points made in this manner. We have, however, looked at the rulings shown in the brief and see no error in them, and have also examined the record sufficiently to ascertain that there is evidence in support of the verdict and that the action of the court in the matter of instructions appears to be correct.

[2] The other point made is that his motion for a new trial should have been granted because of misconduct of the district attorney in his argument to the jury. This alleged misconduct is shown only by an affidavit which was filed at the hearing of the motion for a new trial. This affidavit shows no prejudicial error. When objection was made to the district attorney's argument, the court at once informed him that it was unwarranted, and while no express direction was given to the jury to disregard the argument, the district attorney formally acquiesced and abandoned the argument. The argument complained of related to a mere incidental and collateral matter, and the misconduct was not of such a grave character as to constitute ground for a reversal under these circumstances.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

BUFFALO WEAVING & BELTING CO. v. BOYLE MFG. CO. (Civ. 4870.)★

Rehearing Denied May 4, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 7, 1928.

1. Sales ⟹384(6)—Contract to purchase straps to be manufactured held breached, as respects damages, as of date of seller's declaration, after extension.

Where seller of automobile luggage straps to be manufactured permitted extensions of delivery period for more than year, date of purchaser's breach as respects damages was fixed by seller's declaration of breach; reasonable time for shipping instructions having expired.

2. Sales ⟹384(6)—Market value of straps to be manufactured on date of breach should have been excluded on objection thereto as basis for damages (Civ. Code, §§ 3300, 3353).

In action for damages for alleged breach of contract under which defendant agreed to purchase automobile luggage straps to be manufactured by plaintiff, testimony by plaintiff's president as to market price of straps on date breach was declared should have been excluded, under Civ. Code, §§ 3300, 3353, on objection that market value was not proper basis for measuring damages.

3. Trial ⟹89—Motion to strike improper testimony of market value solely on ground contract was not breached on date involved held properly denied.

Where objection to testimony of market value as improper basis for measuring damages for buyer's breach of contract to purchase luggage straps to be manufactured was improperly overruled with leave to move to strike, buyer's subsequent motion to strike such testimony on the sole ground that contract was not breached on date in question was properly denied, where trial court correctly determined that contract was breached as of such date.

4. Sales ⟹384(6)—As respects damages, seller's loss for breach of contract to buy straps to be manufactured held difference between manufacturing cost and contract price (Civ. Code, § 3300).

Seller's loss under contract for sale of automobile luggage straps to be manufactured by seller held, under the proof, one of loss of profits, being the difference between costs of manufacturing in the finished, ready to deliver state and the contract price, and seller's damages were ascertainable under Civ. Code, § 3300, providing for damages compensating for detriment proximately caused and which in ordinary course of things would be likely to result, and not under section 3353, authorizing recovery of difference between contract price and market value.

5. Sales ⟹383—Evidence held insufficient to authorize seller's recovery of any damages for buyer's breach of contract to purchase straps to be manufactured.

In action for damages for breach of contract under which defendant agreed to purchase automobile luggage straps to be manufactured by plaintiff, evidence held insufficient to authorize recovery of any sum as damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

On rehearing. Former opinion superseded, and judgment reversed.

For former opinion, see 262 P. 783.

G. C. DeGarmo and H. B. Cornell, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This is an action for damages for the alleged breach of a contract, under which defendant agreed to purchase a large quantity of web automobile luggage straps from plaintiff. The contract is based on an order and correspondence had between plaintiff and defendant directly and through plaintiff's agent, with headquarters in San Francisco. For convenience, we shall occasionally refer to plaintiff as the "Weaving Company," to defendant as "Boyle Company" or "Boyle," and to the San Francisco representative of plaintiff as "agent." Judgment went for plaintiff according to the prayer of the complaint, and defendant appeals.

The case is here on a bill of exceptions, which contains some oral testimony and a number of letters. For convenience, the essentials of the letters have been condensed under our own numbers, which do not conform to numbers used in the transcript.

The negotiations begin with letter No. 1, from agent to Boyle, April 22, 1920. Agent solicits business for his principal Weaving Company herein, and states that Weaving Company "would like to have * * * sample of your trunk strap." Advises it would be good time to place order for next season, with shipment later.

Letter No. 2 April 23, 1920. Boyle replies, asking quotations on 50,000 to 75,000 for future delivery; 10,000, immediate delivery.

Letter No. 3, April 27, 1920, agent to Boyle. He has communicated with his principal for low quotations and—

> "We are pretty well sold up on trunk straps, but if we should take on our [sic] order for a quantity of 50,000 to 75,000 for future delivery, I assume it would mean sometime in September or October, and that would give us ample time to get these made up."

Letter No. 4, May 10, 1920, agent to Boyle, quoting $40 per gross f. o. b. Buffalo, subject to change. Wire reply so buckle can be arranged for.

Letter No. 5, May 11, 1920, Boyle Company to agent:

> "We are in receipt of your favor of the 10th inst. quoting $40 per gross f. o. b. Buffalo on quantities of 50,000 to 75,000 1¼" 6' Trunk Straps, as per sample submitted, and herewith inclose our order No. 280 covering 80,000 of same. We would ask you to kindly wire this order in to your factory and ask them to make a 'special rush' of the 10,000 referred to in order. The order is, of course, placed on the understanding that these straps will match up with the samples submitted."

The order was dated May 11, 1920, inclosed with letter No. 5, and, omitting salutation, signature, and two or three additional but nonessential requirements under subtitle "Important Instructions," is as follows:

> "Enter our order as follows, for shipment:
> * * * Route via Santa Fé at Chicago
> Terms ——. Order No. 280.
> Quantity Description
> 80,000 6' Straps made from 1¼" Russet Trunk. Web $40.00 per gross f. o. b. Buffalo.
> Complete with nickle plated buckle and tip, as per sample submitted.
> "N. B.—10,000 of the above to be shipped very earliest possible—balance later.
> "Important Instructions.—Please acknowledge receipt of this order, show price and state when shipment will be made."

Letter No. 6, May 13, 1920, agent to Boyle, acknowledges order.

Letter No. 7, May 14, 1920, agent to Boyle. Received information permitting him to assume 10,000 will be shipped within a month.

Letter No. 8, Weaving Company to Boyle, May 18, 1920. Acknowledgment of order No. 280. In good position to get off first lot of straps. Only waiting for express shipment of buckles to rush forward. Fortunate webbing on hand.

Letter No. 9, May 24, 1920, agent to Boyle. Sending to-day's mail sample web strap. Different from stock strap; therefore would like approval.

Letter No. 10, May 26, 1920, Boyle to agent:

> Strap O. K. "In regard to shipment of this order, as previously advised, we wish 10,000 straps shipped at the earliest possible moment. The balance of the order, however, we do not want shipped until about the first of next year. * * * We would ask that you take up the matter of shipping instructions with us some time about the 1st of December. * * * We are wondering if we would be protected on this order in the event of a decline in price prior to date of shipment."

Letter No. 11, May 28, 1920, agent to Boyle. Order simply stated, as to delivery after first 10,000, "balance later." Agent quite sure Weaving Company inferred they were to make up and ship from time to time as completed. Weaving Company arranging for raw material on this basis. Writing as to protection against factory price decline. "Manufacturing conditions abnormal; help and raw materials scarce. If you could permit us to make monthly shipments, beginning about July 1st, you would then be sure of a sufficient quantity to take care of your requirements, instead of making shipment to you of the entire order complete, some time after December 1st."

Letter No. 12, June 2, 1920, Boyle to agent:

> Note you have written Weaving Company about price decline. We appreciate factory position. Apart from the 10,000 straps will need none until spring. "We do not think it unreasonable to ask you to protect us against your own decline, a practice quite common in our own business. * * * In regard to shipping instructions, we could agree to your making monthly shipments commencing about the 1st of October and ending January 1st, 1921."

Letter No. 13, June 4, 1920, agent to Boyle:

> Have written Weaving Company about protecting you against factory price decline and reason you ordered early was to be sure having straps in time. "I fully agree with you that as a rule, orders of this kind are taken with a protection against the manufacturer's own decline. I am quite sure there will be no question about this, but would prefer to have this come direct from my principals. * * * Also note your shipping instructions, commencing about October 1/20 and ending January 1/21."

Letter No. 14, June 7, 1920, agent to Boyle:

> "Our people inform me they will protect you against their own decline, although they say you must take into consideration the fact that they * * * have had to buy this material outright * * * and can get no protection. * * * Now further, with reference to shipment, they state it would be some little time before they complete the first 10,000 straps, and in view of increasing freight congestion * * * they feel it would be well for you to have these monthly shipments coming along to you, and in that way you would be assured of having the straps on hand; whereas if you call upon us to furnish the entire quantity in two or three months we might be held up owing to * * * contingencies that might arise. * * * Furthermore, it would mean we would have to accumulate a lot of web for the next five or six months, before we start on your order. Inasmuch as we are going to protect you in our own decline in price, you will undoubtedly yield to our point of making monthly shipments, as we shall certainly not crowd you with an enormous amount of goods each month. When they wrote their letter they did not have my letter with reference to beginning shipments Oct. 1st and ending about January 1, '21. I am in hopes, however, when they receive these instructions, they will be able to make up the straps and get them ready to ship monthly, beginning October 1st and completing the entire order by January 1, '21. If, however, you will permit us to begin shipments a little earlier, will be glad to have you advise us."

Letter No. 15, June 15, 1920, agent to Boyle:

"They [respondent company] feel inasmuch as you are permitting them to make monthly shipments beginning October 1 and ending January 1, 1921, this is very satisfactory, and as I have already informed you we would protect you in the event of a decline in our own price."

Letter No. 16, July 9, 1920, agent to Boyle. Refers to another order.

Letter No. 17, October 28, 1920, Weaving Company to Boyle. Adjusting shipments to date at $32 per gross.

No. 18, telegram, Boyle to agent, November 30, 1920:

"Cancellation of many orders for automobile accessories necessitate our cancellation of all orders on your files unshipped at this date."

Letter No. 19, November 30, 1920, Boyle to Weaving Company. Incloses telegram sent agent. Regrets necessity of cancellation because of lack of orders.

Letters No. 20 and No. 21, November 30 and December 6, 1920, Weaving Company to Boyle. Acknowledge receipt of concellation telegram and advise consultation with agent. "Asking him to take the matter up with you, as he did the original order."

Letter No. 22, December 7, 1920, agent to Boyle. Gives history of deal and argument:

"At the time you placed this order with us, it was undoubtedly placed in good faith, and our people accepted the same at a fixed price, with the understanding that in the event of a decline on our own price, we would protect you and give you the benefit of same. * * * However, we gave you the benefit of a decline of 20 per cent. unsolicited, and it has been our intention that in the event of our making further declines that we continue to give you the benefit of same on unfilled portion of your order. Now our people do not feel as though they should accept cancellation of this order, as you will recall when it was placed we had to commit ourselves for the hardware, which we purchased at a fixed price, without any protection in the event of a decline by the manufacturer. We have all this material in our plant, and all paid for. Now there is no doubt but what you are going to want these straps as soon as business revives, which we all hope will be shortly after the first of the year. Our people feel you should be willing to allow the order to stand on our books for future shipment. We have a lot of straps all made up for shipment this month, and trust you will permit us to send them along, as they are made up special to your order."

Letter No. 23, December 11, 1920, Boyle to agent:

"Your letter of the 7th inst. regarding cancellation of our order on made up web straps received and contents noted. Your proposal to keep this order on your books for future shipment is agreeable to us, but we wish it to be understood that no part of this order is to be shipped without written instructions from us to that effect." Hopes business conditions will soon permit permission to ship part of order.

Letter No. 24, December 13, 1920, agent to Boyle. Appreciate your position. Believe revival of business about first of year. Believe Boyle probably be asking for shipments by first of year. "If there is any further declines our people propose to give you the benefit of same."

Letter No. 25, December 21, 1920, Weaving Company to Boyle:

"We have heard from our Mr. Wirtner [agent] with reference to your order, and have noted the correspondence which you have had with him. We are very glad indeed that you have decided to keep this order on our books, and we earnestly hope that conditions will improve so that you will find the usual heavy demand for your goods. You will see that we are going to protect you on declines and shall do all in our power to give you good service in every way."

Letter No. 26, October 5, 1921, agent to Boyle. Complains about not receiving orders. Reminds Boyle buckles purchased. Asks for webbing business.

Letter No. 27, November 12, 1921, Weaving Company to Boyle. Calling attention to special buckles carried for Boyle's work, and asks for orders.

Letter No. 28, November 21, 1921, Boyle to agent:

Checked over stock. "* * * We have * * * enough to give us a good start for the coming season. We will, however, undoubtedly be in the market later on for a further supply of this commodity, and you will certainly hear from us as soon as the writer is able to get a better line on what our requirements are likely to be."

Letter No. 29, November 23, 1921, agent to Boyle. Appreciate advising conditions. Very much like to receive your order, but very glad to hold special buckles until your requirements bring you in the market.

Letter No. 30, February 11, 1922, Weaving Company to agent. Expresses disappointment regarding Boyle orders, and says:

> "Their promise to give us an opportunity of figuring when they are in the market does not sound good to us; we want some relief. * * * Our loss on the web is not so serious as the buckles, as we have, of course, other uses for the webbing. If he can't use the straps we want shipping instructions on the buckles which were ordered especially for him. We want no profit and are willing to bill them out to him at cost."

Letter No. 31 February 15, 1922, agent to Boyle. About the same as letter No. 30. Suggests buckles be taken off their hands.

Letter No. 32, February 18, 1922, Boyle to agent. Declines to receive buckles. Hopes for revival of business. "Rest assured that we will place no strap orders without consulting you."

Letter No. 33, March 1, 1922, is a bill for the buckles, sent to Boyle. (But buckles were not shipped.)

Letter No. 34, March 8, 1922, Boyle to agent. Returns buckle invoice. Says charge not in order at this time. Will give additional order in line with agent's order of November 23d.

Letter No. 35 (no date), Weaving Company to Boyle:

> Recites history of deal. Demands shipping instructions for rest of order to specify shipping within three months after receipt of instructions at the factory decline price, if any, not to exceed $40 per gross at time of shipment. "If we do not receive shipping instructions from you as above outlined within the time mentioned, we shall consider you in default and that you have breached your contract with us, and that the modification of the contract to guarantee you against our decline in price having been made on your agreement to take the straps out in a certain time, and you not having done so, that such modification is of no further force or effect, and that the original agreement to pay $40 per gross is reinstated, and that our damage will be the difference between such $40 per gross and the market price, whatever it may be at the time of your default."

Letter No. 36, April 25, 1922, Boyle to Weaving Company. Acknowledges receipt of last letter from Weaving Company. Surprised attitude assumed. States they are purchasing no straps from other source. Assures Weaving Company will purchase from them when in need.

Letter No. 37, February 7, 1923, Boyle to Weaving Company. States conditions are such that they can use 3,000 more straps, and orders same.

Letter No. 38, February 16, 1923, Weaving Company to Boyle. Refers to former correspondence and states they have placed the matter in attorney's hands.

No goods other than the 1,400 gross delivered and paid for were ever shipped. Suit was brought on the 13th of February, 1923, whereby plaintiff sought to recover the sum of $6,755.50 damages, estimated by deducting the market price of straps as of the date of defendant's letter of April 25, 1922, from the contract price. According to the complaint and the testimony of the president of the plaintiff corporation, this sum as damages is arrived at as follows: $40 per gross contract price, less $25.25 per gross market price, times 458 gross undelivered, equals $6,755.50.

The pleadings make it unnecessary for us here to consider the element referred to in the correspondence as "factory decline in price."

Appellant herein (Boyle Company) contends that the original contract was voluntarily nullified and that another and different contract became effective by the exchange of the cancellation telegram, the reply thereto, and appellant's letter of December 11, 1920. The trial court found that the original contract remained in force, and gave judgment in accord with the pleadings and plaintiff's theory of the case.

[1] We are of the opinion that the original contract was never nullified but remained in full force and effect, except that the time of shipping the goods was extended for a reasonable period and that such reasonable time had expired on the 15th of April, 1922, the date of letter declaring a breach of the contract.

[2, 3] George L. Mathewson, president of the respondent company, was called as a witness for the purpose of proving the market value of the straps in question, and after proper qualification was asked:

> "What was the market price of the straps covered by the Boyle Manufacturing Company contract on April 15, 1922?"

To which counsel for appellant interposed the following objection:

> "We object to that question and also the answer on the ground that it is immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent for the reason that, under the pleadings, the market value is not the basis for the fixing of the damages and is not material."

The court overruled the objection, with leave to move to strike. On pages 77 and 78 of the transcript is the following:

> "At the conclusion of the hearing defendant moved to strike out all of the testimony of the witness George L. Mathewson concerning the market value of such straps and buckles in 1922 on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, in this that no breach of contract was shown to have been created at that time, and the court thereupon denied the motion."

Mr. Mathewson's testimony was as follows:

> "A. [to question above quoted]: $25.25.
> "Q. Per gross? A. Per gross.
> "Q. Do you know the market price during the balance of the month of April, 1922? A. The same.
> "Q. And you do know it, and that was the price? A. Yes.
> "Q. Do you know the market price during May and June, 1922? A. $25.25.
> "Q. And that is the market price f. o. b. Buffalo? A. Yes.
> "Q. So that the difference then between the contract price of $40 and the market price of $25.25 per gross is $14.75 a gross? A. I base my opinion of market value during this period from August 15, 1922, to July, 1922 [sic], partly upon sales of straps similar to those covered by the Boyle Manufacturing Company contract."

He then testified that sales were made by his (respondent) company of similar straps on June 23, July 19, June 5, June 30, May 15, and June 24, 1922, at $25.25 per gross, and said:

> "Those dates I have just given in my answer to the last question are the dates upon which sales were made by the Buffalo Belting & Weaving Company of similar straps to those covered by the Boyle Manufacturing Company contract at the price I have stated, f. o. b. Buffalo. Those were sales made in the usual course of business."

He further testified that there were other sales on or prior to April 15, 1922, to wit, April 8, May 26, April 24, April 18, April 11, and March 28, 1922, at $25.25 per gross; and that "the market value of these straps as covered by the contract from March 1, 1922, to August 1, 1922, was $25.25 per gross, f. o. b. Buffalo."

We believe the objection to the original question which elicited this testimony was good and should have been sustained; but when counsel for appellant moved to strike Mathewson's testimony he seems to have narrowed the ground of his objection to one point, viz., that the contract was not breached as of the date stated in the question—April 15, 1922. Since the date of the breach of the contract was determined by the trial court as of April 15, 1922, and we think correctly so, and this was the sole basis of the motion, the denial thereof was correct. But we are unable to see what use can be made of this evidence.

[4] Paragraph II of appellant's specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings is as follows:

> "The evidence is insufficient to justify paragraph IV of the findings reading as follows: 'That all of the allegations of paragraph IV of plaintiff's complaint are true.' The evidence shows that the following allegations of paragraph IV of plaintiff's complaint are untrue: 'And by reason of the facts herein alleged the plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $6,755.50.'"

And under the subhead "Assignment of Errors" appears the following:

> "The court erred in its rulings as follows: '(3) In concluding as a matter of law that said plaintiff is entitled to a judgment against said defendant in the sum of $6,755.50, or any other amount.'"

The loss sustained by respondent, in the circumstances of this case, was clearly one of loss of profits—the difference between the cost of manufacturing in the finished, ready to deliver state and the contract price. The measure of such damages would have to be ascertained under section 3300 of the Civil Code, and not under section 3353, Civil Code. Utter v. Chapman, 38 Cal. 659, 665; Connell v. Higgins, 170 Cal. 541, 549, 150 P. 769; Hale v. Trout, 35 Cal. 229; Cederberg v. Robinson, 100 Cal. 93, 34 P. 625; Johnson v. Hinkel, 29 Cal. App. 78, 154 P. 487; Lund v. Lachman, 29 Cal. App. 31, 154 P. 295.

[5] There is no contention that the straps were made up, except a monthly installment of them for December, 1920. There is no evidence that they were ever all made up and actually sold in the open market so as to afford the smallest possible loss. On the contrary, the only evidence on the point comes through Mr. Mathewson, president of the respondent corporation:

> "We did not purchase any webbing to fill the contract. We would have webbing. We don't know when we disposed of it, but we simply carried it in stock for years afterwards and sold it out in small lots from time to time. The entire stock of buckles we still have on hand. We have given them to our branch offices and tried to dispose of them in that way, but none of them have been sold."

We think there is no evidence to sustain the finding complained of and above quoted, and no evidence to sustain the judgment for the sum determined upon by the court or any other definite sum.

Judgment reversed.

MOSTELLER v. BRAHAM. (Civ. 5132.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 7, 1928.

1. Sales 🔑398—Rescission judgment held not erroneous for failure to return seller's property, where value was deducted from amount due buyer.

Judgment enforcing rescission of contract of sale of lunchroom reasonably worth $300 at price of $2,500 on ground of seller's false representations held not erroneous, on ground that no provision was made for return of property to seller, where $300 was deducted from amount buyer had paid to determine amount due buyer from seller.

2. Contracts 🔑265—Restoration of status quo is not always condition of rescission.

Rescission of contract obtained by fraud will not be denied merely because parties cannot be placed in statu quo if equity can be done.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by H. E. Mosteller against N. C. Braham. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fairfax Cosby and Brewton A. Hayne, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Carlyle Wynn, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this appeal from a judgment enforcing rescission of a contract of sale, the record consists of the judgment roll only. The facts are as shown by the findings. The defendant, for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to purchase from defendant at a price of $2,500 a certain lunchroom, etc., made sundry representations of fact, which representations were false. Relying upon those representations, the plaintiff agreed to purchase the property at the price of $2,500, of which $1,000 was actually paid to the defendant. Promptly after discovering that said representations were false, the plaintiff gave written notice of rescission and offered to return to defendant the leased premises, together with the personal property therein contained, upon condition that defendant return to plaintiff said sum of $1,000. The personal property connected with said business, including the lease, good will, etc., at the date of the sale did not exceed in value the sum of $300. The defendant refused to return said sum of $1,000, and the plaintiff continued in possession and conducted the business in a proper and well-managed manner for a few months longer and then abandoned it. The court allowed to the defendant, as an offset to said sum of $1,000, the sum of $300 as the value of the property, and gave judgment against the defendant in the sum of $700 and costs.

[1, 2] The principal point urged by appellant is that the judgment made no provision for return of defendant's property concurrently with his payment of the judgment. As the evidence is not before us, we are not able to say just what were the probative facts concerning the condition of the property at the time when the case was tried. Since the court found that said property was worth only $300 and actually allowed that amount in reduction of the sum of $1,000, which otherwise would have been the amount of the judgment, it seems clear enough that no injustice has been done to appellant by the form of relief to plaintiff as accorded by the judgment. The condition of the business of the restaurant after the defendant refused plaintiff's demand for rescission was such that the plaintiff could not reasonably be required to maintain it indefinitely for the benefit of the defendant. "It is not an invariable rule that the rescission of a contract obtained by fraud will be denied merely upon the ground that the parties cannot be placed in statu quo. If equity can still be done between the parties, courts will grant relief to the defrauded party." Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 379, 389, 80 P. 234, 238.

TETENMAN et ux. v. MELEKOV et al. ★ (Civ. 5908.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 4, 1928.

Rehearing Denied May 4, 1928.

1. Exchange of property 🔑4—Agreement to exchange land and escrow instructions should be construed as one contract (Civ. Code, § 1642).

Under Civ. Code, § 1642, providing that several contracts relating to same matters between same parties and made as parts of substantially one transaction are to be taken together, agreement for exchange of real properties and escrow instructions constitute one contract and should be so considered and construed.

2. Specific performance 🔑29(2)—Parties to contract for exchange of properties held to have construed original agreement by subsequent escrow instructions, documents, and pleadings, resolving all doubts as to descriptions, so that contract could be enforced.

Parties to contract for exchange of real properties which plaintiffs sought to specifically enforce held to have construed original agreement and resolved all doubts as to descriptions of properties found in it by subsequent escrow instructions, documents, and pleadings, so that agreement could not be held too indefinite and uncertain to be enforced.

3. Specific performance ⚷30—Contract for exchange of land held not too indefinite regarding payee of $1,500 cash to be specifically enforced.

Agreement for exchange of real properties held not to be too uncertain in regard to payee of $1,500 cash to be enforced in specific performance suit, where agreement, after providing for exchange of equities in properties, called for payment in language, "and $1,500 cash to me," where word "me" in that connection could mean only plaintiffs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Aaron Tetenman and wife against Leon Melekov and wife and the Standard Construction Company and another for specific performance of an agreement for the exchange of real properties. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants named appeal. Affirmed, with instructions.

Duke Stone and Hugh L. Dickson, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Harry Sherr and Albert Sidney Brown, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. This action was brought to require defendants Leon Melekov and Mary Melekov, his wife, to specifically perform an agreement of exchange of real properties made between plaintiffs and defendant Leon Melekov. The trial court decreed that defendants Leon Melekov and Mary Melekov specifically perform as prayed for in the complaint, by delivering their deed and paying $1,500 to the use and benefit of plaintiffs according to the agreement and certain escrow instructions made by the parties to carry the agreement into effect.

Defendants Leon Melekov, Mary Melekov, and Standard Construction Company appeal from the decree, but they filed no brief in reply to respondents' brief.

The original agreement was executed on August 7, 1926, is in two parts, the first being a proposition to trade signed by plaintiffs, and the second part an acceptance signed by defendant Leon Melekov, and the descriptions of the properties are somewhat indefinite in some particulars, but the descriptions therein are such that under proper allegations in the pleadings the properties could be identified from them by the use of extrinsic evidence, following the rules announced in Joyce v. Tomasini, 168 Cal. 234, 142 P. 67, and McKevitt v. Sacramento, 55 Cal. App. 117, 203 P. 132. The incumbrances against the properties were also sufficiently identified and described.

Three days after the agreement was made the parties established an escrow with defendant Bank of Italy for the purpose of completing the agreed exchange, and plaintiffs on their part gave their escrow instructions to defendant bank, and defendant Leon Melekov separately on his part gave the bank his escrow instructions. Each of the instructions described the properties by their legal descriptions and the incumbrances against each property.

Plaintiffs put into the escrow their grant deed of their property, running to defendant Standard Construction Company, and defendants Leon and Mary Melekov also put in their grant deed of their property running to plaintiff Etty Tetenman, but defendant Leon Melekov failed to acknowledge it. Each deed described the property intended to be conveyed by it by its legal description as contained in the escrow instructions and in the complaint. Defendant Leon Melekov deposited $500 in the escrow and agreed to deposit $1,000 more later, to be paid to plaintiffs. Before the time limited for closing the escrow arrived, defendant Leon Melekov, without just cause, withdrew the deed and moneys he had placed in the escrow and refused to proceed with the exchange.

The complaint alleges the agreement of exchange, describes the real properties by the legal descriptions as contained in the escrow instructions, and refers to a copy of the original agreement attached to and made a part of the complaint for the terms and conditions of the agreement, and alleges the escrow and that it was made pursuant to and in connection with the original agreement; that plaintiffs had performed the agreement and are ready and able to carry out the agreement on their part; that the agreement and agreed exchange are fair, just, and equitable as to defendants, and a breach of the agreement and escrow by defendant Melekov, and prays for a decree of specific performance.

The answer of defendants Melekov denies the execution of an agreement as alleged in the complaint, and alleges that defendant Leon Melekov and plaintiffs did enter into an agreement of exchange of the properties described in the complaint and at the time therein alleged, but that defendant Leon Melekov was induced to execute the agreement by reason of certain alleged false representations made by plaintiff Aaron Tetenman, because of which alleged false representations he refused to conclude the trade, and denied that plaintiffs performed the agreement on their part or that the agreement was fair, just or equitable as to defendants Melekov.

The evidence produced shows the following additional facts without conflict: That the agreed exchange of properties was fair, just and equitable as to defendants Leon and Mary Melekov, in this, that the net value of plaintiffs' property, after deducting incumbrances, was approximately $11,675, and the net value of the property of defendants Melekov, after deducting incumbrances, together with $1,500 cash to be paid by them, made the net value to pass from them to plaintiffs aggregate $10,500. These values were shown by the evidence produced by plaintiffs and not controverted by defendants.

Defendants Leon and Mary Melekov and Standard Construction Company admitted at the trial that defendant Leon Melekov requested plaintiffs to make their deed to defendant Standard Construction Company, and the escrow instructions signed by defendant Leon Melekov call for a deed running from plaintiffs to that company.

The allegations of false representations made in the answer were not sustained, and appellants do not contend that they were proved. In fact, this appeal is based wholly upon other grounds, as will hereinafter appear.

Appellants contend that the agreement of exchange is so indefinite and uncertain that a court of equity cannot enforce it in all particulars, because: (a) of the differences in the descriptions of the properties as contained in the agreement and in the complaint; (b) the descriptions of defendants' property in the agreement is too uncertain and indefinite; (c) the description of the incumbrances on both properties renders the agreement uncertain; (d) there is uncertainty as to whom the $1,500 should go; (e) plaintiffs' deed was made to defendant Standard Construction Company instead of to the person designated in the agreement or escrow instructions, which rendered the agreement and escrow instructions uncertain, unintelligible and unilateral and made them lack mutuality. Appellants also call attention to the fact that reformation of the agreement was not sought by plaintiffs, and contend that the escrow instructions, which they name in their brief herein "the escrow agreement," and the deed to the defendant Standard Construction Company, constituted an entirely new transaction. They also contend that the proof fails to show that the consideration moving to appellants or to any of them in the exchange was fair and equitable.

[1] The agreement and escrow instructions constitute one contract and should be so considered and construed, as provided in section 1642 of the Civil Code.

[2] Appellants' contentions have no merit. While it is true that the description of either property in the agreement is not as definite as in the escrow instructions and complaint, defendants Melekov admit in their answer that they made an agreement of exchange with plaintiffs, covering the properties fully described in the escrow instructions and complaint, the original agreement was received in evidence without objection, the incumbrances were described in the original agreement, and more definitely described in the escrow instructions, and the evidence shows without conflict that for the purpose of carrying out the original agreement, the parties thereto executed the escrow instructions, and placed their deeds in the escrow. By those subsequently executed papers, documents and pleadings the parties construed the original agreement and resolved all doubts as to the descriptions of the properties found in it. By their acts they showed that they were under no misapprehension as to what was the property to be exchanged.

[3] The contention that there is uncertainty in regard to the payee of the $1,500 cash is an attempt by appellants to fly in the face of the simplest language. In the first part of the agreement plaintiffs call for payment to them of that amount by defendant Leon Melekov in the following language, after providing for the exchange of equities in the properties, to wit: "And $1,500.00 cash to me." The word "me" in this connection can mean only the plaintiffs.

The remaining contentions made by appellants are so clearly without merit and the answers are so obvious that we do not deem it worth while to dignify those contentions by further answering them.

The points made by appellants are unjustifiable; the appeal is frivolous and was taken for the purpose of delaying and harassing respondents and tying up the properties involved in the action, each of which was incumbered by mortgage and appellants' property also by a second incumbrance in the nature of a deed of trust.

The judgment is affirmed, with instructions to the trial court to enter a judgment in favor of respondents and against appellants for the sum of $100 and costs of appeal.

In suit by tenant against landlord for damage to merchandise resulting from roof and drain system of building becoming defective so as not to shed rain properly, wherein landlord defended on ground of its being tenant's duty to make repairs, held, that such tenant, being lessee of ground floor and basement, only, was not by contract, nor was he impliedly, bound to repair roof and drain system over which he had no authority or control.

In action by tenant of first floor and basement against landlord for damage to goods resulting from defects in roof and drain system so that rainwater ran into plaintiff's store, held, that notice to the landlord of such defects was not a prerequisite to such tenant's bringing his action, since the upper floor was not leased by tenant and he had no control over parts of building in which defect existed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the Rathbun Company, a corporation, against G. C. Simmons. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Elliott, Atkinson & Sitton, of Sacramento, for appellant.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an action for damages, brought by plaintiff, as tenant, against defendant, as landlord, on account of damage to plaintiff's merchandise, caused by rainwater from the roof of the demised premises.

The action was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $2,000, from which judgment the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The defendant and appellant owned a five-story brick building situated in the city of Sacramento and known as "Inverness Building." The first story and basement of the building were leased to respondent and used by it in conducting a ladies' wearing apparel store. The upper stories were leased by appellant to one J. P. Gallagher, who conducted a hotel therein. An open light well, 2 or 3 feet wide by 3½ feet long, extended from the first story upwards, so that under the light well the building is, in effect, but one story high. Respondent's store therefore was partly covered by a subroof, or the floor of this light well, and partly by the floor of the second story. This light well gave ventilation and light to the rooms of the hotel, on the second, third, fourth, and fifth floors of the building. The building is so constructed that the entire roof is drained into the light well. The main roof is drained into a pipe which leads from the upper roof to a point a short distance above the subroof, where it discharges the rainwater falling on the main roof directly on the subroof. The water then flows over the subroof for a distance of about 2 feet to a catch basin or hopper, located in the center of and beneath the subroof, and which is protected by a screen or perforated hood. After entering this hopper or catch basin, the water is discharged into a pipe which is recessed in the north wall of the building, and which conducts it into the basement, from whence it is carried out to the gutter in the street. The particular function of the subroof in the way of carrying water is to carry water from the upper or main roof, because there is a very much larger area of drainage there than is on this lower roof.

The court found, among other facts:

> "That on or about said 8th day of November, 1924, and while the said personal property of said plaintiff was so located and stored in said store as aforesaid, large quantities of rain water were precipitated and deposited upon the roof of that portion of said building immediately over said store and which said roof was then and there in the possession and under the control of said defendant; that said defendant negligently and carelessly permitted and suffered said roof and the drain therein to become in a state of disrepair and incapable of carrying off the rainwater so deposited and precipitated on said roof and then and there negligently and carelessly permitted and caused said rain water to accumulate in such large quantities upon said roof that by reason thereof, and without any fault on the part of said plaintiff, said rainwater leaked through said drain and said roof and ran into, upon, and flooded said store so occupied by said plaintiff and said personal property of said plaintiff so located in said store, and thereby and in consequence thereof damaged and injured said personal property and the plaster on the ceilings and walls of said store, thereby interfering with the said plaintiff's quiet enjoyment of said demised premises as tenant of said defendant, and that said plaintiff was damaged thereby in the sum of $2,000 lawful money of the United States."

The first and most important question to be determined is, Who, under the terms of the lease, had control of the subroof and drainage system in said building?

On August 11, 1923, the appellant leased to respondent "that certain first story and basement of a five-story brick building, and its appurtenances, known as 'Inverness Building,' for a term of five years from September 1, 1923." Said lease also contained the following provisions:

> "It is further agreed that said party of the first part shall not be called upon to make any improvements or repairs or replacements whatsoever upon the said demised premises, or any part thereof, but said party of the second part [respondent herein] agrees to keep the same in good order and condition at its own expense, including the replacement of all plain and plate glass if broken from any cause, and replace all plaster if broken or damaged from any cause."

The entrance hall and stairway and elevator were excepted from the lease, as was also the basement area containing the elevator machinery and heating plant. The lease further provided:

> "It is also understood and agreed that the party of the first part [the appellant herein] shall not be held responsible for any act or neglect of the tenants in the hotel above the store hereby leased, and it is further understood and agreed that the said party of the second part shall keep the said premises at all times in a neat and sanitary condition as required by the rules and regulations of the board of health and the plumbing ordinances of the city of Sacramento."

[1, 2] Thus it will be seen from the terms of the lease that the lessor (appellant herein) was not to be called upon to make any repairs to the leased premises, and that the lessee (respondent herein) agreed to keep the demised premises in good order and condition. It is clear that these covenants in said lease, however, applied only to the demised premises; that is to say, to the premises which by the terms of the lease passed out of the control of the lessor and into the exclusive possession and control of the lessee, and not to any portion of the building not covered by the lease. We find no provision in the lease which places the duty of caring for the drainage system, or the roof, or the subroof, upon either the lessor or the lessee. The rule is well established that in the absence of an express covenant by the landlord to make necessary repairs, the tenant is the one to keep up the leased premises. Capwell Co. v. Blake, 9 Cal. App. 101, 98 P. 51; Longbotham v. Takeoka, 115 Or. 608, 239 P. 105, 43 A. L. R. 1285. The reason for this rule is that the tenant takes the estate as he finds it with its advantages and drawbacks, and if he would protect himself against the expense of betterment, he must either not acquire the tenancy or exact from the landlord a covenant to make the repairs necessary to the enjoyment of the estate. The application of this rule, however, cannot be extended beyond the premises leased; the tenant cannot be held to repair that over which he has no control or authority. In Longbotham v. Takeoka, supra, the court said:

> "Responsibility, whether of the landlord or the tenant, follows and is measured by the control lodged in one or the other. Merely because A is landlord and B is tenant does not excuse A from liability for damage he inflicts upon B by operation of an appliance in the control of the former."

Turning to the testimony in the case, we find that Ralph H. Rathbun, president of respondent corporation, testified that he had no access from his store to the subroof or upper floors of the building, and in order to gain access from his store to this subroof, he would have to go upstairs and get permission from the proprietor of the hotel, in order to get access to the rooms through which he would have to pass in order to go out on this subroof; that he could not see the light well from his store because there was a solid ceiling in the store. Rathbun testified that he had never seen or examined the light well, and in fact did not know there was a light well in the building until after the damage had occurred. Mr. Gallagher, who conducted the hotel on the upper floors, testified as follows:

> "Q. How could you obtain access to this light well from the main floor? A. Well, there is no access for anybody to go through unless they climb through my apartment, and go through the window.
> "Q. Is there any means to obtain access to that light well from any other apartment besides your apartment? A. Yes; you can go in through any of those windows, different apartments. They could come in from the other side, from the 'Argus Building,' could climb through there, if they wanted to, and go down there.
> "Q. The Argus Building is located where? A. Joins the Inverness Building. * * *
> "Q. In reference to those windows which open out upon the light well there, how many windows open out upon the light well, that it is possible to go out and obtain access to the well, what area of the roof? * * * A. It would be the first tier of windows on that floor."

From the foregoing testimony, and other testimony of a similar character, it seems clear that respondent did not have access to the roof or light well, and, in fact, had no knowledge of the system of drainage provided for the building, or even the existence of a light well until after the damage occurred.

[3] From all these facts we conclude, therefore that respondent was not required by the lease to keep in repair the light well and the roof. Neither did he impliedly assume such responsibility. The main roof of the building sheltered the rooms used by appellant's other tenant, Gallagher, as a hotel, and it would be unreasonable, under the facts, to hold that respondent was responsible for the care of the roofs under his lease covering only the ground floor and basement, or that he assumed the care of the roofs or undertook to provide means for the escape of the water from them. On the other hand, from the facts revealed by the record, it seems clear to us that it was the duty of appellant to provide an adequate means for the escape of rainwater falling upon the roof of the building, and also to see that the means employed for that purpose were maintained in good order and condition and capable of serving the purpose, and if he was negligent in this regard, he would be liable to respondent for any damages suffered thereby.

Appellant contends that, even conceding this to be true, still, the evidence fails to disclose any negligence on his part. This contention is based upon the testimony of Mr. Gallagher, the proprietor of the hotel on the upper floors of the building, to the effect that he cleaned the roof on the day before the store was flooded and everything seemed to be in perfect condition as far as outward appearances were concerned, and that, theretofore, no leaks or trouble with the drainage system had been discovered; also, upon the testimony of Mr. Rathbun, the president of respondent corporation, that he, together with Mr. Gallagher, examined the roof on the morning after the flooding of the store and could not ascertain the cause of the leak; and also, upon the testimony of the appellant to the effect that he had never had any complaint from any of the tenants prior to the time of the damage in question that the drainage system was not adequate, and had never prior to the damage to respondent been notified that the drainage system was out of repair.

[4] Upon this testimony, appellant argues that he was entitled to notice of the defects, and unless it is shown he had notice or actual knowledge, or unless the defect was apparent on a reasonable inspection, he cannot be held negligent. The cases cited by appellant upholding this doctrine are not applicable under the facts of the case at bar. In this case, as we have seen, a portion of the property is occupied by one tenant and another portion by the other tenant, and a single system of draining the roof is maintained for the benefit of all. It cannot be successfully contended that it was incumbent upon respondent, who had no care or control over the roof and no right to intermeddle with it, to give appellant notice of the repairs to be made in the roof, especially when the testimony shows without conflict that respondent did not know that the drainage system needed repairing, and did not possess the means of acquiring such knowledge.

The precise trouble with the drainage system was in and around the catch basin or hopper, which was set under the subroof of the building, and it was necessary for the plumber to cut a patch off of the subroof about 16 inches square to gain access to this hopper. When this was done, the plumber found that this catch basin or hopper, as it is called, was nothing more than a square box made of a cheap grade of tin or galvanized iron, set on the top of the drain pipe, and that said hopper had rusted apart, was full of holes, and resembled a "sponge," so the water could go through and percolate from the hopper or basin into the ceiling, and the pipe on which the hopper rested had also decayed and was rusty and full of holes.

[5] There was other testimony to the same effect, which is not necessary to quote, but there is sufficient evidence to support the findings and judgment of the court on the question of negligence.

The question of appellant's liability hinges entirely upon the conclusion that we have reached, that it was his duty to provide an adequate drainage system for his building and to keep it in a good state of repair. Capwell Co. v. Blake, supra, and cases there cited.

The cases cited by appellant relating to patent and latent defects have no application here for, as we have seen, the responsibility for draining the roof was upon appellant, who negligently performed this duty.

[6] There is no merit in the contention of appellant that the dilapidated condition of the catch basin, or hopper, could not be discovered because it was set underneath the subroof and covered by a screen. There is no evidence in the record, that we have been able to discover, which states that it was customary or proper, in installing an adequate drainage system for a building such as the "Inverness Building," to permit the drainage system to be installed or constructed in such a manner that it could not be thoroughly inspected without taking out a portion of the roof and, in the absence of such a showing, appellant was, no doubt, negligent in permitting it to be so constructed.

After a careful consideration of the entire record, we are of the opinion that there is ample evidence to support the conclusions of the trial court upon the question of appellant's negligence.

We think the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

TOUSLEY v. DISHMAN et al. (Civ. 5079.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 10, 1928.

1. Bills and notes ⚷329—Statute making failure of consideration defense against person not holding in due course held not inconsistent, as matter of law, with statute concerning liability of accommodation party (Civ. Code, §§ 3109, 3110).

Civ. Code, § 3109, providing that failure of consideration is matter of defense against person not holder in due course, held not inconsistent, as matter of law, with section 3110, providing that accommodation party is one lending name to another without receiving value and is liable to holder for value, though holder knew party to be for accommodation only.

2. Statutes ⚷231—Specific section of Code takes precedence over general section.

Section of Code referring specifically to a matter takes precedence over general section.

3. Bills and notes ⚷497(2)—Plaintiff, to recover against accommodation maker, must show he holds note for value or is innocent holder in due course (Civ. Code, § 3110).

In order to hold an accommodation maker liable for payment of note given without consideration, under Civ. Code, § 3110, plaintiff must show that he is holder for value or that he was an innocent holder in due course.

4. Bills and notes ⚷489(1)—Answer by accommodation makers on note alleging no consideration to defendants and no consideration for executing note, held sufficient, in absence of demurrer, to put question of consideration in issue.

In action by payee on note against defendants claiming to be accommodation makers, answer alleging lack of consideration to defendants and want of consideration for note held sufficient, in absence of demurrer for indefiniteness, to put in issue determination of fact whether there was any consideration for note as against plaintiffs not alleging holding for value or in due course.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Herbert F. Tousley against W. B. Dishman and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Mulligan & Ryzek, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Milton K. Young, Lyndol L. Young, William K. Young, and Young & Young, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. The defendants signed a note payabe to plaintiff, and in this action, which was brought for its collection, they set up the defense that they are only accommodation makers and that no consideration passed in the transaction. The trial court granted a motion for judgment and the pleadings, and defendants appeal.

Appellants cite section 3109 of the Civil Code:

> "Absence or failure of consideration is a matter of defense as against any person not a holder in due course. * * *"

Respondent replies by citing section 3110, Civil Code:

> "An accommodation party is one who has signed the instrument as maker, drawer, acceptor, or indorser, without receiving value therefor, and for the purpose of lending his name to some other person. Such person is liable on the instrument to a holder for value, notwithstanding such holder at the time of taking the instrument knew him to be only an accommodation party." (Italics ours.)

[1, 2] Admitting for the sake of argument only that there is an inconsistency on the face of these two sections of our Code, there is no inconsistency as a matter of law. No principle of our rules of construction is better grounded than that a section of the Code referring specifically to a matter takes precedence over a general section.

[3, 4] Respondents say in their brief:

> "It should be remembered that no issue is raised by the answer regarding the consideration received by the original debtor, that is the party accommodated by defendants. Appellants' defense is that their assumption of respondent's debtor's obligation was not supported by a consideration and is therefore void. Their answer does not assail the obligation assumed as being without consideration and therefore void, but states that their act in assuming the same was without consideration."

But appellants' answer does assail the obligation assumed as being without consideration and therefore void. The note was made payable to plaintiff and at all times remained in his hands. There is nothing in the pleadings to the effect that the plaintiff is a holder for value or that he was an innocent holder in due course. This must be shown before an accommodation maker can be held liable for the payment of a note given without consideration. Section 3110, Civ. Code. Defendants not only allege an entire lack of consideration to them, but "that there has been and is a want of consideration for the said note and the execution thereof." We take it that this is sufficient, at least in the absence of a demurrer for indefiniteness or uncertainty, to put in issue the determination of the fact as to whether or not there was ever any consideration for the making, execution, or delivery of the note.

PEOPLE v. MURPHY. (Cr. 1026.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 13, 1928.

1. Burglary ⚷42(1)—Mere unexplained possession of stolen property is not alone sufficient to justify conviction for burglary.

The mere unexplained possession of stolen property, standing alone, is not sufficient to justify a conviction for burglary.

2. Burglary ⚷42(3)—Evidence additional to mere possession of stolen property held sufficient to warrant conviction of burglary.

In prosecution for burglary, evidence additional to defendant's possession of the stolen property held sufficient to warrant conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Joe Murphy was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. K. Landram, of Merced, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem. Appellant was convicted upon both counts of an information charging him with two separate burglaries, and appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

His main contention is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict.

As to the first count of the information, the undisputed facts are that on the 4th day of July, 1927, one J. A. Grenier was the owner of a garage in the city of Merced; that on that day he was alone in his garage; that he absented himself therefrom for about 15 minutes and that upon his return he discovered that a number of his tools were missing; that on the 7th day of July, 1927, appellant appeared at the place of business of Darwin E. Kast in Merced, who was a dealer in used cars, and offered to sell and did sell to said Kast a portion of the tools that were stolen from Grenier's garage.

As to the second count of the information, the undisputed facts are that I. D. Harris owned a garage in said city of Merced in September, 1927; that between the 10th and 11th of September, 1927, some one forced an entrance into his garage and took away a number of tools belonging to him. Shortly thereafter appellant appeared at Kast's place of business and offered to sell him a portion of the tools taken from the garage of Harris. Kast refused to purchase any of said last-named tools. Appellant thereupon told Kast that he was going to San Francisco, and asked permission of Kast to leave the tools with him until his return, to which request Kast consented and thereupon appellant left the tools with Kast.

Appellant in his brief admits that the facts proven are sufficient to show that a burglary was committed as charged in the second count of the information and that the proceeds of said burglary were later found in the possession of appellant, but claims that possession of the stolen goods is not sufficient to establish the fact that the burglary was committed by appellant.

[1] It is true that the mere unexplained possession of stolen property, standing alone, is not sufficient to justify a conviction for burglary. 4 Cal. Juris. p. 741, and authorities there cited. But, in the case of People v. Lang, 142 Cal. 485, 76 P. 233, the Supreme Court used this language:

> "The authorities hold that where goods have been feloniously taken by means of a burglary, and they are immediately or soon thereafter found in the possession of a person who gives a false account, or refuses to give any account, of the manner in which he came into the possession, proof of such possession and guilty conduct is presumptive evidence not only that he stole the goods, but that he made use of the means by which access to them was obtained."

See, also, People v. Le Roy, 192 Cal. 498, 221 P. 353. So in the case of People v. Smith, 79 Cal. 555, 21 P. 952, where the evidence showed that a burglary had been committed and a portion of the stolen property was found in the possession of the defendants, and upon their arrest they made different statements to the arresting officer as to how they had obtained the jewelry and gave him false names, the court held that the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict.

[2] In the case under consideration, the evidence shows that on or about the 11th day of September, 1927, a burglary was committed and certain tools belonging to witness Harris were stolen and were shortly thereafter found in the possession of appellant; that appellant took these stolen tools to witness Kast and sold them to him, at that time informing Kast that the tools were some that he had been working with while driving a tractor at Crow's Landing, and that he was leaving there and going to British Columbia. Later, when arrested, he told Deputy Sheriff Gilbert that he purchased the drill, which was a portion of the tools stolen from the Harris Garage and sold by defendant to Kast, from a man on the streets of Modesto, a stranger to him.

Appellant further contends that the facts proved in support of count 1 of the information are not sufficient to show that a burglary was actually committed.

According to the undisputed testimony of witness Grenier, his garage was entered on July 4, 1927, during his temporary absence, and a number of tools were stolen. On July 7, 1927, appellant was in possession of these tool endeavoring to sell them to witness Kast. Kast testified that appellant, speaking of one of the tools, a four-inch reamer, said that he had just done a job with it the day before at his place of business in Merced. Later on, endeavoring to sell the reamer to H. E. Olsen, he told Olsen that he came from Oregon and was engaged in wholesale automobile parts business. Later, after being arrested, he told Deputy Sheriff Gilbert that he bought the reamers and other tools from a man walking along the highway some three miles from Merced.

In the case of People v. Hunter, 59 Cal. App. 444, 210 P. 968, where the facts are somewhat similar to the case now being considered, the court said:

> "The testimony and statements made by the appellant in his attempt to account for the possession of the stolen goods were of such character as to in themselves afford evidence of guilt, and the case in its facts is brought clearly within the ruling made in People v. Lang, 142 Cal. 484 [76 P. 232]. What is said in the opinion rendered in that case furnishes ample support to the respondent's position here."

The contention of appellant that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict is without merit.

Appellant, in his brief, has not called attention of the court to any error in giving or refusing instructions. From an examination of the instructions, we are of the opinion that they fully and fairly presented to the jury the law applying to the facts of this case.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

TOOGOOD et ux. v. MACK et al. (Civ. 4902.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 6, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed.

Finding of trial court on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal.

2. Novation ⚷5—Assignment of agreement providing for delivery of shares of stock, where plaintiffs agreed that assignee should be substituted for assignor, held to have effected novation.

Assignment of agreement which provided for delivery of certain shares of stock, where plaintiffs agreed to accept assignment and agreed that assignee should be substituted for assignor in carrying out terms of contract, held to have effected novation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge pro tem.

Action by Lyman D. Toogood and wife against Frank Mack and another for rescission of a contract and for money had and received. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Spicer, Meacham & Mason and Bruce Mason, all of Long Beach, for appellants.

Eugene Tincher, of Long Beach, and A. J. Bledsoe, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. This was an action brought for rescission of contract and for money had and received. The court granted a nonsuit as to both defendants. In appellants' reply brief counsel state that appellants are willing that the judgment of the court below as to the respondent Mary Elizabeth Hedges as executrix of the estate of Abraham Dayton Hedges, deceased, be affirmed.

This leaves for consideration only the pending appeal against defendant and respondent Frank Mack, and the sole question on that appeal is whether or not there was a novation effected by the assignment of the agreement which provided for the delivery of certain shares of stock by Mack to Hedges. Appellants state that respondent's contention as to novation goes to the heart of the question, and "if there was a novation then appellants have no cause against respondent"; And further state: "We agree that if there is a novation then the obligations of Mack are dead beyond recall, but we contend there was no novation."

The assignment to Hedges, his acceptance, and an acceptance by appellants, are as follows:

> "October 11, 1921.
> "I hereby hereby transfer and assign all my interest in the foregoing contract for a valuable consideration, to A. D. Hedges of Long Beach, California. Frank Mack. [Seal.]"
> "October 11, 1921.
> "I hereby accept the assignment of the foregoing contract from Frank Mack to me, and I hereby agree to carry out its terms.
> "A. D. Hedges. [Seal.]"
> "October 11, 1921.
> "We, the undersigned, hereby agree to and do accept the assignment of the foregoing contract by Frank Mack to A. D. Hedges, and we hereby agree that the said A. D. Hedges shall be substituted for said Frank Mack in carrying out the terms of said contract.

"Lyman D. Toogood. [Seal.]
"Bertha E. Toogood. [Seal.]"

[1, 2] Appellants' contention is that there was a substitution but no novation because no intent to release Mack was shown, and they cite section 1531 of the Civil Code, Carpy v. Dowdell, 131 Cal. 495, 63 P. 778, and other authorities, in support of the proposition that the intent to release is an essential element of novation. Under this rule, however, we think the evidence shows such intention. It is true that there are conflicting statements in the evidence of Mr. and Mrs. Toogood on this point, but the finding of the trial court on this conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed, and, considering this in connection with the other evidence, including the written acceptance quoted above, we think the conclusion of the trial court that there had been a novation was correct. This being the only question we are asked to decide, other points originally made by appellants do not require consideration.

Judgment affirmed as to both defendants.

SAME v. COLUMBIAN NAT. FIRE INS. CO. OF LANSING, MICH.

(Civ. 5627, 5628.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 6, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 31, 1928.

1. Insurance 🔑665(7)—Evidence held to support findings that statements of value in proofs of loss were not willfully false or made to defraud insurers.

In action on fire insurance policies, evidence held to support findings that statements of value in proofs of loss were not willfully false or made with intent to cheat and defraud insurers.

2. Insurance 🔑553(1)—Untrue statement, to avoid policy, must be knowingly and intentionally made to defraud insurer.

Untrue statement in proofs of loss, to avoid insurance policy, must have been knowingly and intentionally made, with intention of defrauding insurer.

3. Insurance 🔑668(6)—Whether false statement was knowingly and intentionally made to defraud insurer is fact question for jury or trial court.

In action on policy, whether false statement was made knowingly and intentionally with intention of defrauding insurer is fact question for jury or trial court.

4. Insurance 🔑665(3)—Evidence held to support finding that vendee of insured property was out of possession, so that policy provision regarding change of possession was not violated.

In action on fire insurance policies under provisions of which change of possession suspended insurance, evidence held to support finding that plaintiff's vendee was out of possession, having abandoned contract to purchase at time fire occurred, so that recovery under policy was not prevented.

5. Insurance 🔑665(3)—Evidence held to support conclusion that insured was unconditional owner of property when fire policies took effect.

In action on fire insurance policies, evidence held to support trial court's conclusion that when policies took effect and when loss occured plaintiff was sole and unconditional owner, on theory that contract to purchase had been abandoned.

6. Vendor and purchaser 🔑185—Where time is made essential, unexcused failure to perform as provided by contract works forfeiture unless vendor waives default.

Where time is made essential, unexcused failure to perform contract to buy land as provided by contract works forfeiture, unless vendor elects to waive default, and, so far as purchaser's rights are concerned, agreement is terminated.

Appeal fom Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Actions by Alex Shevits against the American National Fire Insurance Company of Columbus, Ohio, and against the Columbian National Fire Insurance Company of Lansing, Mich., tried together. From judgments for plaintiff, defendants appeal. On the death of plaintiff pending the appeal, M. J. Pedrotti and W. P. Murray, his executors, were substituted as plaintiffs. Affirmed.

Miller & Thornton, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Jordan L. Martinelli, of San Rafael, and J. F. Riley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. The above actions were by stipulation tried together, and appeals were taken by the respective defendants from the judgments entered therein. After the appeals were taken Alex Shevits, who will be hereinafter referred to as the plaintiff, died, and the executors of his last will and testament were substituted as parties respondent.

The action against appellant American National Fire Insurance Company was upon three policies of insurance aggregating $1,950, which became effective on April 1 and November 22, 1922, and May 1, 1923, respectively; that against appellant Columbian National Fire Insurance Company being upon a policy of $1,000, which became effective on December

13, 1923. The policies insured plaintiff against loss by fire on a certain dwelling house situated in San Rafael, and contained the following provisions:

> "Matters Avoiding Policy.—This entire policy shall be void * * * (b) in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to this insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after loss. * * * Unless otherwise prescribed by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto this entire policy shall be void (b) if the interest of the assured be other than unconditional and sole ownership.
> "Matters Suspending Insurance.—Unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto this company shall not be liable for loss or damage occurring * * * (g) while the interest, title to or possession of the subject of insurance is changed excepting * * * (3) a change in occupancy of building without material increase of hazard."

On December 31, 1923, the dwelling house was destroyed by fire, whereupon the assured furnished the insurers with proofs of loss in which the sum of $5,858.91 was stated as the value of the building. The defendants denied liability, and as a defense to each cause of action alleged that the plaintiff, with the intent to defraud the insurers, swore falsely in the proofs of loss with respect to the value of the property, and that his interest therein at the time of the fire was other than unconditional and sole ownership. It was also alleged by American National Fire Insurance Company as a defense to recovery upon the policies which took effect on April 1 and November 22, 1922, that the loss occurred while the plaintiff's interest in, title to, and possession of the subject of the insurance was changed, and that such change was without its consent. As a further defense to the policies which became effective on May 1 and December 13, 1923, the respective insurers alleged that the plaintiff was not the sole and unconditional owner of the property on these dates.

The value of the building at the time of the fire and the loss was found to be in excess of the sum of $4,000, the trial court also finding against the defenses alleged by the defendants, and judgments were entered for the amounts of the policies.

[1] The appellants contend that the findings are not supported by the evidence and that the court erred in denying their motions for nonsuit. The testimony shows that the proofs of loss were not prepared by the plaintiff, but by a builder, who estimated the value therein stated from the dimensions and arrangement of the building and a description of the materials used in its construction as given to him by the plaintiff; after measurements made on the premises he estimated the cost of replacement to be $5,858.99, and the proofs of loss were prepared and sworn to accordingly. The plaintiff testified that in his opinion the building at the time of the fire was of the value of "$4,000 to $5,000 or more." Another witness placed the value between $3,500 and $4,000; and it appeared that plaintiff in November, 1922, had agreed to sell the property for $3,000.

[2, 3] Notwithstanding the testimony of the last witness and that the agreement to sell was for less than the value claimed, we cannot say, in view of the testimony of the plaintiff and the builder, that the conclusion of the trial court that the statements of value in the proofs of loss were not willfully false or made with the intention of cheating and defrauding the defendants was unsupported. The rule is well established that an untrue statement, in order to avoid the policy, must have been knowingly and intentionally made with the intention of defrauding the insurer; and whether a false statement was so made is a question of fact for the jury or trial court. Clark v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 36 Cal. 168; Helbing v. Svea Ins. Co., 54 Cal. 156, 35 Am. Rep. 72; West Coast Lumber Co. v. State Investment, etc., Co., 98 Cal. 502, 33 P. 258; Raulet v. Northwestern National Ins. Co., 157 Cal. 213, 107 P. 292; Miller v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 6 Cal. App. 395, 92 P. 332.

The court found that the agreement for the sale of the property was entered into by the plaintiff on November 25, 1922, the consideration being the sum of $3,000, payable partly in cash and the balance in monthly installments with interest; that the vendee on or after said date went into possession but was not in possession on the date of the fire; that on the latter date he had ceased to make payments and had abandoned the property; that his rights under the contract were by its terms forfeited; and that the plaintiff had become the unconditional and sole owner thereof. The contract made time of the essence, and provided that in the event of a failure by the vendee to perform the plaintiff should be released from all obligation in law or equity, and that all sums paid on the purchase price should be retained by him. The testimony sustains the finding as to the date of the execution of the contract. It further shows that no payments were made thereon after February, 1923, and that the vendee was in default upon the dates when the third and fourth policies took effect. It also appears that plaintiff made repeated demands for possession, and, according to his testimony, the vendee removed from the premises about three months before the fire occurred. He further testified that about two weeks before the fire he entered the building and found blankets scattered upon the floor where, he was told, the vendee's children had been sleeping, but found no furniture therein.

ance; but the testimony of the plaintiff (which the trial court believed) was sufficient to support the finding that the vendee was out of possession at the time the fire occurred. The evidence was also sufficient to support the conclusion of the trial court that when that event happened and at the time when the policies in question took effect the plaintiff was the unconditional and sole owner of the property; that he was such when the first and second policies became effective is beyond dispute, and that the vendee was in default under his contract before the third and fourth policies were issued is clear from the testimony. The contract required no notice in order to place the vendee in default, and no waiver of his default was shown. As held in the following cases, where time is made essential, an unexcused failure to perform provided by the contract works a forfeiture by force of the terms of the contract itself, unless the vendor elects to waive the default, and, so far as the rights of the vendee are concerned, the agreement is terminated: Commercial Bank v. Weldon, 148 Cal. 601, 84 P. 171; Oursler v. Thacher, 152 Cal. 745, 93 P. 1007; Champion Gold Mine Co. v. Champion Mines, 164 Cal. 205, 128 P. 315; Schwerin Estate, etc., Co. v. Slye, 173 Cal. 170, 159 P. 420; Fresno Irrigated Farms Co. v. Canupis, 39 Cal. App. 184, 178 P. 300; Andrews v. Karl, 42 Cal. App. 513, 183 P. 838.

We are satisfied that the findings in each of the above cases were fully sustained by the evidence, and that the motions for nonsuit were properly denied.

The judgments appealed from are affirmed.

Supreme Court of California. April 13, 1928.

1. Criminal law ⚷178—Defendant, discharged before selection of jury, held not put in jeopardy.

Where defendant, arraigned on information charging bigamy, entered plea of not guilty, and on day of trial venire was present from which to select jury, but before selection of jury, defendant asked that venire be excused from courtroom, and moved to discharge defendant which was granted, jeopardy had not yet attached.

2. Criminal law ⚷105—Indictment and information ⚷196(5)—Objections to information that court lacks jurisdiction, and that information states no offense, are not waived by plea of not guilty, and may be asserted at any time (Pen. Code, §§ 1012, 1004, subds. 1, 4, and § 1238, as amended by St. 1897, p. 195).

Under Pen. Code, § 1012, grounds of objection to information specified in section 1004, subds. 1, 4, that court lacks jurisdiction over offense, and that information states no public offense, are not waived by plea of not guilty, and may be asserted at any time, even in arrest of judgment, from which state may appeal under section 1238, as amended by St. 1897, p. 195.

Where defendant, prior to impaneling of jury, requested venire to be excused, and orally moved for discharge on ground that court had no jurisdiction over offense, and that information did not charge an offense, which motion was granted, situation was same as though court had permitted defendant to withdraw plea of not guilty and afforded opportunity to demur under Pen. Code, § 1004, subds. 1 and 4, section 1005, rather than section 995, specifying grounds for setting aside information, and hence people were entitled to appeal under § 1238, subd. 2, as amended by St. 1897, p. 195, from order dismissing the information and discharg-

5. Bigamy 🔑4—Information charging defendant with marrying outside state while having wife living, and thereafter cohabiting in state, held sufficient to charge offense of bigamy (Pen. Code, §§ 281, 1106).

Under Pen. Code, § 281, providing that person having husband or wife living, who marries another, shall be guilty of bigamy, and, under section 1106, providing that charge may be sustained on proof that second marriage took place out of state, accompanied by cohabitation in state, information charging defendant with marrying outside state while having another wife living, and cohabiting in state, was sufficient to charge offense of bigamy, though second marriage was made outside state.

6. Statutes 🔑231—Codification of prior acts without change is presumed to carry same interpretation as given original acts (Pen. Code, §§ 281, 1106; St. 1850, p. 244, St. 1861, p. 415).

In absence of clear legislative intent to contrary, it will be presumed that codified act, Pen. Code, §§ 281, 1106, specifying crime of bigamy, carries same interpretation as original act under St. 1861, p. 415, and St. 1850, p. 244; readoption of provisions without change operating to adopt interpretation theretofore placed thereon by courts.

7. Bigamy 🔑1—To constitute crime of "bigamy," first marriage need not be performed within state, if second marriage occurs in state (Pen. Code, §§ 281, 1106).

Under Pen. Code, §§ 281, 1106, to constitute crime of "bigamy," first marriage need not be performed within state, but it is sufficient if second marriage occurs in state, even though first marriage occurred in foreign state or foreign country.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bigamy.]

8. Bigamy 🔑1—Legislature has power to punish persons cohabiting in state, though both first marriage and second bigamous marriage occurred out of state.

Power of Legislature to protect society by punishing individuals cohabiting in state, if second bigamous marriage occurred out of state, though first marriage also occurred out of state, cannot be questioned.

9. Bigamy 🔑1, 11—Code, constituting evidence of cohabitation in state following marriage outside substitute for second marriage in state, is both substantive law and rule of evidence (Pen. Code, § 1106).

Pen. Code, § 1106, providing that, on trial of bigamy, proof that second marriage took place out of state, accompanied by proof of cohabitation in state, is sufficient to sustain charge, held intended both as rule of evidence and rule of substantive law, and to constitute evidence of cohabitation in state following marriage outside state a complete substitute for second marriage within state.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; William T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Henry W. J. Ellis, also known as Henry J. Ellis, was charged by information with bigamy. From an order of the superior court dismissing the information, the People appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal, 260 P. 384.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Brantley W. Dobbins, Dist. Atty., of San Francisco, and Leo C. Dunnell, Deputy Asst. Atty., of Richmond, for the People.

Joseph M. Raines, of Fairfield, Russell F. O'Hara, of Vallejo, and Theodore W. Chester, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This record presents but two questions: (1) May the people appeal under the facts here shown? and (2) if they may so appeal, does the information state a public offense over which the court below had jurisdiction? As we have been led to the firm conclusion that both questions must be answered in the affirmative, they will be considered in the order stated.

On January 24, 1927, the district attorney of Solano county informed against the defendant, attempting to charge him with the offense of bigamy, using language here material as follows: "The said Henry W. J. Ellis, * * * on or about the 27th day of September, A. D. nineteen hundred and twenty-six, at Kansas City, state of Missouri, and before the filing of this information, did knowingly, willfully and feloniously marry one Ida Lou Johnson, the said defendant being then and there the lawful husband of another person, to wit, Alice Burton Ellis, then and there living, the marriage of said defendant and said Alice Burton Ellis not having been annulled, * * * said defendant and said Ida Lou Johnson Ellis having on or about the 2d day of October, 1926, and ever since said date, cohabited together as husband and wife, in Vallejo township, in the county of Solano, state of California. * * *"

In due course, the defendant was arraigned on said information, and thereafter, and on February 7, 1927, entered a plea of not guilty without having theretofore interposed a motion to set aside or a demurrer to the said information. The cause was then set for trial for March 29, 1927, and was thereafter regularly postponed with the consent of defendant until April 26, 1927. On the date last mentioned, the cause was called for trial, and a venire was present from which to select trial jurors. At this juncture, and before the selection of the jury, defendant, through his counsel, asked that the venire be excused from the courtroom. This was done, and thereupon counsel for defendant orally stated to the court that he objected to further proceedings in the cause, upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction over the offense charged, and upon the further ground that the facts charged in the information did not constitute an offense punishable by law, and said counsel, upon the same grounds, moved for a discharge of the defendant. The matter was argued, and later, on April 28, 1927, the clerk's minutes recite the following as having occurred:

> "Counsel having presented their respective arguments and the matter having been submitted, the court now grants the motion of the defendant asking that defendant be discharged, and orders the defendant discharged and the court further orders that in the interest of justice the action be dismissed."

The reporter's transcript also shows the following version of the proceedings had on the same day:

> "The Court: It is ordered that the objections of the defendant to the court proceeding with the trial of the case be sustained, and it is further ordered that the motion of the defendant, asking that the defendant be discharged be, and the same is granted, and it is further ordered that the action be dismissed.
> "Mr. Dobbins: And, your honor, also that we now give notice, at this time, of appeal."

Mr. Dobbins was the district attorney, and represented the people. There is no question made as to the regularity of the form of the appeal taken.

[1] It thus appears that, before a jury was impaneled, the defendant moved for a dismissal of the action and for his discharge, asserting lack of jurisdiction over the offense, and also that the information stated no public offense. It should be noted that, at the time of this action, the plea of defendant had not been formally withdrawn, nor was the motion in writing. It should also be noted, however, that jeopardy had not yet attached. People v. Hawkins, 127 Cal. 372, 59 P. 697; In re Harron, 191 Cal. 457, 466, 217 P. 728; People v. Hinshaw, 194 Cal. 1, 227 P. 156; Ex parte Wilson, 196 Cal. 515, 238 P. 359. Ordinarily an order dismissing a felony charge prior to the impaneling of the jury does not place the defendant in jeopardy. People v. Campbell, 59 Cal. 243, 43 Am. Rep. 257; Ex parte Clarke, 54 Cal. 412.

[2] Section 1238 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1897 (St. 1897, p. 195), gives to the people the right of appeal in the following cases:

> "(1) From an order setting aside the indictment or information; (2) from a judgment for the defendant on a demurrer to the indictment, accusation or information; (3) from an order granting a new trial; (4) from an order arresting judgment; (5) from an order made after judgment, affecting the substantial rights of the people."

The grounds upon which defendant moved the court for a dismissal of the action are grounds of demurrer specified in section 1004 of the Penal Code, subdivisions 1 and 4. It is also to be noted that, under section 1012 of the Penal Code, these two grounds of objection are not only proper grounds for demurrer, but are not waived by a plea of not guilty, and may be asserted at any time, even in arrest of judgment. People v. Welton, 190 Cal. 236, 238, 211 P. 802.

[3] The right of the district attorney to move for this dismissal of the cause in furtherance of justice or the right of the court to likewise act in furtherance of justice and to dismiss an action under section 1385 of the Penal Code is not here involved, for the reason that the motion was not made either by the district attorney or upon the court's own initiative, and, furthermore, the reasons for the dismissal are not set forth in an order entered upon the minutes of the court. This section apparently confers no privilege upon the defendant. People v. Montgomery, 36 Misc. Rep. 326, 73 N. Y. S. 535, 537.

[4] From the above situation it appears that, if the defendant had demurred to the information upon the grounds later urged, the people would have had an appeal from the judgment made upon an order sustaining such demurrer. It is also true that, had the defendant been convicted and the motion here under consideration been made in arrest of judgment and granted, the people would have had the right of appeal. It is impossible to distinguish the present situation from a case where a demurrer had been interposed, sustained, and a judgment rendered for the defendant before the entry of a plea of not guilty. In other words, the situation is the same as though the court had permitted withdrawal of the plea of not guilty and had also permitted an opportunity to demur, as provided in sections 1004 and 1005 of the Penal Code, with a resultant judgment discharging the defendant after sustaining the same. The defendant is in no position to urge a lack of power in the people to appeal because the court indulged him in this behalf so long as the proceeding occurred prior to the impaneling of the jury, and thereby fell short of putting him once in jeopardy.

The learned Attorney General also contends that the order made by the court was tantamount to an order setting aside the information. None of the grounds specified for setting aside an information appear to cover the case before us. Pen. Code, § 995. We think it more properly comes under subdivision 2 of section 1238, and that the attorney for the defendant had in mind the grounds of demurrer above referred to under subdivisions 1 and 4 of section 1004. The authorities cited by respondent in support of his contention that the people have been given no appeal are not in point, and may be disposed of as follows:

People v. Richter, 113 Cal. 473, 474, 45 P. 811, and People v. Higgins, 114 Cal. 63, 64, 45 P. 1004, are cases which arose under section 1238 as it read prior to the amendment of 1897. In other words, at the time these two cases were handed down, there was no appeal allowed from an order setting aside an indictment or information, and the cases manifestly relate to attempted appeals from orders so made.

People v. Hollis, 65 Cal. 78, 2 P. 893, is not in point, as the dismissal there was upon the ground of failure to prosecute, which is neither a ground for demurrer nor a ground for setting aside an indictment or information.

People v. More, 71 Cal. 546, 12 P. 631, was an appeal from an order dismissing an action pursuant to section 1385 where the court on its own motion and in furtherance of justice dismissed said action; therefore it is not a case even now covered by section 1238.

People v. Knowles, 27 Cal. App. 498, 155 P. 137, and the several other allied cases involving similar actions and reported in the same volume, are not in point, for the reason that in those cases the orders appealed from were not orders specified in said section 1238, but were dismissals of actions after jeopardy because the rights of the defendant had been invaded by taking him before the grand jury, and thus violating his constitutional right to refrain from giving testimony against himself.

There is no case which we can find, nor has any been called to our attention, requiring the court to dismiss an appeal by the people made under the circumstances here set forth. It is our view that to give the people the right of appeal from a judgment following an order sustaining a demurrer and from an order made in arrest of judgment based upon these same grounds, and yet to deny them an appeal, where, through the courtesy of the court or lack of opposition on the part of the people, the motion did not take the form of a written demurrer would be to sacrifice substance for form.

[5] The second branch of the case involving the question of the sufficiency of the information to charge a public offense must also, as above stated, be resolved in favor of the people. It is true that section 281 of the Penal Code reads as follows: "Every person having a husband or wife living, who marries any other person, except in the cases specified in the next section, is guilty of bigamy," and so reading would, standing alone, be inapplicable to a second marriage without the state. State v. Stephens, 118 Me. 237, 107 A. 296. But it is also true that section 1106 of said Code makes the following provisions:

> "Upon a trial for bigamy, it is not necessary to prove either of the marriages by the register, certificate, or other record evidence thereof, but the same may be proved by such evidence as is admissible to prove a marriage in other cases; and when the second marriage took place out of this state, proof of that fact, accompanied with proof of cohabitation thereafter in this state, is sufficient to sustain the charge."

[6] It is further true that these two sections are but a codification of the statute of 1861 (Stats. 1861, p. 415), which in turn was founded upon the statute of 1850 (Stats. 1850, p. 244), each of which read as follows:

> "Bigamy consists in the having of two wives or two husbands, at one and the same time, knowing that the former husband or wife is still alive. * * * It shall not be necessary to prove either of the said marriages by the register or certificate thereof, or other record evidence, but the same may be proved by such evidence as is admissible to prove a marriage in other cases, and when such second marriage shall have taken place without this state, cohabitation in this state, after such second marriage, shall be deemed a commission of the crime of bigamy. * * *"

It will be presumed, in the absence of clear legislative intent to the contrary, that the codified act carries the same interpretation as the original one. "The readoption of these provisions without change in effect adopted the interpretation theretofore placed thereon by the courts. * * *" People v. Dist. Court of Appeal, 193 Cal. 19, 20, 222 P. 353; see to the same effect Pen. Code, § 5; Lindsay-Strathmore I. Dist. v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 315, 333, 187 P. 1056, and People v. Webb, 38 Cal. 467.

[7, 8] The contention of respondent that it was not the legislative intent to include, in the definition of "bigamy," cases, where the second marriage occurred without the state of California, is largely based upon the proposition that section 1106 is found under a division title and topical head of the Code respecting evidence. While this is true, it is also true that the plain, unambiguous language not only announces a rule of evidence, but also declares substantive law. The conclusion that cohabitation in this state was intended to be sufficient is the more readily deduced when it is considered that the first marriage need not, under our own decisions, be performed within the state of California. In other words, bigamy may be punished in this state, if the second marriage occurs here, even if the first marriage occurred in a foreign state or even in a foreign country. People v. Giesea, 61 Cal. 53; People v. Priestley, 17 Cal. App. 171, 176, 118 P. 965; 7 Cor. Juris, p. 1160. Under these holdings, it is not even required that the information contain an allegation of the time or place of the first marriage. If, then, the first marriage need not occur in the state, it is well within reason to say that cohabitation in this state after a second bigamous marriage occurring also out of the state should be punishable here upon legislative declaration to that effect. The power of the Legislature to so protect society against such an immoral act cannot be questioned. It has been well stated in the case of State v. Stewart, 194 Mo. 345, 92 S. W. 878,

112 Am. St. Rep. 529, 5 Ann. Cas. 963, as follows:

> "The prototype of our statutes on the subject of bigamy and bigamous cohabitation is found in the statute 9 George IV, chapter 31, section 22, which provides that 'if any person, being married, shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife, whether the second marriage shall have taken place in England or elsewhere, every such offender, and every person counseling, aiding or abetting such offender, shall be guilty of felony,' etc. This statute is to all intents substantially reaffirmed in 24 & 25 Victoria, chapter 100, section 57. Many of our sister states have followed the statute of 9 George IV, conforming it to our American conditions. That the General Assembly of Missouri has the power, for the protection of good morals and to punish indecency, to make the cohabitation of a man and woman begun under a bigamous marriage in another state, a felony in this state, there can be no sort of question, and it is practically conceded by the learned counsel for the defendant in this case that if the General Assembly had denominated the offense which it denounced in section 2169 of the Revised Statutes of 1899, a felony, only and not bigamy, there could be no constitutional objection to it. Indeed, a similar statute is found in many of our sister states. Thus it is provided by section 4933 of the Iowa Code that, 'If any person who has a former husband or wife living marry another person or continue to cohabit with such second husband or wife he or she, except in the cases mentioned in the following section, is guilty of bigamy.' * * *"

[9] Many states have statutes similar to our own; the only distinction worthy of note being that such declaration is in the same paragraph defining the offense. But the language of section 1106 cannot be held to be a mistake or error on the part of the legislative body, for its language is too clear, plain, and ample in its scope to admit of any other construction than that it was intended to constitute evidence of cohabitation in this state, following marriage outside the state, a complete substitute for a second marriage within the state.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to set aside the said order and proceed in due course with the disposition of the case.

CUNNING v. HUMBOLDT COUNTY.

Supreme Court of California. April 13, 1928.

1. Counties 🔑206(3)—Rejection of claim by supervisors does not bind claimant.

In absence of fraud, the approval of a claim by the local board of supervisors is conclusive on the county, but board's rejection of the claim does not prevent claimant's bringing action at law to establish it.

2. Trial 🔑141—Trial court may direct verdict for party having burden, where evidence is not substantially conflicting or facts are admitted.

In the absence of substantial conflict in the evidence as to facts determining case, or where facts are admitted, trial court may properly direct verdict for the party upon whom the burden of proof rests.

3. District and prosecuting attorneys 🔑3(5)—Evidence of services rendered district attorney at agreed rate in assisting in enforcement of liquor laws, where not substantially contradicted, warranted direction of verdict against county (Pol. Code, § 4307, subd. 2).

In action against county under Pol. Code, § 4307, subd. 2, for services rendered district attorney at agreed rate in detection of crime in regard to violation of liquor laws and in gathering evidence, and for use of cars for such purposes, evidence of services actually performed under agreement with district attorney held to warrant trial court's direction of verdict in plaintiff's favor, where there was no substantial conflict in the evidence.

4. District and prosecuting attorneys 🔑3(5)—Incidental performance of sheriff's duties held not to prevent plaintiff's recovery for services rendered district attorney in enforcement of prohibition law (Pol. Code §§ 4157, 4187, and § 4307, subd. 2).

In action against county under Pol. Code, § 4307, subd. 2, for services rendered district attorney in detection of crime and gathering of evidence to be used in prosecutions for violation of prohibition law, fact that claimants, in performance of their duties, were required at times to trench upon duties of other county officers as in the matter of serving warrants and making raids, held not to preclude recovery of agreed compensation under sections 4157, 4187, on ground that claimants were performing services of sheriffs and constables and thus receiving increase in salary by being relieved of performance of their duties.

5. Officers 🔑100(1)—Payment of persons employed by district attorney to assist in enforcement of prohibition law held not to increase compensation of county detective during term (Pol. Code, § 4249, subd. 9, and § 4307, subd. 2; Const. art. 11, § 9).

Employment of persons to assist district attorney in detecting crime and gathering evidence in enforcement of prohibition laws under Pol. Code, § 4307, subd. 2, and payment of their agreed claims, held not to constitute increase in compensation of county detective during term of office, in violation of Const. art. 11, § 9, and Pol. Code, § 4249, subd. 9, since detective is merely an appointive officer, holding at the pleasure of the appointing power.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

6. District and prosecuting attorneys 🔑3(5)—District attorney's authorization of use of privately owned automobiles by persons hired in detection of crime held not improper (Pol. Code, § 4307, subd. 2).

In absence of showing that automobiles had been purchased for and assigned to the exclusive use of the district attorney's office, district attorney did not exceed bounds of propriety in authorizing use of privately owned automobiles and paying reasonable compensation therefor in connection with hiring men to assist in detection of crime and prosecutions under prohibition law, under Pol. Code, § 4307, subd. 2.

7. District and prosecuting attorneys 🔑3(5)—Testimony as to availability of county cars held inadmissible in action against county for services and for use of privately owned automobiles in assisting district attorney in enforcing prohibition law (Pol. Code, § 4307, subd. 2).

Where it was not shown that particular automobiles were assigned for exclusive use of district attorney's office, rejection of evidence as to availability of county cars for county work held not error in action against county under Pol. Code, § 4307, subd. 2, for personal services rendered and for agreed compensation for use of privately owned automobiles in assisting district attorney in detection of crime in connection with enforcement of prohibition law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by John Cunning against Humboldt County for personal services. Judgment in plaintiff's favor, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal (256 P. 841).

John F. Quinn, of Eureka, for appellant.

H. C. Nelson, of Eureka, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was instituted to establish as county charges several claims theretofore rejected, either in whole or in part, by the board of supervisors of the defendant county. From the judgment entered upon a directed verdict, the defendant appeals. The complaint consists of six separate causes of action, each for personal services alleged to have been performed and expenses incurred during the month of July, 1925—either by the plaintiff personally or his assignors—while assisting the district attorney of the defendant county in the detection of crime and the gathering of evidence to be used in the prosecution of criminal cases. Section 4307 of the Political Code has to do with county charges, and subdivision 2 thereof, so far as pertinent here, enumerates as such "the traveling and other personal expenses of the district attorney, incurred in criminal cases arising in the county, * * * and all other expenses necessarily incurred by him in the detection of crime and prosecution of criminal cases. * * *" The employment of the plaintiff and his assignors by the district attorney during the period designated finds authority in the provisions of this section.

[1, 2] In the absence of fraud, the approval of a claim by the local board of supervisors is conclusive upon the county. County of Yolo v. Joyce, 156 Cal. 429, 432, 105 P. 125. However, the converse does not necessarily follow, and, upon the rejection of a claim by such board, the claimant may bring an action at law and establish his claim against the county as fully and effectively as it would have been established by a favorable order of the board in the first instance. Thiel Det. Co. v. Tuolumne County, 37 Cal. App. 423, 429, 173 P. 1120. In the instant case, as we have seen, the verdict for plaintiff was rendered in response to a direction of the trial court to that effect. It is settled that, in the absence of substantial conflict in the evidence as to the facts determinative of a case, or where such facts are admitted, the trial court may, with propriety, direct a verdict for the party upon whom the burden of proof rests. O'Connor v. Witherby, 111 Cal. 523, 528, 44 P. 227; Los Angeles F. & M. Co. v. Thompson, 117 Cal. 594, 600, 49 P. 714; Kohn v. Nat. Film Corp., 60 Cal. App. 112, 116, 212 P. 207. This being so, the question to be determined upon this appeal would seem to be whether there is any substantial evidence in the record which would warrant a verdict favorable to the defendant county or a reduction of the amount awarded to the plaintiff under the judgment. We are decidedly of the opinion that the lower court properly granted the plaintiff's motion for a directed verdict. The district attorney, appearing as a witness for the plaintiff, testified, among other things, that during the month of July, 1925, the period covered by the rejected claims, he employed eight men, including the claimants, to do the character of work for which the claims involved herein were presented; that during that month these men were employed principally in "securing evidence in the detection of crime in regard to the violation of the liquor laws," but that "very usually there was other work they did during that time"; that they were employed "to detect the commission of crime and to secure evidence for the prosecution of criminal cases" generally; that a "big part of their work" was "raiding" places where intoxicating liquors were manufactured or sold; that the men were paid at the rate of $5 a day during the time they were actually working and the cost of their meals and their hotel expenses when away from their homes; that this wage rate had for several years been paid by the county for this class of service; that "they had to use automobiles, as their work took them all over the entire county"; that he agreed to pay each of them who used his own automobile at the rate of 15 cents a mile; that the supervisors had fixed that rate "for the use of what they termed 'dry squad cars'"; that from three to five of such employees would ride in each automobile; that the dangers of the work were such that it was necessary for the employees to travel in groups for their own protection; that "there wasn't a day or an hour outside of the time they had to sleep but what there was work to do"; that at various times during the month of July, 1925, "anywhere from one to a dozen complaints of law violations were made daily; some were made by telephone, some are made in person by people calling at the office, some are made by letter"; that the character of these complaints was such as to require immediate action if the offenses reported were to be officially detected and investigated and diligently prosecuted; that the complaints coming into his office during July, 1925, were sufficient in number to keep the claimants "busy every hour of their employment, and I could have used 50 per cent. more if I could have gotten the men to work, I had that much work ahead of me"; that he intrusted to the county detective the immediate detail of dividing the men into squads and dispatching them to the scene of possible violations of the law; that "invariably if they were to enter buildings they had search warrants"; that "sometimes if they know in advance of a car and person bringing it, they obtain search warrants of the courts" to search automobiles; that "generally one man carries the search warrant and the others assist him * * * searching and procuring the evidence"; that he "made no requests for their appointment as deputy sheriffs"; that, as "a small accommodation" to the sheriff, he would send one of the employees for a few minutes to take a prisoner from the county jail to "the justice of the peace, or bring him across to the courthouse"; and that he did not "know of any cars whatever that had been assigned to the use of the district attorney's office, either during the month of July or any other month." At this point it may be said that all of the claimants had been deputized by the sheriff, but the record, on the whole, tends to indicate that they did not receive any compensation as such. Without attempting to give a synoptical statement of the testimony of each of the several claimants it may be said that they testified, in substance, as to their employment by the district attorney to assist in the detecting of crime and the gathering of evidence to be used in the prosecution of criminal cases. Each also stated that his claim, as presented, was correct and represented only such sums as were owing to him for services actually rendered and expenses actually incurred in the county service under his appointment and assignment by the district attorney. The testimony of said claimants also discloses that much of their time was given over to detecting violations of the liquor law and securing evidence in such cases.

[3] This summary of the evidence furnishes sufficient foundation upon which to predicate a holding that the plaintiff had produced ample evidence to sustain the burden resting upon him of establishing the necessity for, and the reasonableness of, the charges contained in the several claims sued upon. The defendant county utterly failed, in our opinion, to produce any evidence substantially conflicting with that offered by the plaintiff. In fact, practically all of its evidence was adduced by way of cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses. Such cross-examination did not serve to weaken, in any material respect, the effect of the direct testimony of said witnesses. As we have said, the absence of substantial conflict in the evidence justified the trial court's action in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

[4] We attach no particular significance to the fact that the claimants in the performance of their duties were required, at times, to trench upon the duties of other county officers in the matter, for instance, of serving warrants and making raids. In Cunning v. Carr, 69 Cal. App. 230, 233, 230 P. 987, 988, the plaintiff sought and had issued a writ of mandate compelling the auditor of Humboldt county to pay certain claims against said county, which claims had theretofore been passed upon and allowed by the board of supervisors. The claims represented sums alleged to be owing to the plaintiff therein or his several assignors for services rendered to the district attorney's office in the detecting of crime and the gathering of evidence to be used in criminal cases. Upon the appeal it was urged that the plaintiff's assignors "were really traffic officers and officers employed by the district attorney to enforce the provisions of the Volstead Act [27 USCA], as adopted by the Wright Act of this state" [St. 1921, p. 79]. In disposing of this contention the opinion declares that:

> "While the conclusion might be drawn from the testimony in this case and set forth in the transcript that the assignors of the respondent acted at times in the capacity of traffic officers, and also what is popularly termed 'a dry squad' and at times made arrests, under the law of this state, it is the work to be performed or the duties to which one may be assigned that determines his status as an officer or an employee. The mere fact that an employee may perform services not coming strictly within the duties imposed upon him by reason of his employment, or which may be exercised by him in common with other citizens of the state, does not, it seems to us, change his status from that of an employee to that of an officer, or from that of an officer to that of an employee. * * *
> "Were the assignors of the respondent performing services which the laws casts upon sheriffs and constables, and so, in one sense, increasing their salaries by relieving them of the performance of duties required by law?

Section 4157 of the Political Code requires the sheriff to preserve the peace, to arrest and take before the nearest magistrate all persons who attempt to, or who have committed a public offense, prevent and suppress affrays, etc., attend courts, serve processes, and perform certain other duties enumerated in the section. Section 4187 of the same Code in relation to the duties of constables sets forth that such officers shall serve all processes, attend justice courts in their townships, and act in certain other capacities. Neither one of said sections requires either a sheriff or any constable to act in the capacity of sleuth or detective. Thus it follows that if any one is employed by the district attorney to perform services outside of the duties cast by law upon the sheriff or a constable, none of the provisions of the state Constitution relating to the salaries of such officers are in any way affected, nor does the fact that such persons may go further and make arrests as private individuals may do, after having completed their investigations, in any wise cause their employment to trench upon the inhibitions of the Constitution relating to the increase of the compensation of such officers by relieving them of the performance of certain duties."

In the same case, the court, in speaking of subdivision 2 of section 4307 of the Political Code, above quoted from, declares:

> "The section itself expressly authorizes the payment of all expenses necessarily incurred by the district attorney in the detection of crime and prosecution of criminal cases. It does not limit the employment for the purpose of detection of crime to any particular specified cases. The district attorney may not know, and probably does not know, in the first instance, the persons guilty of crime. If he did, there would be no necessity under the statute for employing some one to detect the criminal. The district attorney may be conscious that the penal laws of the state are being violated, and is yet absolutely unable to place his hand on the violator. That this is true in regard to violators of the motor vehicle laws and the liquor laws of the state does not render the employment of some one to detect the guilty parties any less within the provisions of the Code sections than if the circumstances coming to the attention of the district attorney indicated that some one had committed the crime of murder. In that case the statute gives the district attorney the authority to employ some one to detect the offender. The fact also that violators of the motor vehicle laws and the liquor laws are constant and continuous does not tie the hands of the district attorney in regard to the employment of some one to detect the offenders, but, on the contrary, increases the necessity and almost imperatively demands the exercise by the district attorney of the powers conferred upon him by the provisions of section 4307 of the Political Code."

It may be said that the Legislature, since the decision in Cunning v. Carr, supra, has amended subdivision 2 of section 4307 of the Political Code, in a manner not material to the instant cause, by omitting therefrom expenses incurred in detecting and procuring evidence of violations of the motor vehicle act.

[5] We find no merit in the appellant's contention that the employment of the claimants and the payment of their claims constitute an increase in the compensation of the county detective in violation of article 11, § 9, of the Constitution. Subdivision 9 of section 4249 of the Political Code provides for the appointment of such officer by the district attorney of the appellant county. In Bayley v. Garrison, 190 Cal. 690, 692, 214 P. 871, 872, the following is approved:

> "The general rule, however, seems to be that this constitutional prohibition against changing the salary of a public officer during his term of office applies only to officers who have a fixed and definite term, and does not apply to appointive officers, who hold only at the pleasure of the appointing power."

To the same effect is Harrold v. Barnum, 8 Cal. App. 21, 23, 96 P. 104. Therefore, if it be assumed, without deciding, that the employment of the claimants herein results in an increase of the county detective's compensation, it cannot be said to violate the constitutional provision, for that officer is merely an appointive officer holding at the pleasure of the appointing power.

[6, 7] Nor do we find any merit in the appellant's further contention that the trial court erred in sustaining objections to two questions asked of a member of the board of supervisors as to the availability of county cars for county work. Objections to these questions were promptly interposed, and sustained, upon the ground that the evidence thus sought to be elicited was incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant and not the "best evidence" upon the subject. We are of the opinion that evidence merely tending to show that the appellant might have had certain automobiles available for general county purposes would be immaterial to and inadmissible in an action of the nature of that here involved, both because of the broad and comprehensive powers conferred upon the district attorney by the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 4307 of the Political Code, and the peculiar character of the work to be performed by his office in the detecting of crime and the securing of evidence to be used in the prosecution of criminal cases. It cannot be denied that this work was, and is, such as demands the continuous presence and the immediate availability of the agencies necessarily required in the pursuit and apprehension of law violators. From the questions propounded to the witness it is evident that the evidence sought to be adduced would not have shown that certain automobiles had been purchased for and assigned to the exclusive use of the district attorney's office. In the absence of such a showing it cannot be said that the district attorney exceeded the bounds of propriety, when, in conformity to the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 4307, supra, he authorized the use of privately owned automobiles. As already stated, the reasonableness of the charge therefor was established upon the trial. We find no error in any of the rulings complained of by the appellant.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

COLLIER v. LINDLEY et al. (S. F. 12714.)

Supreme Court of California. March 26, 1928.

1. Trusts 🔑51—Provision for payment of $500 to named person conditioned on validity of trust held improper attempt to secure judicial determination in advance of controversy (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1138–1140).

Provision of trust agreement for payment to named person sum of $500 conditioned on trust or some portion thereof held an attempt to engage attention and compel labors of several courts in order to effectuate judicial determination of validity or invalidity of trust in advance of any real contest or controversy, in violation of the spirit and intent of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1138–1140.

2. Perpetuities 🔑8(1)—Transfer of property to trustees in perpetuity to promote improvements in government and economic conditions and other connective matters held valid; "eleemosynary" "charitable" (Const. art. 20, § 9).

Transfer of property to trustees in perpetuity for advancement of methods of government and working and economic conditions and to assist in education, strengthening prohibitive legislation affecting intoxicants and narcotics, promoting justice for American Indians, and preserving right of free speech and assembly held valid, under Const. art. 20, § 9, forbidding perpetuities except for "eleemosynary" purposes; the term "eleemosynary" as used therein being synonymous with "charitable" as used and understood in trusts.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Eleemosynary; Second Series, Charitable.]

3. Charities 🔑21(1)—Element of indefiniteness of beneficiaries in charitable trust is no objection to its validity.

Element of indefiniteness of beneficiaries in charitable trust is not only not an objection to its validity, but as a rule is of the essence of all charitable trusts of a public or quasi public character.

4. Charities 🔑22(1)—Trust held not invalid for uncertainty because of provision to encourage and support industrial co-operation that "justice" may be done to employer and employee.

Trust to promote improvements in methods of government and working conditions and to improve economic conditions and assist in education and in promoting justice for Indians held not invalid for uncertainty in empowering trustees to indorse, encourage, and support industrial co-operation to end that justice may be done to employer and employee alike; meaning of term "justice" as used therein being a constant and perpetual disposition to render every man his due.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Justice.]

5. Charities 🔑4—Courts will endeavor to carry attempted charitable trust into effect, if possible, consistently with law.

Courts of equity possess enlarged powers in giving effect to trust for charitable uses and will endeavor to carry attempted charitable donations into effect if it can be done consistently with rules of law.

6. Charities 🔑21(1)—Clause authorizing trustees to extend aid to Indians in attaining justice held not invalid for uncertainty.

Clause in trust instrument authorizing trustees to extend aid to particular Indians or groups of Indians in attaining justice held not invalid because of uncertainty in respect to beneficiaries.

7. Charities 🔑4—Trust authorizing trustees to promote government improvements and assist in other connected matters by lawful means held not invalid as investing trustees with indefinite powers.

Trust instrument authorizing trustees to promote improvements in government methods, working and economic conditions, and to assist in education and promoting justice for Indians and other connected matters, and requiring that means used in furtherance of such purposes should be lawful means held not invalid as investing trustees with indefinite powers.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Controversy without action between John Collier and Francis H. Lindley and others to establish the validity of a certain trust. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Alan H. Critcher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis Bartlett, of San Francisco (J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This proceeding has arisen out of an endeavor on the part of John Randolph Haynes and his wife, Dora Haynes, to procure a final ruling of the courts upon the validity, in whole or in part, of a certain trust sought to be established by them and each of them under the name of "the John Randolph and Dora Haynes Foundation." The method employed to secure such ruling is to be found in the terms of a clause in the document whereby said trust was sought to be created, and which reads as follows:

"Paragraph Sixteenth. In the event that this instrument does not create a valid, charitable > trust, or, if it be finally adjudicated that any purpose set forth herein be invalid, the sum of $500 out of the corpus of the estate shall belong to, and be forthwith paid to, John Collier."

[1] The present litigation was initiated in the superior court in and for the county of Alameda in the form of a proceeding instituted by the said John Collier under the provisions of sections 1138, 1139, and 1140 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provide for the submission of controversies without action upon agreed facts for the purpose of procuring a declaratory judgment thereon. It nowhere appears from the record herein that John Collier, the institutor of this proceeding, is related to the creators of said purported trust, or is in any wise interested in the corpus or carrying into effect thereof except as to that relationship or interest which exists by virtue of the provisions of the foregoing clause in said document. An examination of the above-quoted clause will show that said John Collier was not by its terms required to institute or to defend any action or proceeding begun by those directly interested therein for the purpose of having said purported trust declared to be valid or invalid, or to enforce any of the other terms or provisions thereof. He is, in short, required to create no controversy, and to perform no service whatever in order to be entitled to receive and to have judgment for the sum of $500 to be paid him as provided therein. The provision for the payment to him of the sum of $500 conditioned upon said trust or some portion thereof being invalid is nothing more nor less than a thinly veiled attempt to engage the attention and compel the labors of the several courts of record of this state in order to effectuate a judicial determination of the validity or invalidity of said trust at once and in advance of any real contest or controversy between the parties in interest therein over its properties or provisions, and as such we hold it to be in plain violation of the spirit and intent of the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure above referred to, as well as of the general principle that courts should only be employed in the adjudication of actual as distinguished from moot questions and controversies when these are brought before them in the regular and orderly course of litigation by those parties only who are directly interested in their adjudication. We therefore unreservedly disapprove the insertion in documents or agreements of clauses of the character and intent of that above quoted, which have for their manifest purpose that of inviting and encouraging litigation in regard to matters with relation to which no real cause of action has arisen; and in the instant case we would have no hesitation in carrying our aforesaid disapproval to the extent of ordering a dismissal of this appeal but for the fact that there are certain questions of public interest which are involved therein and which arise entirely apart from the interest of the parties to the immediate proceeding.

The document by the terms of which John Randolph Haynes and his wife, Dora Haynes, have undertaken to create and to devote certain of their properties to sustain a trust under the title of "the John Randolph and Dora Haynes Foundation" is before us, and the substance and terms thereof, after the recitals of the properties to be allocated thereto and the trustees to be invested therewith, reads in part as follows:

> "Paragraph Sixth. The trustees shall hold the said trust estate in trust for the following uses and purposes:
> "Section I. To promote and assist in promoting and obtaining, maintaining and making improvements in the structure and methods of government, national, state and/or local, by obtaining, protecting, preserving, and/or furthering, by any or all legitimate ways,
> "(a) Investigating the causes of industrial ac- public utilities.
> "(b) Direct legislation, now known as the Initiative, Referendum, and Recall.
> "(c) Such improvements in the direct, popular nomination and election of public officials as will enable the electorate to vote more intelligently and efficiently; simplify nomination and election procedure; and insure a more adequate representation in government of the important groups.
> "(d) Assisting in the making, amending, and/or reviewing of city charters, county charters, and state and national Constitutions.
> "Sec. II. (a) To improve living conditions of the working people by investigating the causes of poverty, preventing the operation of such causes, and remedying or ameliorating the conditions resulting therefrom, by any legitimate means.
> "(b) To study, investigate and encourage the introduction into the United States of America of the co-operative system of selling and purchasing food, household and other requirements, under the system generally known as the 'Rochdale System of Co-operation.'
> "Sec. III. To improve working conditions for men, women, and children by:
> "(a) Investgating the causes of industrial accidents and diseases; including, among other things, the relation of hours of labor to the health of workers, and the conditions under which work is performed;
> "(b) Helping, by all lawful means, to prevent the continuance of conditions inimical to the health, welfare, and safety of workers, and helping to secure better working conditions for them.
> "Sec. IV. To induce, encourage, and support industrial co-operation, to the end that justice may be done to employer and employee alike, and harmony be established and maintained between them, and industrial hatred and strife abolished, thereby benefiting mankind in general.
> "Sec. V. To encourage and give educational opportunities for the study of—

"(a) Governmental problems and reforms furthering 'government of the people, by the people, and for the people';

"(b) Industrial problems with special reference to improvements in living and working conditions of the working people;

"(c) Social problems with special reference to improvements in health, sanitation, and morals of the working people;

by paying wholly, or partially, lecturers and instructors on matters included in this section V, and/or by furnishing appropriate books and literature on these matters, and/or by donations to institutions or organizations to be applied in furthering the causes in this section designated, and/or by assisting in obtaining or supporting, or helping to enforce legislation for such purposes, or any of them.

"Sec. VI. To further the improvement of the human race by aiding and encouraging the science of Eugenics, which deals with the heritable qualities of the human race; and by aiding and encouraging the practicable application of the principles of that science.

"Sec. VII. To assist in securing, maintaining, enforcing and strengthening prohibition and other legislation, national, state and/or local, affecting the manufacture, and use, and/or disposition of alcoholic beverages and/or intoxicating liquors and/or narcotic drugs by all lawful means and/or by investigating the operation and enforcement of laws and ordinances relating to those questions, and the results flowing therefrom.

"Sec. VIII. To promote justice for the American Indian in the United States by assisting in procuring legislation and/or by stimulating the proper enforcement of legislation to that end, and/or by assisting individual, or bodies of, Indians in obtaining that justice.

"Sec. IX. To assist in preserving and strengthening the rights of the citizens of the United States to 'freedom of speech * * * and peacefully to assemble, and to petition the government for redress of grievances,' by donations to particular institutions or bodies, operating wholly or partially, permanently, or temporarily, for those purposes.

"Paragraph Seventh. In properly carrying out and aiding all and any of the purposes and objects of the trust, the trustees in general shall have full power and authority:

"Sec. I. To employ and pay attorneys, lecturers, writers, investigators, and such assistants and employees of every kind as they may deem necessary.

"Sec. II. To buy, print, publish, and/or distribute, by mail or otherwise, to whom they may think proper, appropriate pamphlets, cards, notices and information;

"Sec. III. To buy and distribute, by mail or otherwise, to whom they may think proper, copies of appropriate newspapers, magazines, and books.

"Sec. IV. To disseminate by all lawful means such information as in the judgment of the trustees may be useful in carrying out the purposes of this trust.

"Sec. V. To draft and/or assist in drafting, appropriate bills and acts, laws, and other proposed legislation, and use all lawful means to have them introduced, passed, made effective, and enforced."

[2] The trust thus sought to be created is in perpetuity to the trustees designated in the document establishing the same and to their successors to be chosen in the manner therein provided. The amount and value of the property with which the trustees are to be thus invested is but a comparatively small portion of the estate and properties of the creators thereof, and it is not for that reason objectionable to the provisions of law limiting the amount of a testator's or trustor's property which may be devoted to charitable uses. The immediate questions which are therefore presented to us for determination are as to whether the transfer of the properties set forth in said document to trustees in perpetuity for the advancement of the purposes which are set forth with so much detail in the foregoing excerpts from said instrument, or any considerable portion of such purposes, is void as in violation of the Constitution and laws of this state against perpetuities.

The Constitution of this state provides in section 9 of article 20 thereof that, "No perpetuities shall be allowed except for eleemosynary purposes." The term "eleemosynary" as thus used in the Constitution has been held to be synonymous with "charitable" as used and understood in treatises and decisions upon the subject of trusts (Estate of Sutro, 155 Cal. 727, 734, 102 P. 920; Estate of Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 45 P. 270, 35 L. R. A. 269), and in the last above-cited case the term "charitable trust" is defined to be:

> "A donation in trust for promoting the welfare of mankind at large, or of a community, or of some class forming a part of it, indefinite as to numbers and individuals. It may, but it need not, confer a gratuitous benefit upon the poor. It may, but it need not, look to the care of the sick or insane. It may, but it need not, seek to spread religion or piety. Schools and libraries, equally with asylums, hospitals, and religious institutions, are included within its scope. It is impossible to enumerate specifically all purposes for which an eleemosynary trust may be created. The difficulty is inherent in the subject-matter itself. With the progress of civilization new needs are developed, new vices spring up, new forms of human activity manifest themselves, any or all of which, for their advancement or suppression, may become the proper objects of an eleemosynary trust."

In the case of People v. Dashaway Ass'n, 84 Cal. 114, 24 P. 277, 12 L. R. A. 117, it was said by this court that:

> "The enforcement of charitable uses cannot be limited to any narrow and stated formula. As has been well said, it must expand with the advancement of civilization and the daily increasing needs of men. New discoveries in science, new fields and opportunities for human action, the differing condition, character, and wants of communities and nations, change and enlarge the scope of charity, and where new necessities are created new charitable uses must be established. The underlying principle is the same; its application is as varying as the wants of humanity."

With the foregoing broad interpretation of the term "charitable uses" in mind, let us turn to the declared purposes embraced in the trust to be considered in the instant case. These have above been stated at length, but have been more briefly summarized by the respondent herein (and which summary the appellant herein admits in the main to be correct) to be as follows:

> "I. Promoting and assisting in promoting improvements in the structure and methods of government in the United States.
> "II. Improving living and working conditions for the working people.
> "III. Improving the economic conditions of the country.
> "IV. Assisting co-operation between employer and employee.
> "V. Assisting education.
> "VI. Aiding the practicable application of the science of Eugenics.
> "VII. Strengthening prohibitive legislation affecting intoxicants and narcotics.
> "VIII. Promoting justice for the American Indians.
> "IX. Preserving the right of free speech and assembly."

The appellant herein does not seriously contend that the foregoing résumé of the purposes for which the present trust is sought to be created does not bring it generally within the scope of "charitable uses" as defined in the foregoing decisions of this court. This being so, it is unnecessary to make more than a passing reference to such cases as Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen (96 Mass.) 539, upon which the appellant herein mainly relies, and which was decided in 1867, interpreting a trust attempted to be created by will in 1861, and which had for its purposes the creation of "a public sentiment that will put an end to human slavery in this country" and also "to secure the passage of laws granting women * * * the right to vote, to hold office, to hold, manage and devise property and all other civil rights enjoyed by men." As to the first of these declared purposes the Massachusetts Supreme Court held the trust to be valid, but as to the second invalid. The passing of the epoch in which this decision was written has caused its language to have little relation to social problems and its conclusions touching the political and other rights of women to be widely dissented from in later decisions from other jurisdictions. The trend of modern authority has been toward the upholding of trusts which have for their object the creation of a more enlightened public opinion, with a consequent change in laws having to do with human relations and rights in a republic such as ours; and hence it is that bequests of money to trustees for the attainment of woman's suffrage and other rights in the United States have been upheld. Garrison v. Little, 75 Ill. App. 402. Trusts for the promotion of prohibition have been sustained. Haines v. Allen, 78 Ind. 100, 41 Am. Rep. 555. Trusts for the distribution of Henry George's "Progress and Poverty" and "Problems of the Times" have been approved. George v. Braddock, 45 N. J. Eq. 757, 18 A. 881, 6 L. R. A. 511, 14 Am. St. Rep. 754. The most recent decision dealing generally with the matter of promoting improvement in the structure and methods of government is to be found in the case of Taylor v. Hoag, 273 Pa. 194, 116 A. 826, 21 A. L. R. 946, wherein the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania upheld a trust whereby the net income of the sum of $150,000 was to be devoted "to promote improvements in the structure and methods of government, with a special reference to the initiative, referendum, and recall; proportional representation; preferential voting; ballot reform; the simplification of municipal, state and national government and the revision and remaking of city charters, state Constitutions, and our national Constitution with a view to promote efficiency and popular control of government." Following a review of the foregoing cases the court says:

> "We are led to conclude that a trust for a public charity is not invalid merely because it contemplates the procuring of such changes in existing laws as the donor deems beneficial to the people in general or to a class for whose benefit the trust is created. To hold that a change in a law is in effect an attempt to violate that law would discourage improvement in legislation and tend to compel us to continue indefinitely to live under laws designed for an entirely different state of society. Such view is opposed to every principle of our government based on the theory that it is a government 'of the people, by the people and for the people', and fails to recognize the right of those who make the laws to change them at their pleasure when circumstances seem to require. With the wisdom of the proposed change the courts are not concerned."

The reasoning of the foregoing decision, while it is referable more especially to proposed reforms in legislation, is equally applicable to such social and economic changes as would in the opinion of the donors tend to bring about a more harmonious relationship between employers and employees, or ameliorate conditions among the so-called "working classes," or achieve a more equitable distribution of the fruits of production, or improve the status and condition of any particular race or class of our citizenship or population. The ideas of the creators of the trust along these several lines may be altruistic to the point of seeming to be impractical or even foolish, but it does not follow that the trust would for that reason, if otherwise unobjectionable from the viewpoint of ethics or morals, be invalid. As it is tersely but truly said in Zollman on Charities, at page 149, "a charitable gift may be both absurd and valid." It is our conclusion from an examination of the foregoing summary of the purposes which the creators of this trust had in mind in its formation that there is nothing in any of them which contravenes either public policy or public morals, and that in so far as the purposes themselves are concerned we can find no reason for holding all or any of them to be invalid.

[3-5] The main attack which the appellant makes upon this trust is not so much upon the expressed purposes of its creation, taken as a whole, as it is upon certain of the details thereof with respect to which he urges that these are too indefinite to be given effect. This charge of indefiniteness which the appellant makes against certain of the provisions of this trust is twofold. It is directed, first, against the beneficiaries of the trust, and, second, against the powers and functions of the trustees who are to seek to carry its provisions into effect. As to the first of these, it may be stated generally that the element of indefiniteness in the beneficiaries of a charitable trust is not only not an objection to its validity, but, as a rule, is of the essence of all charitable trusts of a public or quasi public character. This principle was well established by this court in the case of Fay v. Howe, 136 Cal. 599–601, 69 P. 423. The trust in that case was in the nature of a bequest of the sum of $5,000, "the income to be used in aid of deserving aged native born in the town of Southboro, Mass., needing such aid." This trust was objected to as being void for uncertainty, and this court in dealing with that objection said:

> "In the case of a private trust there must be certainty as to the beneficiaries, but in charitable trusts individuals are not named, for the reason that, if named, the gift becomes a donation to individuals, and, losing the character of indefiniteness as to persons—which is the essence of a charitable trust—it is no longer a charitable trust. Inherent in every charitable trust is the very characteristic against which appellant's argument points—namely, indefiniteness of beneficiaries."

The appellant points a particular objection at the language of section II of paragraph 6 of the trust instrument because of the use therein of the terms "working people" as being a phrase which is meaningless as defining any particular class of people, but it is evident that this is a hypercritical objection, since not only have such phrases as "the working classes" attained a very definite signification in our modern life, but the very context of the trust instrument in which it occurs illuminates its meaning and application by defining with much detail the particular functions which the trustees are to perform in the way of improving "living conditions of the working people." They are to "investigate the causes of poverty," with a view to "preventing the operation of such causes." They are to investigate and encourage the introduction of "the co-operative system of selling and purchasing food * * * generally known as the 'Rochdale system of co-operation.'" The section in the trust instrument immediately following the one under criticism (section III) pursues the subject further with an amount of detail too long to quote, but rendering perfectly clear the meaning of the term "working people" which the donors intended should be the beneficiaries of the activities of the trustees in carrying into effect this clause. The appellant urges the charge of indefiniteness against two other particular clauses in said trust instrument, viz., section IV of paragraph VI and section VIII of paragraph VI thereof. The first of these empowers the trustees "to induce, encourage, and support industrial co-operation to the end that justice may be done to employer and employee alike, and harmony be established and maintained between them, and industrial hatred and strife abolished, thereby benefiting mankind in general." By the second of these clauses the trustees are empowered "to promote justice for the American Indian in the United States by assisting in procuring legislation, and/or by stimulating the proper enforcement of legislation to that end and/or by assisting individual or bodies of Indians in attaining that justice." The emphasis with which the appellant urges his objection to each and both of these clauses is laid upon the word "justice," which, he argues, is entirely too indefinite as to its meaning to support these particular trusts. As to the first of these clauses thus objected to, it would seem to be manifest that the way in which "justice" between employer and employee is to be attained is by the principle and practice of industrial co-operation; and thus the meaning of the term "justice" as used by the creators of this trust is indicated and might be very well and truly expressed in the definition which Justinian has given us of that word, viz., "The constant and perpetual disposition to render every man his due." As thus defined there is no uncertainty in the purpose of the creators of this trust as expressed in clause VI of paragraph VI of this document. Whether that purpose can be achieved by the means which the trustees are empowered to promote is a matter with which the courts, in the first instance at least, have nothing to do, but which, at the last analysis, they might have power to direct under the exercise of their equity jurisdiction in the control over trusts. As to the objection which the appellant urges against clause VIII of paragraph VI of said trust instrument, it must be conceded that a greater state of indefiniteness exists. The trustees are empowered "to promote justice for the American Indian." This they are to do "by assisting in procuring legislation and/or by stimulating the proper enforcement of legislation to that end." The meaning assigned to the word "justice" as above defined clarifies somewhat the purpose which the creators of this particular trust had in view, since it may not be denied that there was a large measure of injustice meted out to the Indian in the earlier history of our republic, and it might also be conceded for the sake of argument that there still remains a large degree of inefficiency in the administration of legislation aimed at the correction of that ancient wrong through the lifting of the American Indian up to the level and stature of those equal rights and duties pertaining to American citizenship. That the correctness of these assumptions may be disputable would not render the effort of the creators of this trust abortive, nor would the fact that the powers of the trustees in attainment of the end they had in view are not more exactly defined necessarily render the trust itself invalid. As we have seen, courts of equity possess enlarged powers in giving effect to trusts for charitable uses. In the exercise of these powers this court has declared in a leading case that:

> "Courts look with favor upon all attempted charitable donations and will endeavor to carry them into effect if it can be done consistently with the rules of law. A bequest intended as a charity is not void, and there is no authority to construe it to be legally void if it can possibly be made good." Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 457; Estate of Willey, 128 Cal. 1, 60 P. 471; Estate of Merchant, 143 Cal. 537, 77 P. 475.

[6, 7] In Estate of Hinckley, supra, from which the foregoing excerpt is taken, the court learnedly and exhaustively discussed the power of the courts of this state to assume equitable jurisdiction over the administration of trusts clearly charitable in their nature, and in so doing to apply the doctrine of cy-pres as a judicial power in directing trustees to carry into effect a general lawful and charitable intent on the part of the creators of the trust when such intent is manifest when the trustees are named and when the beneficiaries of the trust are ascertainable. The final sentence in the foregoing clause aids somewhat in determining its validity, since it is therein provided that the trustees are to be empowered to extend aid to particular Indians or groups of Indians in attaining those ends which the term "justice" as above defined connotes. We are therefore of the opinion that this particular clause in the trust instrument ought not in the first instance to be held invalid. We are thus brought to the second objection which the appellant urges against the validity of this attempted trust foundation treated as a whole, which is that the powers and functions with which the trustees thereof are invested are too indefinite to justify the court in upholding it and by so doing in creating in them a perpetuity with practically unlimited powers. When, however, we take this lengthy and evidently carefully prepared document by the four corners and read it as a whole, we find that the statement of the appellant in urging this particular objection must be taken with much modification. In the first place, it is evident from the reading of this document as a whole that the methods of exercise of the powers and functions with which its trustees are to be invested are in the main educational. The manifest object of the creators of this trust was that of the formation and direction of an enlightened public opinion with relation to the particular subjects to which in its detail it is related, and as the result of that educated and enlightened opinion to bring about the adoption of concrete legislation or the acceptance of certain clearly stated social or economic reforms. The instrument is not lacking in certain definite directions to the trustees along these identical lines. The trustees are to conduct investigations as to the causes and prevention of poverty among working people and are also to investigate and encourage the adoption of a co-operative system of marketing; and generally to encourage and support industrial co-operation as between employers and employees. They are to afford educational opportunities for the study of governmental, industrial, and social problems and reforms, and they are to accomplish these objects by employing lecturers and instructors and by furnishing appropriate books and literature and by donations to institutions and organizations to be applied in the furtherance of the foregoing purposes. They are to buy, print, publish, and distribute pamphlets, newspapers, magazines, and books "and to disseminate by all lawful means such information as in the judgment of the trustees may be useful in carrying out the purposes of this trust."

The foregoing will sufficiently indicate the scope of the general powers with which the trustees of this foundation are by its specific terms invested. That the means which these trustees are to thus employ in the furtherance of its purposes are to be "lawful means" is expressly stated in the document itself, and by such expression the creators of the trust have relieved its trustees of the imputation of the appellant that this was a so-called "lobbying trust" to bring about legislation of various kinds by disreputable and unlawful methods. In a word, we find nothing in this trust which conveys the remotest suggestion that the trustees thereof are to employ or that they would be justified in employing other than the usual upright, open, and approved methods by which foundations charitable in character and educational in method are wont to carry on their work. The present trust differs in no essential respect from numerous other like foundations in various parts of the country which are devoted to the achievement of some, though not, perhaps, of all, of the objects of this particular foundation, and which have been generally aproved by the courts. The creators of this trust having, as recited therein, devoted a large part of their lives and a considerable portion of their fortune unselfishly to the promotion of the particular ideas of political and social reform which they are now seeking to have perpetuated beyond the period of their natural lives through this foundation, are to be commended rather than criticized for their desire to render permanent their life work. This method of achieving immortality is all too rare, and while we may not all agree upon the question as to whether or not certain details of these projected reforms in our political or social life are practical or even altogether desirable, we may not for that reason hold this foundation to be invalid by virtue of the defects in its creation which are urged by the appellant herein.

SCHWAN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR ORANGE COUNTY et al.

Supreme Court of California. April 14, 1928.

1. Executors and administrators ⟹151—Guardian and ward ⟹45—Abortive attempt to amend one section of statute relative to execution of trust deed by executors, administrators, and guardians does not preclude execution under other section sufficient to authorize exercise of such power without amended section (Code Civ. Proc. § 1577, and § 1578, as amended by St. 1927, p. 831).

The abortive attempt by the Legislature at its 1927 session to amênd Code Civ. Proc. § 1577, does not preclude the execution of trust deeds by executors, administrators, and guardians, because of the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1578, as amended by St. 1927, p. 831, which contains the essentials to make it sufficient, without section 1577, to authorize such execution.

2. Executors and administrators ⟹151—Guardian and ward ⟹45—Section relative to execution of trust deeds by executors, administrators, and guardians confers on such persons right to execute trust deeds (Code Civ. Proc. § 1578, as amended by St. 1927, p. 831).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1578, as amended by St. 1927, p. 831, is sufficiently broad in itself to confer a substantive right authorizing the execution of trust deeds by executors, administrators, and guardians.

3. Statutes ⟹181(2)—That construction of statute renders another statute redundant does not affect such construction.

That construction of a statute renders another statute redundant does not affect such construction.

4. Executors and administrators ⟹151—Statute permitting execution of trust deeds by executors and administrators held applicable, though decedent died prior to passage of amendment (Code Civ. Proc. § 1578, as amended by St. 1927, p. 831).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1578, as amended by St. 1927, p. 831, providing for the execution of trust deeds by executors, administrators, and guardians, held applicable to an estate, though decedent died prior to passage of the amendment.

In Bank.

Application by Lucy C. Schwan, as executrix of the estate of Susie M. Whitman, deceased, for writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Orange and James L. Allen, as Judge thereof, to require said judge to hear and determine petitioner's application for an order authorizing execution of a deed of trust. Writ granted.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, Louis W. Myers, and Pierce Works, all of Los Angeles, and Albert Launer and Harold A. McCabe, both of Fullerton, for petitioner.

Scarborough, Forgy & Reinhaus, of Santa Ana, for respondents.

Henry E. Monroe, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ for California Pacific Title & Trust Co.

WASTE, C. J. Petitioner herein seeks by writ of mandate to compel the respondents superior court and the judge thereof to hear and determine an application filed by her as executrix of the estate of the above-named decedent, for an order authorizing the execution of a deed of trust, which is to serve as security for a promissory note sought to be executed to pay off and discharge a certain note, and mortgage securing the same, already existing and constituting an incumbrance upon the real property of the estate. Application for the order was made under the provisions of section 1578 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 831), which prescribe, among other things, the proceedings to be taken by an executor, administrator, or guardian applying for an order authorizing the execution of a deed of trust upon any property of the estate of which he is in charge. Notice of the hearing of the application was duly given, but the respondent judge of the court below refused to hear the matter upon the ground that the court was without jurisdiction to make the order prayed for.

Prior to the amendment of section 1578, supra, it was already provided in section 1577 of the Code that, whenever in any estate in course of administration, or in any guardianship proceeding pending, it shall appear to the superior court, or to a judge thereof, to be of advantage to raise money upon a note or notes to be secured by a mortgage of the real property of the decedent, or of the minor, that may be done on obtaining an order in due course therefor. The procedural steps necessary to be taken were to be found in section 1578. At the 1927 session of the Legislature two companion bills were introduced, one of which provided for the amendment of section 1577 by incorporating therein an express grant to executors, administrators, and guardians of the additional power to execute trust deeds upon property in their charge. The second bill provided for such an amendment to section 1578 as would cause its procedural provisions to conform to the proposed amendment of section 1577, by adding thereto express references to deeds of trust. Each of these bills passed the two houses of the Legislature, but only one of them, that amending the procedural section, 1578, was signed by the Governor. Respondents therefore urge that, while it was obviously the intent of the Legislature in passing both bills to grant to executors, administrators, and guardians the power to execute trust deeds, and to prescribe the precedure therefor, inasmuch as the bill purporting to amend the substantive provisions of section 1577 was not signed by the Governor, and therefore failed to become law, the power to execute trust deeds was not granted.

> "If, after full hearing the court or judge is satisfied that it will be for the advantage of the estate to mortgage or execute a deed of trust of the whole or any portion of the real estate, an order must be made authorizing, empowering and directing the executor or administrator, or the guardian of such minor or incompetent person, to make such mortgage or to execute such deed of trust, and a promissory note or notes to the lender for the amount of the loan, to be secured by such mortgage or deed of trust.
> "After making the order to mortgage, or execute the deed of trust, the executor, administrator, or guardian of a minor or incompetent person shall execute and deliver the note or notes for the amount and period specified in the order, and shall execute, acknowledge and deliver a mortgage, or deed of trust, of the premises, setting forth in the mortgage, or deed of trust, that it is made by the authority of the order, and giving the date of such order. * * *
> "Every note or notes and mortgage, or deed of trust, so made shall be effectual to mortgage or convey by means of a deed of trust, all right, title, interest and estate which the decedent, minor, or incompetent person had in the premises described therein at the time of the death of such decedent, or at the time of the appointment of the guardian of such minor or of such incompetent person, or prior thereto, and any right, title or interest in said premises acquired by the estate of such decedent, minor, or incompetent person, by operation of law or otherwise, since the time of the death of such decedent, or the appointment of the guardian of such minor or incompetent person.
> "Jurisdiction of the court to administer the estate of such decedent, minor, or incompetent person shall be effectual to vest such court or judge with jurisdiction to make the order for the note or notes, and mortgage, or deed of trust, and such jurisdiction shall conclusively inure to the benefit of the mortgagee named in the mortgage, or the trustee and beneficiary in the deed of trust, his or their heirs and assigns."

[2, 3] This language of the section is sufficiently broad to confer the substantive right authorizing the execution of trust deeds by executors, administrators, and guardians. To reply that such a construction of section 1578 renders section 1577 redundant does not suggest a different conclusion, for it may be safely said that such a condition probably exists as to many of our laws.

[4] The testatrix in the present case died in 1924, and the question is raised whether or not the amended statute (1927) applies to an estate in a case where the decedent died prior to the passage of the act. We are of the view that it does, for the reason that the purposes for which a deed of trust may now be authorized by the court are the same as those for which the power previously existed to permit the due execution of a mortgage. The statute has not been changed in that respect. The Legislature has not imposed any greater burden upon the property of the decedent than that which existed at the time of her death. It has merely enacted a remedial statute prescribing a different mode of procedure for raising money for the needs of the estate, to carry out such objects as were provided for by the law in force at the time of the decedent's death. Murphy v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, 131 Cal. 115, 63 P. 368, 731; Estate of Benvenuto, 183 Cal. 382, 191 P. 678.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue directing the respondents to entertain, hear, and determine the application of the petitioner below for permission to execute a deed of trust upon the property of the estate.

WINSKY v. DE MANDEL et al.

Supreme Court of California. April 21, 1928.

1. Automobiles ⚷9—Ordinance forbidding parking vehicles at intersections to obstruct pedestrian travel held valid (Ordinance of City and County of San Francisco 1857, § 19; California Vehicle Act, §§ 130, 131).

Ordinance 1857, § 19, of City and County of San Francisco, forbidding any person to park vehicle at intersection so as to obstruct passage of pedestrian at crossings, held valid as not conflicting with California Vehicle Act, §§ 130, 131 (St. 1923, pp. 558, 560), such sections not relating to matter of leaving vehicles standing at street intersections; hence ordinance was properly admitted in action for damages for death proximately resulting from violation of such ordinance.

2. Automobiles ⚷173(2)—Truck driver and employer held negligent in violating ordinance requiring parking of vehicle to not obstruct pedestrian travel (Ordinance of City and County of San Francisco 1857, § 19).

Truck driver parking truck at intersection so as to obstruct pedestrian travel, in violation of Ordinance 1857, § 19, of City and County of San Francisco, and his employer, held guilty of negligence as respected death of child at intersection proximately resulting from parking vehicle in violation of ordinance.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by James N. Winsky against Edward H. De Mandel, the North Star Laundry Company, and one Williams. Judgment for plaintiff against defendants last named, and such last-named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin and E. L. Chloupek, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Leo A. Cunningham, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff commenced this action for damages for the death of his minor daughter of the age of 8 years, who was killed at the intersection of Guerrero and Seventeenth streets in the city of San Francisco by being struck by an automobile driven by the defendant De Mandel, while in the act of crossing the street at said intersection, and in so doing in going around a laundry truck owned by the North Star Laundry Company and being operated by Williams, one of its employees, and which truck had been by said Williams left standing upon such intersection in an angular position and directly in the path of pedestrian travel. Upon the trial of the cause before the court, sitting with a jury, the verdict of the latter absolved the defendant De Mandel from liability, but otherwise found in favor of plaintiff against the defendant North Star Laundry Company and also against its employee Williams, fixing the plaintiff's damage at $2,500. The last-named defendants appeal from the judgment entered upon such verdict.

[1, 2] Practically the only question of law presented upon this appeal relates to the validity of an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco, numbered section 19 of Ordinance 1857 thereof, which makes it unlawful for any person to leave standing any automobile or other vehicle in such position at any intersection of the streets thereof so as to obstruct the passage of pedestrians at the crossings thereon. The trial court, over the objection of the appellants, permitted the introduction of this ordinance in evidence, and instructed the jury that if they found that the defendant Williams had so left standing the laundry truck, which he was engaged in driving for his codefendant the North Star Laundry Company, as not to keep the passage of pedestrians clear, they should find him and consequently his employer guilty of negligence. Appellants urge that the trial court was in error in the admission of said ordinance in evidence and in giving such instruction, for the reason that the ordinance is in conflict with sections 130 and 131 of the California Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, pp. 517, 558, 560). A reference to these sections will, however, disclose that they do not relate to the matter of leaving vehicles standing at street intersections so as to interfere with the passage of pedestrians upon the regularly provided crossings for the use of pedestrians thereon. This being so, there is no conflict between the state law regulating the approach by vehicles to such intersections and the manner and way of turning vehicles thereon and the ordinance of the municipality in question, which relates solely to the interference with pedestrian travel which would result from the stopping or leaving standing of motor or other vehicles upon the crossing at street corners. The jury in the instant case found upon sufficient, though somewhat conflicting, evidence that the defendant Williams had left his employer's laundry truck standing upon the crossing at the intersection of said streets provided for the use of pedestrians, and that the plain-tiff's daughter, a child of the age of 8 years, and hence not ordinarily chargeable with contributory negligence, while attempting to go around said laundry truck in order to negotiate said crossing, was struck by the car driven by De Mandel, who was himself without negligence; that it was the negligent act of Williams in violation of the terms of said ordinance which was the proximate cause of the death of said child. We find no error in the admission of said ordinance in evidence or in the giving of the instruction complained of. With relation to the other instructions of the court as to which the appellants offer some criticism, we find that the instructions, when read as a whole, fully and fairly presented the law applicable to the case.

MURPHY et al. v. LACEY et al.★
(S. F. 12127.)

Supreme Court of California. April 21, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank May 21, 1928.

1. Reformation of instruments ⚿37—Cross-complaint, seeking reformation of contract sued on to conform to true intent and purpose, held properly allowed (Civ. Code, § 3399).

In action for recovery of money alleged to be due under terms of contract for sale of real estate, court properly permitted defendants to file cross-complaint under Civ. Code, § 3399, setting forth intent, understanding, and true agreements, and praying that contract be revised and reformed to conform thereto.

2. Reformation of instruments ⚿44—Evidence to explain meaning of terms of agreement held properly allowed after allowance of cross-complaint seeking reformation of agreement (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1856, 1860; Civ. Code, § 3399).

In action by purchasers under contract for sale of real estate for recovery of deposit made by prospective purchaser, which plaintiffs claim under agreement that they were to succeed to and receive all benefits of seller under contract with such other purchaser, court did not err in admitting evidence under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1856, 1860, explaining meaning of such agreement, after allowing cross-complaint under Civ. Code, § 3399, seeking reformation of agreement to conform to alleged true meaning of contract.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Leland S. Murphy and another against E. V. Lacey and another for money had and received. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Charles W. Byrnes and Robert L. McWilliams, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. Plaintiffs, as the assignees of one L. J. Brown, brought an action against E. V. Lacey and Veronica E. Lacey on two counts for the recovery of the sum of $2,000. The first count stated a case for money had and received growing out of the same statement of facts specifically pleaded in the second count. Said facts are substantially as follows: On June 5, 1924, defendants E. V. Lacey and Veronica E. Lacey entered into a contract whereby said defendants agreed to sell to plaintiffs' assignor, L. J. Brown, and he agreed to purchase from them at the agreed purchase price of $150,000, certain real property situate in the city and county of San Francisco. Said contract further provided that said sale was subject to a prior subsisting agreement of sale of said real property entered into by defendant Lacey as seller and one T. J. Neilan and others as purchasers. The parties to said contract referred to said agreement of sale existing between Lacey and Neilan and others at the agreed price of $160,000 net to Lacey and concluded this subject of the agreement in the following language:

> "All right, title and interest in said agreement of sale with T. J. Neilan et al., being hereby sold, assigned and transferred to L. J. Brown for a consideration of one ($1.00) dollar, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged and included in the sale price of this property for the said sum of one hundred fifty thousand ($150,000.00) dollars net; it being understood that the purchaser under this contract succeeds to and receives all benefits on the seller's part under the Neilan contract."

Concurrently upon the execution of the Neilan agreement to purchase, he deposited the sum of $1,000 with said Lacey as a part payment on account of said contract, and the same thereafter became forfeited by reason of the failure of said Neilan and others to perform the terms of their contract. Said $1,000 was in the hands of Lacey some time before the contract was made by him with plaintiffs' assignor. It is for the recovery of this deposit sum, which plaintiffs were led into the error of believing to be $2,000, that the action was commenced in the lower court.

[1] It is the claim of plaintiffs that by the plain terms of the portion of the contract above quoted they are entitled to everything received by Lacey from Neilan. By their answer defendants allege that said quoted portion of the contract did not express the true intent, purpose, or agreement of the parties thereto, and that the understanding and agreement intended to be made was that, in the event Neilan consummated his agreement to purchase said real property for said agreed price of $160,000, which was regarded as uncertain by the parties of the transaction, plaintiffs' assignor was to profit to the extent of the difference between that sum and the price he agreed to pay, to wit, $150,000, less the $1,000 theretofore paid to said Lacey, and, in the event of a forfeiture of Neilan's option, Brown was to pay Lacey $150,000 net for said real property. By cross-complaint defendants set forth in detail the intent, understanding, and true agreements of the plaintiffs' assignor and Lacey, and prayed that the said contract be revised and reformed to conform thereto. Civ. Code, § 3399. The trial court properly permitted the cross-complaint to stand.

While there was a conflict in some respects in the evidence as to the intent of the parties to said contract, it was not such a conflict as would preclude the court from finding that the transaction was intended to be in harmony with the version given by the defense. In fact, the contention of the defendants as to the understanding of Lacey with respect to the agreement, which was intended to be reduced to writing and which was prepared by his adversary, examined in the light of the circumstances of the transaction, comports far better with the rule of rationality that a person in the transaction of business takes ordinary care of his own concerns and does not wittingly enter into an obviously unwise or foolish agreement than would the contrary contention made by appellants.

[2] We are not prepared to say that it was error for the trial court, even in the absence of a pleading for the revision of the contract, to have admitted evidence under sections 1856, 1860, Code of Civil Procedure, to explain what was meant by the term, "it being understood that the purchaser under this contract succeeds to and receives all benefits on the seller's part under the Neilan contract," which was rendered more or less uncertain by the fact that respondent Lacey, long prior to entering into a second contract of sale of said real property for the sum of $150,000 had received $1,000 in cash from Neilan on account of a contract upon which there remained an unpaid balance of $159,000. Whether the benefits referred to were to reach backward and include the $1,000, or whether appellants were buying all the enforceable rights and benefits then and thereafter to accrue under the Neilan contract, are matters of uncertainty examined in the light of facts and circumstances of the transactions. However this may be, the trial court was fully warranted by section 3399, Civil Code, in its ruling allowing the cross-complaint which sought relief by way of revision of said instrument to conform with the understanding of respondents and what the court found to be the understanding of appellants' assignor.

Aside from what has already been said, there is another circumstance which doubtless weakened appellants' contention of the understanding of the parties to the Brown contract. Appellants went through with the contract made with Lacey on the theory that he was to receive $150,000 net for his property from appellants. Deeds were passed, and some time elapsed before claim was laid to the $1,000 paid to Lacey under the Neilan agreement. The delay in demanding said $1,000 paid to Lacey under the Brown contract seems to have been suggested by afterthought.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEIN. (Cr. 3052.)

Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1928.

1. Criminal law ⟾780(2)—Refusal to instruct on corroboration of accomplice held proper, where witness testified only as to purchasing whisky from defendant and loading it on witness' automobile (Pen. Code, § 1111).

Where prosecuting witness, in trial for possessing intoxicating liquor, testified that he purchased whisky from defendant, helped latter carry some of it from cotton patch near defendant's shack, emptied it into other containers, and, with additional quantity produced by defendant, loaded them on his automobile, court did not err in refusing to instruct jury as to corroboration of accomplice's testimony under Pen. Code, § 1111; purchaser's possession of liquor after consummation of sale not being possession of seller.

2. Criminal law ⟾741(1), 742(1)—Witnesses' credibility and weight of testimony are exclusively for jury.

The credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony are matters exclusively for the jury to determine.

3. Criminal law ⟾1159(4)—Judgment on conviction of possessing intoxicating liquor cannot be disturbed for insufficiency of confessed bootlegger's and perjurer's testimony, where evidence was sharply conflicting.

Where evidence was sharply conflicting, judgment on conviction of possessing intoxicating liquor cannot be disturbed on ground of insufficiency of evidence in that prosecuting witness was a confessed bootlegger and admitted testifying falsely at preliminary hearing to avoid incriminating himself.

4. Criminal law ⟾991(2)—Judgment directing imprisonment for over 90 days on conviction of possessing intoxicating liquor is void to such extent (National Prohibition Act tit. 2, § 29 [27 USCA § 46]; Pen. Code, § 1205).

Under National Prohibition Act tit. 2, § 29 (27 USCA § 46), and Pen. Code, § 1205, judgment of $1,000 fine or confinement in county jail one day for every $2 of fine, not exceeding six months, on conviction of possessing intoxicating liquor, is void to extent that it directs imprisonment beyond period of 90 days.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Wm. H. Ellis, Judge.

H. N. Lein was convicted of possessing intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Modified, and affirmed as modified.

Superseding opinion, 260 P. 363.

Fred L. Hamblin, and Kelley & Hews, all of Riverside, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, and Albert Ford, Dist. Atty., of Riverside, for the People.

SHENK, J. In the county of Riverside the defendant was charged by information with having intoxicating liquor unlawfully in his possession. He pleaded guilty to conviction of a similar prior offense, and pleaded not guilty to the offense charged in the information. On the trial the jury returned a verdict of guilty as charged. The trial court pronounced judgment that defendant pay a fine of $1,000 or be confined in the county jail one day for each $2 of the fine, the total period of confinement not to exceed six months. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

[1] The defendant's first contention is that the prosecuting witness Trivet was an accomplice; that the corroborating evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant under the provisions of section 1111 of the Penal Code; and that the trial court should have given an instruction covering the provisions of that section of the Code. For the purposes of this opinion it is necessary to state only that said witness testified that he purchased 50 gallons of whisky from the defendant; that he helped the defendant carry some of the liquor from a cotton patch near the defendant's shack and emptied it from its containers into certain other containers, and, together with an additional quantity which defendant produced from "somewhere outside," loaded the containers on his automobile. Just prior to driving away he and the defendant became engaged in a quarrel, as a result of which he shot at and wounded the defendant. There is no evidence in the record that Trivet aided or abetted defendant in obtaining possession of the liquor. If Trivet's testimony be believed, and we must assume that the jury believed it, the transaction was a purchase and sale of liquor which was already in the defendant's possession. In legal contemplation Trivet's possession commenced when the sale was consummated and he drove off with it. The later possession of the purchaser is not the possession of the seller. There is not in such cases an identity, but merely a similarity of offenses. The possession of each was separate and distinct. People v. Galli, 68 Cal. App. 682, 230 P. 20. The trial court did not, therefore, commit error in refusing to instruct the jury as requested.

[2, 3] The defendant further contends that, as Trivet was a confessed bootlegger and admitted that he had testified falsely at the preliminary hearing because he did not want to incriminate himself on a charge then pending but since dismissed, there is no substantial testimony in the record to sustain the verdict. There was evidence on behalf of the defendant to the effect that Trivet stopped his automobile at defendant's place and tried to hold him up for money; that the defendant called for his gun, which his son brought to him; and that Trivet shot and wounded the defendant as a result of the episode which the defendant relates. The record presents a sharp conflict in the evidence. The credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony were, of course, matters exclusively for the jury to determine. In this state of the record the judgment cannot be disturbed on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence.

[4] However, the judgment in its entirety cannot stand in view of the provisions of section 29 of title 2 of the National Prohibition Act (Fed. Stats. Ann. 1919 Supp. p. 215 [27 USCA § 46]), providing for a maximum jail sentence of 90 days for the second offense, and the provisions of section 1205 of the Penal Code, which are that:

> "* * * The judgment must specify the extent of the imprisonment, which must not exceed one day for every two dollars of the fine, nor extend in any case beyond the term for which the defendant might be sentenced to imprisonment for the offense of which he has been convicted."

The judgment is therefore void to the extent that it directs imprisonment beyond the period of 90 days. People v. Cencevich, 64 Cal. App. 39, 220 P. 448.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the following: "* * * And that he will not be confined in the county jail under any circumstances for more than a period of six months." And in lieu thereof the following is ordered inserted: "Provided, however, that the duration of such imprisonment for default in the payment of said fine shall not exceed 90 days." As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by Alice A. Salles against Albert S. Loane and another, executor and executrix of the last will of Abraham Loane, deceased, upon a rejected claim against the estate of Abraham Loane, deceased. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Aitken & Aitken and Marion Vecki, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harry F. Sullivan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal from judgment in favor of defendants, sustaining their rejection of claim presented by plaintiff against the estate of Abraham Loane, deceased.

The facts as found by the court follow: Upon the death of one John Loane, there was distributed to Abraham Loane, for the full term of his natural life, with remainder to his two daughters, Alice A. Salles and Mabelle Donahue, share and share alike, certain real property occupied by a lessee, who had the privilege, under an option clause in the lease, of purchasing said property within a specified time for the sum of $15,000. The lessee duly exercised said option, and received a deed to the property from Abraham Loane as life tenant and from his said daughters as remaindermen, paying these parties the sum of $15,000 therefor.

Said three parties thereupon agreed to and did expend $1,000 of said sum for the adornment of a family cemetery plot; $2,000 thereof was given to Alice A. Salles, and $2,000 to Mabelle E. Donahue. This left a balance of $10,000, which they deposited in joint and survivorship savings accounts in two banks under written agreement executed by all three of them, "by virtue of which it was understood and agreed by said three parties and the respective banks in which said moneys were so deposited, that the moneys therein deposited might be withdrawn upon the written order of either of the three persons whose names were signed to the contract, and without reference to the original ownership of the moneys deposited."

Pursuant to this agreement, and to their further mutual understanding that said sum of $10,000 and interest thereon should be drawn upon by said Abraham Loane during his lifetime for his maintenance and support, and that upon his death the balance thereof should belong, share and share alike, to his said daughters, Abraham Loane withdrew from time to time during the remaining six years or so of his life from said savings accounts various sums, which he used for his support, all withdrawals being so made by him with the consent and knowledge of his said daughters and pursuant to the agreement above set forth. Upon his death the total sum remaining on deposit was $2,559.04, one-half of which, or $1,279.52, was paid to Alice A. Salles and the other half to said Mabelle E. Donahue.

Thereafter the last will and testament of said Abraham Loane was duly admitted to probate, whereupon Alice A. Salles presented to defendants herein, as executor and executrix, her claim against his estate for the difference between half of said $10,000, to wit, $5,000 and the sum of $1,279.52 theretofore received by her as aforesaid, or $3,720.48. Said claim was promptly rejected and this action brought to recover thereon.

Finding that Abraham Loane did not convert to his own use any portion of said sum of $10,000 to which he was not entitled, and that plaintiff had knowledge of the withdrawals made by him, the court concluded that she was entitled only to said sum of $1,279.52 already received by her, wherefore judgment was duly entered in defendants' favor, and plaintiff has appealed.

Appellant's chief attack is directed against the finding that the parties for the purpose of effacing the life estate of Abraham Loane, entered into the agreement as above set forth. In other words, appellant contends that the life estate was not eliminated when said sum of $10,000 was deposited in joint and survivorship bank accounts, but that, when the estate in the real property was changed by sale of the land into an estate in money, the life estate of Abraham Loane therein, with remainder over to his two daughters, continued; hence, as life tenant, he was entitled to use of the earnings of said estate of $10,000 only, but he could not dissipate or spend the principal sum which he held as trustee for the remaindermen.

[1] Even if it were true in this case that upon sale of the property Abraham Loane became the owner of a life estate in the proceeds thereof and a trustee of the principal sum for the benefit of his daughters, nevertheless it was within the power of the parties to, and, under the evidence, they did, change the status of such estate by their said agreement, the effect of which was to terminate the life estate of Abraham Loane, to make partial distribution to the remaindermen, and to bank the balance in the name of all three parties in joint and survivorship savings account for their benefit, subject, however, to withdrawals by the father during his lifetime. The evidence compels the conviction that the agreement between Abraham Loane and the two daughters was as found by the court.

[2] If the effect of the sale and the subsequent action of the parties and their purpose was merely to transmute the life estate in the real property into a life estate in the money received from sale thereof, it is plain that both plaintiff and her sister erred in accepting $2,000 each out of the $15,000 received; neither was it proper in such case to expend $1,000 thereof for a vault. In other words, if it was not the intent and purpose of the parties to efface the life estate, but their intention was to enforce it and to limit the father during his lifetime to use of the earnings of the principal sum, and to hold him liable as trustee for their benefit, then surely he was entitled to have, not only earnings from $10,000, but earnings from the undiminished principal sum of $15,000.

Having consented to a one-third depletion of what she now alleges was an estate held by her father for life and in trust for the benefit of herself and her sister, and having accepted as her own $2,000 thereof, how can plaintiff now take advantage of that fact and urge any claim that her understanding of the situation was other than what her acts and conduct plainly showed it to be—namely, an understanding that they were terminating the life estate, a portion of which was being distributed to and accepted by her as one of the remaindermen, and the rest of which she and her sister were reserving subject to such withdrawals from it as their father might care to make?

Mabelle Donahue, whose testimony is uncontradicted, stated that, before the $15,000 was received, its disposition was fully discussed by all the parties, and the agreement as found by the court was reached. Her position was that she did not care how much of the money her father used, so long as she had enough to buy an automobile. The deposit agreement signed by the parties is set forth in the record. It specifically provides for withdrawals "without reference to the original ownership of the moneys deposited." The evidence, including testimony of witnesses from the banks, shows that the passbooks were in the possession of Abraham Loane at all times, as without them he would have been unable to withdraw money.

The record abundantly supports all of the findings and the judgment. The case of Conneally v. S. F. Savings, etc., Soc., 70 Cal. App. 180, 183, 232 P. 755, and cases cited therein, are in point and support our conclusion.

Judgment affirmed.

WINCHELL v. STRAWBRIDGE et al. ★

Supreme Court of California. April 21, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank May 21, 1928.

1. Action 🔑38(4)—Complaint held to combine three causes of action in one count, and not reconcilable as for conspiracy (Pen. Code, § 563).

Complaint combining three attempted causes of action in one count, predicated on alteration of books of corporation, in violation of Pen. Code, § 563, on institution of suit in justice's court, and on institution of suit, followed by judgment and execution thereon in a different justice's court, held subject to demurrer as being irreconcilable as a cause of action for a civil conspiracy.

2. Pleading 🔑18—Complaint attempting to state cause of action for deceit, fraud, collusion, and conspiracy held demurrable for uncertainty and ambiguity.

Complaint attempting to state cause of action for deceit, fraud, collusion, and conspiracy, stating that plaintiff operated a garage but did not own it, with a later statement for damages because of taking property from garage under execution sued out on judgment, held demurrable for uncertainty and ambiguity.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by O. H. Winchell against O. W. Strawbridge and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

★Hearing denied in bank.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.
Joe Huberty, of San Andreas, and Maurice R. Carey, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for defendants, based upon an order sustaining both general and special demurrers to the amended complaint, plaintiff having declined the opportunity offered by the court to amend his pleading a second time.

The so-called amended complaint is an anomaly, being in reality but a jumble of conclusions. No one word or phrase would properly characterize or serve to define the attempted cause of action. The attorney for appellant himself describes it as follows:

> "This action was brought against a justice of the peace, a corporation, and two lawyers in San Francisco for unlawfully altering the books and records of said corporation, and for deceit, fraud, collusion, and conspiracy to thereby cheat and defraud the plaintiff herein. * * *

Later in his brief he seems to call it an action for malicious prosecution. The pleading would appear to be an effort to state a combination of various causes of action, to wit, a suit for a civil conspiracy, mixed with a suit for malicious prosecution, upon which is superimposed a privately conducted criminal prosecution under section 563 of the Penal Code.

The document has as its prelude a short biographical sketch of each defendant, with a vitriolic recital of the alleged nefarious part he played in the drama. The facts gleaned from this dramatic effort seem to be that plaintiff, C. H. Winchell, during the time in question operated a garage business known as the Winchell Garage in San Andreas, Calaveras county, Cal. He denies that he did more than to "operate" the institution, without defining the word, other than to say that he never at any time owned the same or any interest therein. Defendant Gates Company, a corporation, was doing business presumably at San Francisco, and claimed to have sold goods, wares, and merchandise to plaintiff and to one Annie E. Winchell in the sum of $345.72. The claim of the corporation for said sum was assigned for collection to C. W. Strawbridge, who thereafter reduced it to the jurisdiction of the justice's court, and on the 25th day of February, 1924, sued both C. H. and Annie E. Winchell in the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco for said debt. Service of summons was quashed, and later a suit was brought by the same party against the same defendants in the justice's court of San Andreas township, county of Calaveras, Cal., which latter court was presided over by the defendant C. F. Walter. Why the justice of the peace at San Francisco in whose court the cause was begun was omitted as a defendant cannot be ascertained from the document; however, the attorney for plaintiff in both said actions is made a defendant herein.

The latter cause was instituted on April 19, 1924. On April 26th following, plaintiff here (defendant there) appeared by demurrer, and presumably the other defendant appeared in the same way at the same time. Thereafter, and on July 10th the docket of the justice of peace shows the following entry: "No appearance demurrer overruled, and twenty days given to answer." Thereafter and on July 23d said defendants (plaintiff here and his codefendant, Annie E. Winchell) requested in writing of the justice of the peace that an oral answer be noted in the docket. On October 7th, approximately three months after the overruling of the demurrer, judgment by default was entered in favor of plaintiff and against both defendants for $283.07. Later an execution issued on said judgment and the same was levied upon 100 gallons of oil, 4 oil containers, and other equipment of the garage of the alleged value of $400, and the action of the sheriff was such that he "thereby dismantled the garage and prevented the plaintiff from operating the same for want of proper and sufficient equipment and supplies for a period of five months, and plaintiff thereby lost the use of said garage and all the income thereof for the period aforesaid, and his trade as such garage operator and mechanic was thereby injured and ruined, to his damage in the sum of $5,000." Plaintiff adds the sum of $2,000 to his claim for damages, alleging fraud, oppression, and malice, and ends said alleged amended complaint with a prayer for $7,200 and costs.

The allegations of the pleading contain a healthy sprinkling of such words and phrases as "unlawfully," "fraudulently," "falsely fabricated," "fraudulently forcing the plaintiff," "fraudulently changing the name of the said real debtor," "null and void"; it many times appearing therein that plaintiff "did not owe or incur" the debt, "fraudulently forcing the plaintiff herein to pay the said claim which he neither incurred nor owed," "that said Annie E. Winchell was the sole and only debtor on the books and bills of the said Gates Company," "fraudulently compelling plaintiff to pay the said debt of Annie E. Winchell," etc.

The defendants, other than defendant Walter, demurred to the complaint upon some five major grounds, with more than twenty added special grounds of demurrer, alleging, among other things, the failure to separately state two or more united causes of action, also uncertainty, unintelligibility, and ambiguity, and defendant Walter filed a separate demurrer, adding still further grounds. The court sustained the demurrers and, plaintiff having declined to amend, judgment passed for the defendants.

[1] The recitals given above are amply sufficient to justify the ruling of the court below sustaining these demurrers. Admittedly plaintiff has combined three attempted causes of action in one count, to wit, an attempted cause of action predicated upon alteration of the books of the corporation in violation of section 563 of the Penal Code, one predicated upon the institution of a suit in the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco, and one predicated upon the institution of a suit followed by a judgment and execution thereon in the justice's court of San Andreas township, Calaveras county. The allegations of the pleading cannot be reconciled as the statement of a cause of action for a civil conspiracy, as the acts themselves are not connected in such a way that they could form parts of a single conspiracy.

[2] Moreover, numerous grounds of uncertainty and ambiguity exist in the pleading—for example, the pleader states that he operated the garage, but did not own it or any interest in it; then later he asks for $5,000 damages because of the taking from the garage of $400 worth of property under the execution sued out on said judgment. How he can claim $5,000 as damages for loss of use of and income from property in which he claims no interest certainly presents an issue of ambiguity and uncertainty. Likewise there is no allegation that Annie E. Winchell did not own the equipment; if she did own it, the judgment and execution being also against her, said levy was proper because throughout the pleading plaintiff points to said Annie E. Winchell and declares her to be the person who owed the debt. The relation of Annie E. Winchell to plaintiff is not disclosed, but enough does appear to show that he is willing to hide behind her skirts.

The entire pleading is an absurdity upon its face, and cases of this character should not be allowed to clog the calendars of the courts.

The judgment is affirmed, with $100 as damages to respondents for a frivolous appeal.

ADAMS v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.

Supreme Court of California. April 19, 1928.

1. Master and servant ⚷30(4)—Railroad conductor's act in associating himself with illicit bar and permitting use of his houseboat for prostitution held to warrant dismissal.

Alleged action of railroad conductor in associating himself with illicit bar, where liquor was sold in violation of company's rules, and in permitting houseboat which he owned to be conducted for purpose of prostitution, held such as to warrant railroad in dismissing him for conduct unbecoming conductor.

2. Master and servant ⚷43—Railroad employee held not entitled to have question of dismissal for infraction of rules submitted to jury.

Railroad employee is not entitled to have jury decide whether or not infraction of rules established by railroad warranted dismissal, where reason was from standpoint of employer, acting in good faith, wholly true.

3. Master and servant ⚷32—Conductor could not recover against railroad for maintaining record showing discharge for unbecoming conduct, if record was true.

If former railroad conductor was in fact guilty of conduct unbecoming a conductor he could not recover against railroad for maintaining record showing such circumstance as reason for his discharge.

4. Master and servant ⚷32—Railroad employee admitting ground for dismissal was not entitled to investigation.

In action by former railroad employee for damages resulting from record of discharge, open and fair investigation of complaint against employee, required by rule of railroad company, was not necessary under Civ. Code, § 3532, where employee admitted commission of acts complained of.

5. Judgment ⚷631—Satisfaction of judgment for former conductor in libel suit against person complaining to railroad held bar to recovery against railroad for record showing alleged false reason for discharge.

In action by former railroad employee against railroad for damages for railroad's record of discharge showing discharge was for conduct unbecoming conductor, satisfaction of judgment in libel suit brought by conductor against person making complaint of his conduct to railroad held bar, where prior action adjudicated right of conductor to all damages sustained by reason of inability to secure employment as conductor arising out of statement made on his discharge.

6. Judgment ⚷584—Bar from satisfaction of judgment arises from fact of compensation, not from particular form of action.

Bar arising from satisfaction of judgment proceeds not from any particular form in which action is brought, but arises from fact that party complaining has been compensated for his injury.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Donahue, Judge.

Action by James M. Adams against the Southern Pacific Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Judgment of superior court reversed, and case remanded, with directions.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal adopted by Supreme Court, see 257 P. 551.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Theodore A. Bell, of San Francisco, and E. S. Bell, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this action the respondent's petition for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division One, was granted and the appeal was considered by this court. The case is unique in this jurisdiction, and we have given careful attention to the matters urged by respondent for an affirmance of the judgment of the trial court in favor of the plaintiff, which judgment was reversed by the District Court of Appeal. We have reached the conclusion, however, that the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, heretofore filed herein, meets our views upon each and every matter therein discussed, and we accordingly adopt such opinion as the opinion of this court, as follows:

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of respondent upon the verdict of the jury awarding respondent $5,000 damages in an action in tort growing out of the alleged maintenance by appellants of a record showing an alleged false reason for the discharge of respondent from his position as conductor on a train of appellant corporation. The case is one of first impression in this state; other jurisdictions have adjudicated actions of a somewhat similar although not identical nature.

The facts about which there is no controversy are that respondent, James M. Adams, entered the employ of appellant Southern Pacific Company in 1891, as a brakeman, and through promotion became a conductor, continuing to work without interruption in those capacities until December 31, 1910, at which time he was discharged. It is the custom among railroads throughout the country to issue on demand of an employee leaving the service a statement showing the reason therefor. This statement is variously referred to in the record as a clearance, clearance card, service card, and service letter. The clearance card merely shows the date of entering the service of the employer, the capacities in which service was rendered, the date of leaving the employment, and the reason for the severance of relations between the employer and employee. A typical clearance is such as was used in this case, the part of the clearance objected to and forming the basis of the action reading, "Dismissed for conduct unbecoming a conductor." It is likewise a custom among the railroads in employing men with past railroad experience to require the presentation of a "clearance" from the last employer. For some time prior to December 31, 1910, the respondent had been passenger conductor on the branch line running generally between Vallejo and Suisun. On that date he was relieved from duty, and in July of the following year at his own request was furnished with a clearance card which gave the reason of his discharge, "Dismissed for conduct unbecoming a conductor."

The complaint alleges that this entry in the clearance card regarding the reason for the dismissal is false and that a clearance of this character has prevented respondent from gaining railroad employment since the date of his dismissal and will continue to act as a bar so long as the record is maintained by the appellant railroad.

It appears from the record that on December 1, 1910, one W. H. Cameron, of Napa, wrote to Charles S. Fee, then general passenger agent of the Southern Pacific Company, complaining of the conduct of respondent in the course of his work on November 27, 1910. It was charged by Cameron that on that day respondent Adams was disorderly and intoxicated while on duty. Suit was instituted by Adams against Cameron, and Adams recovered judgment against Cameron for $5,000 as damages for libel, the damage suffered being that he lost his position with the Southern Pacific Company and was permanently deprived from obtaining railroad employment. This judgment was settled in full by the Southern Pacific Company, the case being Adams v. Cameron, 27 Cal. App. 625, 150 P. 1005, 151 P. 286.

The issue most stressed at the trial was the truth or falsity of the charge contained in the letter from Cameron to the general agent of the company that appellant was on November 27, 1910, disorderly and intoxicated while on duty.

Appellants urge as ground for reversal: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to sustain the judgment in the following particulars: First, the evidence wholly fails to show that the entry on the records of the Southern Pacific or the clearance card itself prevented Adams from obtaining other railroad employment; second, that the entry on the records and on the clearance card is true and justifiable; third, that the judgment is in excess of any damages the plaintiff could possibly have sustained. (2) That the clearance card and record were privileged communications, made in good faith and not actionable. (3) That the satisfaction of judgment in the case of Adams v. Cameron included all damages which the plaintiff seeks in this action and is a bar to recovery. (4) The action is barred by the statute of limitations. (5) Errors of law consisting of numerous errors of court in rulings on the admission and rejection of evidence. (6) Errors of the court in its instructions to the jury.

The evidence is without dispute—in fact, it was admitted by respondent when testifying as a witness that he operated two business enterprises outside of his employment, one of which at least was in violation of the company rules, one a stage line at Cement and the other a loan office in Oakland, where he loaned money to railroad employees at 5 per cent. interest per month; that he owned an ark or houseboat which was conducted as a house of prostitution and which he leased to a certain individual, and while he claims he did not know at the time of leasing the purpose for which it was to be used, he learned not long after that it was used for the purpose of prostitution; that he was treasurer and one of the organizers of an improvement club at Vallejo, which was nothing more than an illicit bar conducted for the sale of liquor contrary to law and which was closed by the chief of police of Vallejo for violation of the liquor laws, and that he frequented this club where liquor was sold in violation of the rules of the company. It is also a fact that the officers of appellant corporation knew of the ownership by respondent of the houseboat, of his connection with the Vallejo club and his frequenting this club where liquor was sold in violation of the company rules at the time the clearance card was issued.

[1] The railroad is not bound to retain in its service as a conductor a man who brought disrepute upon himself or his employer by association with an illicit bar and who visited such bar where liquor was sold in violation of its rules; it is not bound to retain an employee who owned and let an ark or houseboat which he had knowledge was being used for the purpose of prostitution nor a man who engaged in foreign business operations in violation of its rules.

The reason assigned for discharging respondent from his position is "dismissed for conduct unbecoming a conductor." If conducting an illicit bar which the chief of police found necessary to close and letting an ark or houseboat which he had knowledge was being conducted as a house of prostitution and receiving as rent money earned from such prostitution is not conduct unbecoming a conductor, it would be difficult to know what constitutes such unbecoming conduct. It would seem that such conduct is unbecoming in any self-respecting man of any walk of life or engaged in any occupation. If the fact be true that the party discharged had conducted himself in a manner unbecoming the position he occupied, he is no worse off if his discharge clearance is founded upon an offense of which he is not guilty, if in fact he be guilty of an offense equally flagrant known to his employer at the time and coming under the same general designation. Even if it be held that respondent was not guilty of the charge of disorderly conduct and being intoxicated while on duty, there is no question but that he was guilty of the other offenses mentioned, for he himself in this action so testified, and it further appears that the other offenses were known to appellants at the time of his discharge.

[2] The question arose as to who is to be the judge of what constitutes ground for dismissal—what constitutes conduct unbecoming a conductor. The court permitted the jury to decide this question. The court in instructing the jury with reference to respondent Adams' connection with the social and improvement club during his employment with the company charged, "and if you further believe that his connection with said club constituted conduct unbecoming a conductor, then your verdict must be for the defendants." And the court also in instructing the jury with reference to respondent Adams' ownership of the houseboat, which was used for the purpose of prostitution, concluded such instruction, "and if you further believe that such ownership of such houseboat, coupled with a knowledge by the plaintiff as to the purpose for which said boat was being used, constituted conduct unbecoming a conductor, then your verdict must be for the defendants." In other words, the jury was permitted to determine what acts in its judgment would constitute conduct unbecoming a conductor.

An employee is not entitled to have a jury decide whether or not his infraction of the rules established by his employer warrants dismissal. Where the reason was, from the standpoint of the railway company acting in good faith, wholly true, a judgment against such company should not stand. St. Louis S. W. Ry. Co. v. Hixon, 104 Tex. 267, 137 S. W. 343; St. Louis S. F. Ry. Co. v. Inman (Tex. Civ. App.) 137 S. W. 1153; St. Louis S. W. Ry. Co. v. Griffin, 106 Tex. 477, 171 S. W. 703, L. R. A. 1917B, 1108.

[3] In the instant case the undisputed testimony shows that respondent Adams was guilty of offenses which the company was amply justified in determining were such as would justify his discharge because of "conduct unbecoming a conductor," and that the true ground for his discharge operating upon the minds of the officials who discharged him was in fact that assigned on the clearance card. This being the case, a jury was not entitled to substitute its opinion in the place of the opinion of the employer. If respondent Adams was guilty of conduct unbecoming a conductor and his discharge was justified, it naturally follows that a recovery may not be had.

[5] Appellants contend that the satisfaction of judgment in the case of Adams v. Cameron includes all damages which Adams as plaintiff seeks in this action, and is a bar to recovery here. An examination of the complaint in Adams v. Cameron, which was introduced in evidence in this case, shows that he attributes his discharge to the Cameron letter dated December 1, 1910. Paragraph VI of the complaint details the damage alleged to have been sustained. Included in this damage is the loss of wages and his permanent inability to again obtain employment as a railroad conductor, setting forth that he has no trade or occupation other than railroad brakeman and conductor and that by reason of his discharge on the ground of conduct unbecoming a conductor it will be impossible for him to secure employment with said railroad company or with any other railroad company; that the various railroads which operate in California have and maintain a system of exchange references through which each railroad company is apprised of the reason or cause of an employee's discharge; that no other railroad company will employ a man discharged for conduct unbecoming a conductor and that no railroad company will employ a new man either as a brakeman or conductor who has passed the age of 45 years; that he was then 47 years of age, and that this rule would therefore act as a permanent bar to new employment, "and that by reason of the premises and the said acts and words of defendant, this plaintiff has been permanently deprived of the income and earnings which would otherwise accrue to him from his employment as a railroad conductor in said state of California, to his damage," etc.

Paragraph XX of the complaint here sets forth that by reason of the issuance of the alleged false clearance, "plaintiff at all times since July 18, 1915, has been and will be, and will continue to be unable to obtain employment with the defendant corporation, or with any other railroad company operating its lines in the state of California, * * * and now is deprived thereby of the right and opportunity to pursue and follow his said calling."

In the Cameron Case respondent sought and received damages because of his inability to obtain work as a conductor in California by reason of the alleged false clearance, and here he seeks damages against appellants for the identical injury for which he was compensated in the former action. The judgment in the Cameron Case was satisfied. With the satisfaction of this judgment Adams was fully compensated for all damages sustained by him by reason of his inability to secure employment as a conductor arising out of the statement in his clearance. It is elementary that there can be but one satisfaction for any given wrong. If the Cameron letter was false and the railroad acted upon this false letter in such a manner as to do injury to Adams, there was a choice open to him to sue one or all of the persons causing such injury. Adams elected to sue Cameron and obtained a judgment, which judgment was paid. In the present action he seeks to recover for a portion of the same injury from appellants. He is not entitled to be paid twice; there can be but one satisfaction.

Respondent urges that the action against Cameron was an action for libel committed by him in writing and publishing the letter known in this case as the "Cameron letter"; that appellants were not parties to that action and were not bound by it in any way and that therefore this action is not barred by the satisfaction of judgment in the Cameron case, and cites us to a number of authorities, both in this state and from other jurisdictions. We agree with the rule announced in these cases, but the facts are not similar to those presented here. The California cases cited are De La Guerra v. Newhall, 55 Cal. 21; Owens v. McNally, 124 Cal. 29, 56 P. 615, and Curtin v. Salmon River Co., 141 Cal. 308, 74 P. 851, 99 Am. St. Rep. 75. In the De La Guerra Case the court held that a judgment for defendants in an action for the trespassing of defendants' cattle on the plaintiff's land was not a bar to a subsequent action for a similar trespass occurring prior to those alleged in the former action. In the Owens Case the court held that a former adjudication against the enforcement of a contract by the uncle to will property to the niece is not a bar to the enforcement of an executed gift of land made to her by her uncle in his lifetime, and in the Curtin Case the court held that a judgment in a former suit to foreclose an invalid mortgage, which failed because the security was held to be void, is not a bar to a subsequent action on the note, in which the note is shown to have been ratified by the conduct of the corporation. In these cases the subsequent actions were not predicated on the same acts complained of in the former actions and did not demand damages for the identical injury as here, and the damage demanded had not been adjudicated and fully satisfied.

[6] The authorities in this state and in other jurisdictions, as far as they have been brought to our attention, seem to be uniform to the effect that the bar arises not from any particular form in which the action is brought, but arises from the fact that the party complainant has been compensated for his injury.

The first decision in this state upon this question is Tompkins v. Clay Street R. Co., 66 Cal. 163, 4 P. 1165, in which the court uses this language:

> "Every party contributing to the injuries of plaintiff was liable to the full extent of the damages by her sustained. Her injuries gave her but a single cause of action. If she had brought a separate action against the Sutter street company, and recovered a judgment therein, and such judgment had been satisfied, she could not subsequently have maintained another action for the same injuries against the Clay street company, inasmuch as the conclusive presumption would be that she had already received full compensation for all damages by her sustained. Damages resulting from the same wrongful transaction are ordinarily inseparable; she could not recover part from one and part from the other defendant. * * * It is to be observed, when the bar accrues in favor of some of the wrongdoers, by reason of what has been received from or done in respect to one or more of the others, that the bar arises not from any particular form that the proceeding assumes, but from the fact that the injured party has actually received satisfaction, or what in law is deemed the equivalent." (Italics ours.)

In Butler v. Ashworth, 110 Cal. 614, 43 P. 4, 386, the defense was set up that a judgment obtained prior to the action had been entered against the city and county of San Francisco. The first action against the city alleged damage from the overflow of sewage caused by a choked condition of the sewer. The second action was against Ashworth as superintendent of streets for damage due to the breaking of the sewer. In that case the court says:

> "But the plaintiff in support of her appeal claims that this wholesome rule has no application to this case, for the reason, as she contends, that the cause of action stated in her suit against the city and that stated against these defendants are not the same, and that the defendants in the two actions are in no sense joint tort-feasors. That the act relied upon as producing the injury in the action against the city was the delay in making repairs to the sewer, * * * while these defendants are charged with an act of commission, the making of repairs in such a negligent manner as to directly conduce to the injury complained of. * * * It is nevertheless perfectly apparent that plaintiff's contention is more specious than sound, and that there exists in fact no real difference between the causes of action stated in the two actions. Formal differences there may be, but in matters of substance there are none. In both actions the inducing, proximate cause of the damage and injury alleged is the invasion of her premises by the overflowing sewage, caused by the broken and choked condition of the sewer. That is the essential fact alleged alike in both counts of her action against the city, and in the complaint in this case. That is the fact constituting the gist of the action in both cases, and, as we have seen, it was one and the same overflow—in other words, the same fact which produced the alleged damage in both cases. * * * This was the fault of the city and the defendants, her officers, alike. Whether it was caused by their joint or several acts is immaterial. It would be subordinating substance to mere form to say that these two actions do not under the circumstances rest upon one and the same cause. This being so, and it appearing that plaintiff had been once compensated for the injury suffered, the court below was right in denying her a second award of damages for the same act."

In Union Associated Press Co. v. Press Publishing Co., 24 Misc. Rep. 610, 54 N. Y. S. 183, in an action for libel founded upon the publication by defendant in its newspaper of an article charging plaintiffs with the execution of a fraudulent scheme whereby the news was intercepted during its transmission by means of wire-tapping, the court uses this language:

> "Here the allegations of the defense disclose the fact that the plaintiff actually recovered damages in an action brought against the party then charged with being responsible for the publication, in this defendant's newspaper, of the libel in suit. Damages were recovered not merely for the act of the Associated Press in communicating the matter to this defendant, independently of the publication, but for the injury done by the publication itself, which was alleged to have been instigated by the Associated Press. This being the situation, there appears to be no escape from the conclusion that the plaintiffs, when prosecuting their actions against the latter corporation, elected to proceed, for the particular libel, against the party who was responsible, jointly with the present defendant, for the perpetration of the wrong, and, accordingly, that the satisfaction of the judgment then recovered operated to release this defendant, as a joint tort-feasor, from further liability."

It would serve no useful purpose to discuss the remaining assignments of error, as it follows from what has been said that the judgment must be reversed.

The cause is remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment for the defendants.

COOLEY v. FREEMAN et al. (S. F. 12247.)★

Supreme Court of California. April 18, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank May 17, 1928.

Highways 🔑113(5)—Surety's obligation to pay for material and labor by subcontractor held not affected by contract between highway commission and original contractor (St. 1919, p. 487).

Under St. 1919, p. 487, relative to liability of surety for materials, provisions, provender, and other supplies or teams used for or about performance of work, surety guaranteeing payment for materials used by contractor in constructing portion of state highway held liable for material and labor furnished by subcontractor without regard to terms of contract between highway commission and original contractor.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by W. L. Cooley against Orvill V. Freeman and Samuel J. Whiting, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Freeman & Whiting, American Indemnity Company, and others. Judgment for plaintiff against defendants named, and defendants named appeal. Affirmed.

Knight, Boland & Christin and F. Eldred Boland, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Arnold C. Lackenbach, of San Francisco, and J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Respondent, as a subcontractor, furnished material and performed labor which was utilized in the construction of a portion of the state highway in San Mateo county. The item here in dispute relates to what is known as an "overhaul charge"—a charge of so much per cubic yard for hauling material for "shoulders" or elevated borders along said highway when finished; such hauling being from a place without the right of way, and more than 300 feet from a certain point in the zone of use. In default of payment respondent sued the contractor and his surety for the disputed item, and recovered judgment against both of them, from which they have both appealed.

In this connection it should be noted that no showing for reversal of the judgment as to the contractor is made. The amount of the item, if legal, is likewise not in dispute. The surety, American Indemnity Company, a corporation, urges, however, that the contract between the California highway commission and the contractor is the measure of its liability, and, as the claim of respondent would not be allowable under that contract, if made by the contractor, it necessarily cannot be allowed against it when made by the respondent in this action. No time need be spent in ascertaining whether the contractor could or could not prevail as against the California highway commission, for it may be conceded, for the purposes of this case, that the contractor could not have recovered this item as against it.

The test of the liability of appellant surety hereunder is not what the rights of the contractor and highway commission are under the construction contract, but is: Did respondent furnish material and perform labor which was utilized in the construction work covered by the contract for public work between the highway commission and the contractor, which said work was the subject of the indemnity agreement made by appellant and sued upon herein? There is no contention concerning the affirmative answer made by the court to this inquiry. The fact also is that the work of respondent was accepted.

The liability of the surety is controlled by the provisions of the Public Works Statutes of 1919, c. 303 (Stats. 1919, p. 487), as it read in 1924, the date of the contract herein. Said statute providing for the indemnity bond thereunder read in part as follows:

> "* * * And must provide that if the contractor, person, company, or corporation, or his or its subcontractor, fails to pay for any materials, provisions, provender or other supplies, or teams, used in, upon, for or about the performance of the work contracted to be done, or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, that the surety or sureties will pay the same in an amount not exceeding the sum specified in the bond, and also, in case suit is brought upon such bond, a reasonable attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court. * * *"—Section 1.

The obligation of appellant surety company in this behalf is as follows:

> "That if the above bounden * * * shall fail to pay for any materials, provisions, provender or other supplies used in, upon, for or about the performance of the work of constructing, under the foregoing contract, a portion of the state highway in the county of San Mateo, or shall fail to pay any person, company or corporation renting or hiring teams or implements or machinery for or contributing to said work to be done, or any person who has performed work or labor upon the same, or any person who supplies both work and materials therefor, and as required by the provisions of an act of the Legislature, approved May 10, 1919. * * *"

There is, therefore, no escape from the conclusion that this obligation is in nowise affected by the terms of the contract between the highway commission and the original contractor, nor by a question of whether the contractor has breached his contract with the state. The obligation of the surety is to supply to persons in the class of respondent a quick, reliable, and sufficient means of payment. No lien law is available to persons performing labor or furnishing materials which go into the construction of public works.

A similar situation under another statute, the Vrooman Act (Stats. 1885, p. 147), was before this court in the case of Los Angeles Stone Co. v. Nat. Surety Co., 178 Cal. 247, 173 P. 79. The whole subject is there exhaustively treated, and the contention of respondent here made sustained, and the contention of appellants refuted. The whole opinion is in point, and need not be set out.

This holding was followed by Hub Hdw. Co. v. Aetna Accident, etc., Co., 178 Cal. 264, 269, 173 P. 81. A similar holding was also made in Associated Oil Co. v. Commary-Peterson Co., 32 Cal. App. 582, 163 P. 702. Many federal and state authorities to the same effect could be cited.

The case of Roberts v. Security, etc., Co., 196 Cal. 557, 238 P. 673, is not in point, as the building contract there involved was between private parties, and the mechanic's lien law was applicable to the situation. The undertaking there involved bore no reference to the Statutes of 1919, nor was the obligation itself in form similar to the one before us. We can find no merit whatsoever in this appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

BUCHANAN v. BANTA et al. (S. F. 12291.)

Supreme Court of California. April 19, 1928

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑291(13)—Lessor's testimony held not to show surrender, forfeiture, and nonassignment of lease, where he permitted assignees to take possession and accepted rentals.

Plaintiff's testimony in unlawful detainer as to surrender and forfeiture of lease and nonassignment thereof by him is immaterial, where record shows that he not only failed to exercise option to forfeit lease for violations thereof or to give notice of such intention, but, with full knowledge of assignment by lessee, permitted assignees to take possession, and thereafter accepted specified rentals from them without protest.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑104—Breach of covenant not to assign lease entitles lessor only to forfeit lease.

On breach of covenant in lease that it shall not be assigned without lessor's previous consent, lessor has only the option to forfeit lease; assignment not being void, but only voidable at option of lessor, who must exercise it according to law.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑108(1)—Failure of assignees to tender additional rent, reserved for last three months, until after unlawful detainer suit, held not to authorize forfeiture, in view of deposit amply securing lessor.

That lessee's assignees neglected to tender additional rent, specified in lease for last three months of term, until after commencement of lessor's action in unlawful detainer, held not to authorize forfeiture where deposit, applicable to payment thereof, amply covered amount due at beginning of such period, and lease did not require that such additional sum be paid before exhaustion of deposit.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; H. V. Alvarado, Judge.

Action in unlawful detainer by Warren G. Buchanan against J. O. Banta and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Ramsey Probasco, of Oakland, and Clarence De Lancey, of San Francisco, for appellants.

J. E. Rodgers and A. F. Bray, both of Martinez, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Appeal from judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action in unlawful detainer. The sole question is whether, under the circumstances shown by the evidence, defendants held possession of plaintiff's property under a month to month tenancy after surrender of lease by operation of law, as found by the court, or whether they held under an assignment of lease by operation of law, as contended by said defendants.

Plaintiff, as lessor, leased said property for garage purposes for a period of five years at a monthly rental of $200, with a $25 monthly increase for the last three months of the term. Upon execution of the written lease, he accepted, to secure performance of its covenants, the sum of $600, which was to be applied on account of the payment of the last three months installments of rental thereunder. The lease also provided that no assignment thereof should be made without the written consent of the lessor.

In January, 1925, a few months prior to expiration of the term, the lessee agreed to make for the benefit of his creditors an assignment of all his business assets, including said lease, to defendants as a committee representing the principal creditors; their purpose being to carry on the business only until such time as it could be disposed of to the advantage of all concerned. This committee called upon plaintiff lessor to discuss the situation, especially with respect to taking over the lease. Plaintiff refused to give them an assignment thereof or to do anything in the matter until he first consulted his attorneys. At a subsequent interview, the committee had with them a document assigning the lease and other assets for the benefit of the creditors executed by the lessee, and also executed by many of the creditors, which instrument contained the following covenant:

> "To pay the costs and charges of these presents * * * which specifically includes the payment of rent to Warren Buchanan according to the terms of the aforementioned lease."

A place had been provided thereon for signature by the said lessor, but, although he examined the paper, for an unexplained reason it was never signed by him.

As to the conversation between the parties at their various meetings and as to their resulting agreement and mutual understanding, the evidence is in sharp conflict. Plaintiff testified that he positively refused at all times to assign the lease, but permitted the creditors to go in under a month to month tenancy until such time as they could dispose of the business. The three defendants and an interested attorney testified that it was understood that the creditors were taking possession under an assignment of the lease with the benefit of all its provisions, for were it otherwise they would have refused to attempt any adjustment of the lessee's affairs by taking over his business. It was also understood by these parties that, in the event of a final sale of said business during the term of the lease, the privilege of taking an assignment thereof would be extended to the purchaser.

At any rate, the creditors entered into possession, and on January 29, 1925, paid the rental, then about two weeks overdue, for the period from January 15th to February 15th. Thereafter they continued to pay the monthly rental up to commencement of the last three months of the term; that is, up to May 15, upon which date under the lease the initial payment of $600 should have applied upon the then due installment. On May 28th, no rental having been received, plaintiff duly notified defendants to surrender the premises within three days. After their failure so to do, he instituted this action, and obtained judgment against them in the sum of $600, $200 rental, and $400 damages.

[1] Among other things, the court found that, prior to said purported assignment, the lessee had violated and surrendered the lease to plaintiff, and the assignment by said lessee was without plaintiff's knowledge, consent, or acquiescence; that possession of the premises by defendants was under a month to month tenancy; that plaintiff had not waived any right or claim that he had in declaring the lease forfeited, nor was he estopped from declaring said forfeiture. These findings state fairly respondent's position on this appeal, namely, that of implied surrender of said lease by operation of law (Welcome v. Hess, 90 Cal. 507, 27 P. 369, 25 Am. St. Rep. 145; Steel v. Thompson, 59 Cal. App. 192, 210 P. 430; Triest v. Goldstone, 173 Cal. 244, 159 P. 715, and like cases), and the taking possession thereafter of the premises by appellants under a month to month tenancy.

[2] The rule set forth in the above cases is sound, but it is to be noted that none of them involve the question of assignment. In other words, if, as contended by appellants, the evidence establishes an assignment by operation of law, the rule announced in said cases has no applicability to the facts here, nor can any support whatsoever be found in the record for the findings made by the trial court; that is, plaintiff's testimony, which stands alone, as to said alleged surrender, forfeiture, and nonassignment by him of the lease, becomes immaterial when admittedly his actions belied his words, and the record proves that he not only utterly failed to exercise his alleged option to forfeit said lease for violations thereof, or to give any notice of such intention on his part, but, on the contrary, with full knowledge of said assignment by the lessee to appellants, he permitted them to take possession of the premises, and thereafter accepted from them without protest the rentals specified in the lease. The law is that, where there is a clause in a lease that it shall not be assigned without previous written consent of the lessor, and this covenant is breached, the lessor has only the option to forfeit the lease for such breach; the assignment is not void, but voidable only at the option of the lessor, which option he must exercise according to law. Garcia v. Gunn, 119 Cal. 315, 319, 51 P. 684; Potts Drug Co. v. Benedict, 156 Cal. 322, 327, 104 P. 432, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609; Randol v. Tatum, 98 Cal. 390, 33 P. 433; Baker v. Maier, etc., Brewery, 140 Cal. 530, 74 P. 22; Gray v. Maier, etc., Brewery, 2 Cal. App. 653, 657, 84 P. 280; Blessing v. Fetters, 40 Cal. App. 471, 181 P. 108; Jones v. Maria, 48 Cal. App. 171, 191 P. 943.

[3] The fact that appellants neglected to tender the $25 per month additional rent for the last three months until after commencement of this action has no significance, as at the beginning of said period the $600 deposit amply covered the $225 then due, and the lease did not provide that said additional sum of $75 should be payable prior to exhaustion of the $600 fund.

The recent companion cases of Miller v. Reidy (Cal. App.) 260 P. 358, and Reidy v. Miller (Cal. App.) 260 P. 361, are directly in point, and discuss all questions here to be determined. The facts of said cases are similar to those of the case at bar, and the material provisions of the lease involved therein are practically identical with the provisions of the lease here. In said cases the provision against assignment without written consent of the lessor had been violated and demand made by him upon the sublessee to remove from the premises or return possession to the lessor, but said sublessee did neither. The court held:

> "He who claims a forfeiture must have closed every avenue of escape to his opponent. Mindful that the law provides other remedies more consonant with justice, courts avoid enforcing covenants for forfeiture wherever possible. Such agreements are rarely tolerated. Spangler v. Spangler, 11 Cal. App. 321, 104 P. 995.
> "If the assignment were to be regarded as a breach of the lease, the evidence is sufficient to support the finding that the right to take advantage of such breach was waived by the lessors. It is true that in accepting each month's rent from Reidy, Dr. Miller executed a receipt in the following language: 'Received from P. M. Reidy three hundred dollars for rent of premises at * * * for the month of * * * without prejudice to any of my rights under the lease of said premises.' This was a clear attempt to eat the cake and still keep it. His actions belie his words. Waiver is a question of intention. Alden v. Mayfield, 164 Cal. 6, 127 P. 45; Jones v. Della Maria, 48 Cal. App. 171, 191 P. 943; Myers v. Herskowitz [Horskowitz] 33 Cal. App. 581, 165 P. 1031. For the lessors month after month to accept rents specified in the lease, and at the same time declare that there was a forfeiture, results in an irreconcilable inconsistency. * * * If an unauthorized assignment had been made, the lessors had the right to declare the term at an end, or they could have waived the breach and let the lease continue. Nowhere within that agreement, nor in the law, is there a stipulation or provision that they might do both."

Judgment reversed.

ETCHEVERRY v. HARTFORD ACCIDENT & INDEMNITY CO. (Civ. 5806.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 7, 1928.

1. Corporations 🔑503(2)—County in which was land on which attachment obtained by corporation was levied held place for action on bond given by it (Const. art. 12, § 16).

Within Const. art. 12, § 16, declaring corporation may be sued in the county where the obligation or liability arose, liability on bond given by corporation on obtaining writ of attachment arose in the county in which was the land on which the writ was levied, and not the county in which the writ was issued; it being, according to the declaration of the landowner, the execution of the writ on his property which prevented him from securing rents or returns therefrom, because renters would not plant it with the attachment thereon.

2. Costs 🔑260(1)—Appeal appearing taken for delay, damages will be imposed and added to costs.

The appeal appearing to the court to have been taken for the purpose of delay, $100 ordered imposed as damages to be added to costs of appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Fred J. Etcheverry against the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company. From order denying motion for change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry Haves, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Byron J. Walters, of San Diego, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The action out of which this appeal arises is one for recovery upon a bond given upon the issuing of a writ of attachment in another action, which was originally filed in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, but subsequently was transferred to the superior court in and for the county of San Diego, where the case was tried and judgment rendered in favor of the defendant. The writ was executed by levying upon farm land owned by respondent herein and situate in San Diego county.

The present action to recover on the bond was filed in the superior court in and for the county of San Diego. Prior to the filing of the answer, defendant filed its demurrer, and also gave notice of a motion to transfer the case for trial to the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco. The grounds for the motion as set forth in the notice are "that the place where the principal business of the corporation is transacted, is the City of San Francisco, County of San Francisco, State of California, and not the County of San Diego, and furthermore, upon the ground that the residence of the said corporation is the County of San Francisco, State of California"; also "that it is an action against a corporation, and was instituted in a county in which the contract was not made, nor was to be performed, nor where the obligations or liabilities arose, nor where the breach occurred."

The court denied the motion to transfer the case, and the defendant appeals from that order.

[1] While appellant in its brief presents several questions with argument and some citations, there is really but one question properly before the court on this appeal, and that is: Was the superior court in and for the county of San Diego the proper forum for the instant action to be filed and tried in?

We are of the opinion that the answer must be in the affirmative. The place for the filing and trial of an action against a corporation is provided for in section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution of the state of California. This section reads as follows:

> "A corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises or the breach occurs; or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases."

The obligation or liability which forms the basis of plaintiff's action arose when the levy of the writ of attachment was made upon plaintiff's real estate situate in the county of San Diego. The mere issuing of the writ of attachment by the clerk of the superior court in Los Angeles county created no liability against the defendant bonding company. It was the execution of the writ upon plaintiff's property situate in San Diego county, which, according to his complaint, prevented him from securing any rental or returns therefrom, because renters would not plant the land to crops as long as the attachment lay upon the land. Vesper v. Crane Co., 165 Cal. 36, 130 P. 876, L. R. A. 1915A, 541; Maskell v. Barker, 99 Cal. 642, 34 P. 340.

There is no merit in this appeal, for respondent clearly has the right to maintain his action in the superior court in and for San Diego county.

[2] Inasmuch as it appears to us that the appeal was taken for the purpose of delay, it is ordered that the sum of $100 be imposed as damages, and that the same be added to and become a part of the costs awarded to the respondent on this appeal.

The order is affirmed.

FARMERS' BANK OF CAMARILLO v. GOODRICH et al. (Civ. 5804.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 7, 1928.

1. Bills and notes ⇐489(1)—Answer alleging execution of note with payee's name left blank, and unauthorized insertion of payee's name, and negotiation, raised issue of constructive fraud in action on note.

In action on note against makers and indorsers, answer of makers alleging that note was placed in another's custody under specific conditions, and for particular purposes, with payee's name left blank, and that person having custody inserted name of payee and negotiated note without authority, raised issue of constructive fraud in negotiating and delivery of note.

2. Appeal and error ⇐994(3)—Determination of trial court sitting as jury as to credibility of witness' contradictory statements is conclusive.

Determination as to credibility of conflicting statements of witness is solely for trial court sitting as a jury, and his conclusion may not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Bills and notes ⇐525—Evidence in action on note held to sustain finding that note, claimed to have been fraudulently transferred, came into plaintiff's hands after maturity.

In action on note, in which makers asserted fraud in negotiation and delivery thereof, evidence held sufficient to sustain trial court's finding that note was past due when it came into plaintiff's hands, and that plaintiff was therefore not holder in due course.

4. Bills and notes ⇐351—Holder receiving note after maturity held subject to all defenses available as against payee.

Where note came into hands of holder after maturity, holder suing thereon was subject to all the defenses which could be raised against the original payee of the note.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by the Farmers' Bank of Camarillo against Dwight P. Goodrich, Jennie Goodrich, and others. From a judgment for defendants named, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Clair S. Tappaan and Glenn E. Whitney, both of Los Angeles, for appellant

James L. Allen and James L. Davis, both of Santa Ana, for respondents.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of defendants Dwight P. Goodrich and Jennie Goodrich in an action upon a promissory note executed by the said Goodriches and indorsed by defendants Herman Fisher and M. A. Fleming.

The complaint is in the usual form, and, among other matters therein set forth, alleges that the note in question was on the date it bore executed by the defendants Dwight P. Goodrich and Jennie E. Goodrich, and thereafter was delivered to the defendant Herman Fisher, the payee named in the note; that subsequently and before maturity thereof and for a valuable consideration the note in question was indorsed and delivered by Herman Fisher to M. A. Fleming, who before maturity of the note and for a valuable consideration indorsed and delivered it to the plaintiff bank, the then holder and owner of the note. Defendants Fisher and Fleming defaulted, but defendants Dwight P. Goodrich and Jennie E. Goodrich, the alleged makers of the note, answered, specifically denying all of the material allegations of the complaint concerning the execution and delivery of the note. In addition, they set up in their answer two special affirmative defenses, the material matters of which may be briefly summarized as follows:

First. That on May 18, 1923, which is the date that the note sued on bears, defendants Goodrich executed "an incomplete and conditional promissory note," a copy of which is set forth in the answer, and which is similar in all respects to the note sued upon, except that it bears the name of no payee, a blank space appearing where the note set out in the complaint has written the name of Herman Fisher.

Second. That at the time and as a part of the transaction wherein said note was executed, an agreement was entered into between the said defendants and one B. R. Parrott; that the note was placed in the custody of the said Parrott by said defendants upon the conditions and for the purposes set forth in said agreement.

Third. That subsequent to the placing of said note with the said Parrott, the said Parrott and defendants Fisher and Fleming, without any authority so to do, inserted or caused to be inserted in said note the name of Herman Fisher as payee; that the said Parrott, Fisher, and Fleming, and each of them, well knew that the defendants Goodrich had never authorized them or any one to insert the name of Fisher as payee in said note, and

⇐For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes that the name of Herman Fisher was inserted in said note without legal right.

Fourth. That the said Parrott had no authority to negotiate said note or to deliver the same to any one, except in accordance with the provisions of the agreement referred to, and that said note was never delivered by the said Parrott in accordance with the terms and conditions of said agreements, but was negotiated and delivered contrary to the provisions of said agreement; that the said Fisher and Fleming in receiving and negotiating said note knew that the said Parrott had no authority to deliver or negotiate said note.

Fifth. That the said defendants Goodrich received no consideration whatever for said note.

Sixth. That the bank well knew at the time it received said note that the said Parrott had no right to deliver and negotiate said note and well knew of all of the infirmities of said note as alleged in said special defense, and that said bank did not take the note in due course.

[1] It may be also noted that in these special defenses there are sufficient facts alleged to raise the issue of constructive fraud in negotiating and delivery of said note from Parrott on to the plaintiff bank.

For brevity's sake, we have not summarized the provisions of the alleged agreement, as our determination of the appeal makes unnecessary a detailed consideration of the terms of the agreement.

Findings and judgment went for the defendants Dwight P. Goodrich and Jennie E. Goodrich, and in favor of the plaintiff as against the defendants Fisher and Fleming. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals, alleging that the findings in five particular instances are not supported by the evidence, and that therefore the judgment rendered is contrary to law.

The outstanding question of a number raised and discussed in the briefs filed is: "Did the plaintiff bank receive the note in due course and before its maturity?" The court found that it did not, and in our opinion there is sufficient evidence in the record to support this finding.

The note in question, being dated May 18, 1923, and made payable by its terms six months after date, fell due on October 18, 1923. There is no dispute of the fact that the bank received this note from defendant M. A. Fleming as collateral security to a note executed by the defendant Fleming to the bank for moneys loaned to Fleming. The only direct testimony bearing upon the question as to the date of delivery of the note to the bank is that of the defendant Fleming. No officer of the bank appeared as a witness to testify as to when the bank received the note. The record discloses the following as Fleming's testimony on this point:

"Q. When did you turn this note over to the bank? A. Why, I couldn't say exactly when it was. * * *

"Q. Now, how much did you pay for them—did you buy them all at once?" (The pronoun "them" refers to several notes, including the one involved here.) A. No. Now here is the way the purchase was: I was getting money for Mr. Fisher—

"Q. You were getting money from Mr. Fisher? A. For Mr. Fisher— The Court: When was this, Mr. Fleming? A. Well, it was, I would say it was along in July or August; I would have to check up some way on that.

"Q. What year? A. 1924; it was about the time that the first notes, the Leichtfuzz notes, was put in the bank there at Los Angeles.

"Q. July or August, 1924? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. And it was after you got this note that you sold it to the plaintiff? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you got it in July, 1924? A. Well; as I say, I am not positive.

"Q. How? A. I am not positive about that, about the date.

"Q. Well, when was it? A. Well, approximately, I will say.

"Q. Well, approximately July, 1924; it might have been May or August? A. Oh, no; it was not. That is the best I can say; I think it was July or August. * * *"

Subsequently, upon cross-examination, the witness Fleming was asked, "These notes were transferred to the bank before they were due?" and he replied, "Oh, yes!"

[2, 3] This testimony, respondent asserts, abundantly supports the conclusion of the court that the note was past due when it came into plaintiff's hands. To this assertion, appellant replies that the year 1924, testified to by defendant as the year in which he delivered the note to the bank, "was clearly a misstatement" and was "an inadvertent misstatement, which all parties concerned knew to be such."

Endeavoring to support this conclusion that the witness Fleming inadvertently fixed the year as 1924, appellant makes several assertions of fact, some of which find no basis in the record, from which he urges that his conclusion may be fairly inferred. We have examined the transcript of the evidence, but can find nothing therein to justify appellant's assumption that the witness Fleming "inadvertently" fixed the time of delivery of the note as 1924 instead of 1923, unless it can be said that the fact of conflict in the witness' own testimony on this question is evidence that one of his statements was "inadvertently made."

It was clearly within the province of the trial court sitting as a jury to determine which one of the witness' statements on this point was entitled to credence. The court in its findings has indicated its conclusions and this court on appeal cannot interfere with that determination.

[4] Other points are urged by appellant which relate to issues raised by the respondents in their special defenses and evidence presented upon these issues. We do not understand that appellant contends that the questions raised in the special defenses would not have been pertinent if the action had been filed by Fisher, the payee appearing in the note. The court finding that the note came into the hands of the bank after maturity, it was subject to all of the defenses that could be raised against the original payee of the note. An examination of the record discloses that, while there is some conflict in the evidence, there is abundant evidence to support the findings of lack of authority to insert the name of Fisher, as payee in the note, and, also, the findings on the question of consideration for the note, delivery of the note, and fraud practiced in the obtaining of the note from Parrott by Fisher.

In view of our conclusion upon the question discussed, we do not deem it necessary to consider in detail the other points raised.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

CORY v. CITY OF STOCKTON et al.

(Civ. 3455.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 4, 1928.

1. Eminent domain 🔑2(10)—Flooding of plaintiff's lands with flood waters beyond capacity of canal constructed by federal government in aid of navigation held not compensable.

Occasional flooding of plaintiff's lands with flood waters beyond the carrying capacity of a canal constructed by the United States government in aid of navigation was not compensable, and plaintiff could therefore not recover from city or state.

2. Navigable waters 🔑8—That state and city contributed right of way for canal constructed by United States held not to make them liable for resulting damages.

That state and defendant city contributed the right of way over which the United States government constructed, and is maintaining, a canal and levee in aid of navigation, held not to make state or city liable for damages resulting from uses made of such right of way by United States; any remedy being against United States.

3. Courts 🔑489(1)—Issues respecting canal, dam, and levee constructed by United States in aid of navigation are not within state courts' jurisdiction.

Where United States constructed canal, dam, and levee in aid of navigation on right of way granted to it by state and defendant city the control of the properties involved, determination of extent of any rights plaintiff adjoining owner may have therein, duties of grantee thereof toward plaintiff, and question of existence of nuisance are not subjects within the jurisdiction of the state courts to adjudge and determine, but are exclusively for determination of federal courts.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by Carrie E. Cory against the City of Stockton and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Ashley, of Stockton, for appellant.

J. Le Roy Johnson, Clarence A. Grant, R. M. Dunne, Foltz, Rendon & Wallace, and R. C. Pardoe, all of Stockton, and S. B. Hall, for respondents.

BARTLETT, Justice pro tem. By an amended and supplemental complaint filed in the superior court of San Joaquin county, Cal., on June 2, 1925, plaintiff seeks the abatement of an alleged continuing public and private nuisance, incidental damages, declaratory judgment, and general relief. The original complaint was filed on January 28, 1924. Demurrers were interposed by defendants to the amended and supplemental complaint, which demurrers were sustained by the trial court without leave to amend, and judgment was entered in favor of defendants on April 9, 1926. Plaintiff appeals from the whole of said judgment.

The material facts appearing from the amended and supplemental complaint are: The city of Stockton, in San Joaquin county, Cal., lies a short distance east of the San Joaquin river at its junction with what is known as Stockton channel. The San Joaquin river flows in a general northwesterly direction in this vicinity. Stockton channel extends easterly from the San Joaquin river to the center of the city of Stockton. Both of these water courses are navigable streams over which much commerce has passed for many years. At various times in past years, commencing with 1881, the United States government has expended large sums of money for aiding navigation on these streams through deepening and rectifying their channels. Easterly of Stockton in the foothills of the Sierra Nevada Mountains what is known as the Calaveras river has its source. This stream emerges from the foothills onto the San Joaquin Valley plain near a town known as Bellota, about 15 miles east of Stockton. At Bellota the Calaveras river divides into two channels, each flowing generally westerly. The southerly channel is known as Mormon channel and the other is called the Old Calaveras river. The Old Calaveras river empties into the San Joaquin river about 3 to 5 miles northwesterly from the city of Stockton, passing in its course just north of the corporate limits of that city. The southerly course of Mormon channel originally flowed through the corporate limits of Stockton and emptied into Stockton channel at a point just west of the west boundary of the city. Since 1877 Mormon channel carried the bulk of the water of the Calaveras river. This stream has a varying flow of from 29,000-acre feet to over a million-acre feet in a year. In certain seasons this river carried large quantities of sediment towards the San Joaquin river, and the main body of the water of the Calaveras river as it passed through Mormon channel conveyed with such water large amounts of this sediment, portions of which were deposited in Stockton channel and the San Joaquin river, thereby causing detriment to the navigability of the streams. The lands adjacent to these rivers in seasons of rainfall were subject to floods which overflowed portions of the city of Stockton. The matter of the silting of Mormon channel and the San Joaquin river and the possibility of its prevention was made a subject of study by the United States war department. As a result of this study an appropriation by Congress was recommended for the purpose of constructing a canal to carry the water of Mormon channel to the Old Calaveras river. On June 13, 1902, Congress appropriated $50,000 for this purpose. This appropriation act provided as a condition that the city of Stockton or the state of California should furnish the right of way for the proposed diverting canal. The state of California authorized its commissioner of public works to obtain the right of way, appropriated $60,000 with which to secure it, thereafter acquired the same, and conveyed it to the United States. Subsequently the diverting canal was built by the United States and for many years before this action was commenced the waters of Mormon channel flowed through this canal to the Old Calaveras river and thence into the San Joaquin river. On the west side of the canal a high levee was constructed. No levee was constructed on the east side. During flood seasons at various times the diverting canal overflowed its banks, and waters from this overflow were cast upon the lands east of the canal, a portion of these lands being those owned by the plaintiff herein. The first overflow was in 1911. An action was brought in the United States Court of Claims seeking damages resulting from these overflows, plaintiff being a party thereto, and the case on reaching the United States Supreme Court was determined adversely to plaintiff so far as any claim for damages against the United States was concerned. Thereafter this action was instituted, plaintiff by her amended complaint asking that waters overflowing, flooding, or remaining on her land, other than that on the canal right of way, and the dam in Mormon channel, and incidentals thereof, be adjudged a nuisance; that the nuisance be abated; that plaintiff recover damages in the sum of $1,600; that the legal rights and duties of plaintiff and each of the defendants be ascertained and declared; that plaintiff have all other declaratory relief, and general relief and costs. The supplemental complaint alleges acts and claims concerning the lands in the right of way on the part of certain of the defendants occurring and made after the filing of the amended complaint, which acts and claims alleged to be without right or justification are asked to be restrained and prohibited on the determination of the action.

Defendant the city of Stockton filed a demurrer to the amended and supplemental complaint, on the grounds of want of a statement of sufficient facts, laches on the part of plaintiff, and bar of the statute of limitations against any rights plaintiff might have to a recovery against said defendant. This demurrer was sustained in the trial court without leave to amend, and from the judgment in defendants' favor thereupon entered this appeal is prosecuted.

[1] The vital point presented for determination on this appeal is whether or not the amended complaint and supplemental complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant city of Stockton. That the injury complained of is an incidental consequential one resulting from a public work constructed by the United States in aid of navigation is apparent from the facts set forth in the amended complaint and supplemental complaint. That injury resulting from such work is not compensable is declared to be the law applicable in this state by the decision of the Supreme Court in Gray v. Reclamation District No. 1500, 174 Cal. 622, 163 P. 1024. In this case the right of property owners concerning damage from overflows of flood waters caused through public work designed to aid navigation are exhaustively examined and discussed. The facts in that case in many respects are the same as those in the case at bar. There, as in this action, the projected work had in view as one of its primary purposes the improving and protecting of the bed of a navigable river for navigation. The result of the building of a levee on one side of lands embraced in a reclamation district temporarily flooded lands lying outside of the district with flood waters which were beyond the capacity of the navigable river to carry and convey. The court decided that, where a public work is built in aid of navigation, any incidental damage resulting therefrom is not compensable. Occasional flooding of plaintiff's lands with flood waters beyond the carrying capacity of the canal constructed by the United States is the gravamen of this action. In view of the rule laid down in Gray v. Reclamation District No. 1500, supra, the amended complaint and supplemental complaint fail to state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action against the defendant city of Stockton.

[2] The fact that the state of California and the city of Stockton contributed the right of way over which the United States has constructed and is maintaining its canal and levee cannot be held as making them in any way liable for damages resulting from uses made of such right of way by the United States. If she is entitled to any relief, plaintiff must secure it from the constructor of the canal, the United States of America.

By the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Sanguinetti v. United States, reported in 264 U. S. 146, 44 S. Ct. 264, 68 L. Ed. 608, which was an action for damages in tort for damages to plaintiff's lands and others similarly situated, by means of overflow waters, it was held that there is no remedy against the United States for tort in casting water on private property; that the injury was in its nature indirect and consequential and one for which no implied obligation on the part of the government can arise. The case was decided solely upon the point that the Court of Claims had no jurisdiction regarding a liability of the United States sounding in tort. The extent of the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims in a proceeding seeking equitable aid against the United States does not appear to have been raised or presented by the actions instituted by the plaintiff and others in the United States Court of Claims regarding the canal and its operations.

[3] The United States is the only party that has the power to remove the dam and levee which it has constructed upon the right of way granted to it by plaintiff and the state of California. If any nuisance exists because of the maintenance and use of the same, it is not one that lies within the jurisdiction of the courts of the state of California to ascertain and abate. Such proceeding, if at all permissible, is one which must be presented in some court of the United States wherein plaintiff and the United States of America would be the parties plaintiff and defendant.

The control of the properties involved, the determination of the extent of any rights plaintiff may have therein, and the duties of the grantee thereof toward plaintiff are subjects not within the jurisdiction of the state courts of California to adjudge and determine, because of the right of way for the canal in question being the property of the United States, and no power was vested in the trial court to act otherwise than it did in sustaining the demurrers to the amended and supplemental complaint without leave to amend and entering judgment dismissing the action.

The judgment is affirmed.

GRANT v. MAIN OIL CO. OF CALIFORNIA.
(Civ. 5295.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 4, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚷843(3)—Error in admitting books in evidence in case based on open account and account stated need not be considered on appeal, where evidence sustained plaintiff's recovery without introduction of books.

In action to recover for services rendered defendant based on cause of action for reasonable value of services on open book account and on account stated and on express promise to pay for services, it was not necessary on appeal to pass on alleged error in admitting books of plaintiff's assignor, where evidence clearly established, without introduction of books, that plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

2. Appeal and error ⚷110, 782—Order denying motion for new trial is not appealable, and appeal must be dismissed.

Order denying motion for new trial is not an appealable order, and appeal therefrom must be dismissed.

3. Costs ⚷262—Testimony indicating defendant failed to pay amount sued for because of financial inability showed appeal for delay only subjecting defendant to pay damages.

Testimony by general manager of defendant company, sued for services rendered by plaintiff's assignor, indicating that amount due was not paid because of company's financial inability to pay bills, showed that appeal was taken for delay only, subjecting defendant to pay damages of $100.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action by Pauline Grant against the Main Oil Company of California. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jackson Mahon and H. Ray Bailey, both of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. This action was commenced to recover the sum of $1,925, alleged to be due for services rendered to defendant by plaintiff's assignor by hauling oil. Defendant appeals from a judgment rendered in plaintiff's favor and from an order denying a new trial. The complaint contains three counts; all of them covering the same transaction. In the first of these counts, all of which are in the usual form, a cause of action for the reasonable value of the services is set forth; in the second count plaintiff states causes of action on an open book account and on an account stated; and in the third count an express promise to pay for the hauling is set forth. The trial court found in favor of plaintiff on all of these causes of action.

Defendant now contends that at the commencement of the trial plaintiff elected to stand upon his cause of action based upon an account stated, and that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings that an account was in fact stated. The record does not disclose that plaintiff made such an election. We quote from the reporter's transcript:

> "Mr. Emmons: We don't intend to elect. We have three counts. We are going to put in evidence under the amended complaint.
> "Mr. Mahon: You state more than one cause of action, and they are incompatible.
> "Mr. Emmons: We refuse to elect. We offer the evidence if relevant and sufficient, the court will render judgment on the cause of action we establish.
> "The Court: Well, go ahead. (To Mr. Mahon) You have preserved your rights. Mr. Emmons proceeds at his peril."

The evidence was amply sufficient to establish all of the causes of action with the possible exception of that based upon an account stated. It would therefore be useless to discuss further the cause of action last mentioned.

[1] Counsel for plaintiff states that the "main ground" upon which he seeks a reversal of the judgment is the alleged error of the court in admitting in evidence the books of plaintiff's assignor. He points out that the party who made the book entries had no personal knowledge of the amount hauled, but received data on the subject from the report of the driver, who was a witness at the trial. It is not necessary to pass upon this point for the reason that the evidence clearly established, without the introduction of the books, that plaintiff was entitled to the judgment rendered. All the points necessary to be proved to support the findings on the first and third causes of action were covered by the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses. The defendant presented no evidence whatever in contradiction thereof. The general manager of the defendant company, called as a witness for plaintiff, not only gave testimony which made it clear that plaintiff should recover, but also made statements from which it is apparent that the defense presented in the trial court by the party against whom judgment was rendered and the subsequent appeal were interposed for the purpose of delay. The witness testified:

> "Q. Are you in position to say you don't owe this $1,925? A. No sir.
> "Q. What position did you have? A. General manager, that was my title. My duties were more those of a field superintendent.
> "Q. As I understand it, I want to get the record clear, it is more of a present inability to pay the bills than a desire not to pay them, isn't that the idea? A. Well, I can't pay.
> "Q. When the bills were presented to you, what did you do with them? A. I forwarded them down to the main office.
> "Q. That is the situation in regard to all of the bills rendered to you? A. Following our manner of doing business, I forwarded the bills to the office. The financial affairs of the company were arranged down there.
> "Q. Do you know any reason why the financial department didn't pay them? A. I presume they were short of money.
> "Q. You didn't know whether they were correct bills or not, or did you know? A. I knew the bills correctly represented the oil hauled on the tank account, by tank measure.
> "Q. Did you compare, when you received those bills that you received, the amount of the bill with the tag account at that time to see if it was correct? A. Yes, sir."

[2, 3] The appeal being devoid of merit, the judgment is affirmed. As the order denying the motion for a new trial is not an appealable order, the appeal from that order is dismissed. It appearing to the court that this appeal was taken for delay, it is further ordered that the appellant pay to respondent as damages the sum of $100, which amount shall be included in the costs to be allowed respondent on this appeal.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

WORKS, P. J. Defendant was convicted upon a criminal charge, and appeals from the judgment and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

The only point made by appellant is that the trial court erred in denying a motion to dismiss the information under which he was prosecuted, on the ground that it was not filed within 15 days after he was committed by the magistrate who conducted his preliminary examination. This exact question has been decided by us lately in the proceeding entitled Gillis v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 265 P. 360, the opinion in which has not yet become final. We there said:

> "Section 809 of the Penal Code reads as follows: 'When a defendant has been examined and committed, as provided in section 872 of this Code, it shall be the duty of the district attorney, within fifteen days thereafter, to file in the superior court of the county in which the offense is triable an information charging the defendant with such offenses. * * *'
> "The petitioner relies entirely upon the foregoing section, and subdivision 1 of section 1382 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows: 'When a person has been held to answer for a public offense, if an indictment is not found or an information filed against him, within thirty days thereafter,' the court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution dismissed. He cites Ex parte Fowler, 5 Cal. App. 549, 555, 90 P. 958, which refers to In re Begerow, 133 Cal. 349, 65 P. 828, 56 L. R. A. 513, 85 Am. St. Rep. 178; and in which former case it was stated that the superior court acquired no jurisdiction by the filing of an information more than thirty days after examination and commitment.
> "Although the language in Ex parte Fowler is not free from ambiguity, the net result of what is said is that subdivision 1 of section 1382 of the Penal Code is mandatory, and this holding is based upon the opinion in In re Begerow, where it is held that subdivision 2 of section 1382 is mandatory. Neither case passes upon the question here involved; that is, whether section 809 is to be regarded as mandatory. The latter section was amended in 1927, prior to which time the district attorney was required to file an information within 30 days after the defendant had been committed. Now, reading section 809 and subdivision 1 of section 1382 of the Penal Code together, we have this provision: That it is 'the duty of the district attorney' to file an information within 15 days after the defendant has been committed, and that if such information is not filed within 30 days after such commitment, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, the court must order the prosecution dismissed. As the law thus reads, it can hardly be doubted that the part contained in section 809 is directory; otherwise, section 1382 would also have been amended so as to provide for dismissal within 15 days after commitment if the information should not be filed within that time. It may be that but for an oversight the Legislature would have amended section 1382 so as to make it conform in this particular to section 809; but as to that matter we have no such evidence as would justify the court in digressing from the application of the usual rules of statutory interpretation. The principal reason to surmise that such an error might have occurred is that a clear intention is shown in a number of amendments to the Penal Code enacted concurrently with the amendment of 1927 to section 809 of the Penal Code, to compel more speed in the functioning of criminal procedure. However, it might also well be reasoned that the difference in the provisions of these two sections may have resulted from a deliberate purpose, for the Legislature may have been willing to aid in speeding up trials by making it the duty of the district attorney to file informations within a shorter time after commitment than before, and yet not have believed it wise to go so far in that regard as to compel the dismissal of a prosecution, and thus perhaps release a criminal, because the district attorney might have not proceeded as promptly as directed by section 809 of the Penal Code. However, it is certain that the mandate of the provisions of the Penal Code now under consideration is to be found in section 1382. The teeth of this law have been written into it, and by it 30 days are still permitted for filing an information after commitment and before the courts are commanded to dismiss the prosecution."

Nothing is presented by appellant in his brief which affects the conclusion reached by us in Gillis v. Superior Court.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Application by the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, for certiorari to annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Frank Pavlovich, in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act against Bartlett Hayward Company, employer, and petitioner as insurer. Writ denied.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Commission.

CONREY, P. J. Petitioner is the insurance carrier for Bartlett Hayward Company, employer of respondent Pavlovich. Petitioner seeks to obtain annullment of a compensation award to Pavlovich for injuries received by him, which injuries arose out of and in the course of his employment. The accident occurred on the 1st day of September, 1922. Thereafter, and without any application to have the claim adjusted by the Industrial Accident Commission, the insurance carrier paid compensation on an assumed basis of liability, for a period of 244 weeks, and then discontinued further payments. It is the contention of petitioner that Pavlovich was barred from filing any claim after 245 weeks from the date of the injury, that is to say, after the 14th day of May, 1927. His application for adjustment of claim was not filed with the commission until June 7, 1927.

The commission, after finding the facts concerning the accident and injury and the voluntary payments made as above stated, found that "the injury caused permanent disability which is a new and further disability, and this action is not therefore barred within 245 weeks from the date of the injury, compensation having been paid thereon."

[1] It is conceded that a permanent injury is a "new and further disability" within the provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act relating to new and further disability. Hutchinson Lumber Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 77 Cal. App. 141, 246 P. 118; General Accident, etc., Corporation v. Industrial Accident Commission, 77 Cal. App. 314, 246 P. 570. The following provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831) are pertinent to the question at issue:

> "Section 11 (c): The payment of compensation, or any part thereof, or agreement therefor, shall have the effect of extending the period within which proceedings for its collection may be commenced, six months from the date of the agreement or last payment of such compensation, or any part thereof, or the expiration of the period covered by any such payment; provided, however, that nothing contained in this section shall be construed to bar the right of any injured employee to institute proceedings for the collection of compensation within 245 weeks after the date of the injury upon the grounds that the original injury has caused new and further disability; and the jurisdiction of the commission, in such cases, shall be a continuing jurisdiction at all times within such period. * * *"
> "Section 11 (h): The running of the period of limitations prescribed by this section is an affirmative defense and operates to bar the remedy and not to extinguish the right of the employee. It may be waived, and failure to present such defense prior to the submission of the cause for decision shall be a sufficient waiver."

For a temporary disability the maximum period of allowance of an award is limited to 240 weeks from the date of the injury. For a 70 per cent. or greater than 70 per cent. permanent disability the award may be extended to the remainder of life of the injured employee. Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917, § 9 (b), (4), (5). The award made in this case is for the remainder of the life of the employee and on the basis of 100 per cent. disability.

The question to be determined arises on petitioner's contention that under section 11 (c) of the act a claim for new and further disability must in every case and under all circumstances be filed with the Industrial Accident Commission within 245 weeks from the date of the injury; and that the provisions of the statute which extend for six months the time for the filing of the application where the employer or insurance carrier has made voluntary payments do not apply in favor of an employee whose application for adjustment of compensation has not been filed within said period of 245 weeks.

The only direct authority in support of petitioner's contention on this point is Beverly v. Fairmont Hotel et al. (Cal. App.) 259 P. 955, wherein an order of the Industrial Accident Commission denying compensation was affirmed. It appeared in that case that the insurance carrier made voluntary payments of compensation to the employee for less than three months. Thereafter medical treatment was given to the employee at the instance of the paymaster of the employer (Fairmont Hotel), but not by the insurance carrier who was carrying the employer's insurance at the time of the accident. The application for adjustment of compensation was filed with the Industrial Accident Commission within six months after such medical treatment, but not until after the expiration of the period of 245 weeks from the date of the original injury. The decision of the commission, denying compensation, was held to be supported by testimony that the medical treatment which the employee received was not furnished at the instance of the Fairmont Hotel, but had been merely rendered by the physician as a personal favor to the paymaster. The opinion, however, further states that, even if the treatment was furnished by the Fairmont Hotel, the situation would not be altered, because (the applicant not being "totally disabled and bedridden as a result of his injury") the statute could not in any event be tolled beyond the 245 weeks' limitation fixed by section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917 for the continuation of jurisdiction of the commission. Counsel for respondent commission insists that the ruling last above mentioned is to be regarded as dictum and not necessary to the decision of that case. In this we think that counsel is correct. In view of the fact that, as it seems to us, the language of the cited decision was used in the course of its brief discussion of a point not necessarily involved, we feel at liberty to treat the question as open for further consideration and not yet governed by the authority of precedent.

[2] As we have seen by referring to section 11 (h), the running of the period of limitations prescribed by section 11 is an affirmative defense which may be waived. Voluntary compensation was paid to the employee Pavlovich not only for the period of 240 weeks within which compensation might have been awarded as for a temporary disability, but also for an additional period of four weeks for which payment could not have been compelled except on a basis of permanent disability. In other words, the voluntary payment as to those four weeks should be construed as constituting a voluntary payment of compensation as for permanent disability. Under these circumstances there should result and there reasonably does result, under the provisions of section 11 (c), an extension for six months from the last payment of such compensation, of the time within which application for adjustment of compensation might be made, even though said period of six months extended beyond the limit of 245 weeks from the date of the accident. This construction of the statute is in harmony with the provisions of the Constitution and of the statute, both of which seem to call for a liberal construction of the Compensation Act, "with the purpose of extending the benefits of the Act for the protection of persons injured in the course of their employment." Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917, § 69 (a); Bartlett Hayward Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com. (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 195.

[3, 4] Petitioner further contends that the award is void in this, that it provides for interest to be paid on the amounts awarded as upon a judgment. It is admitted by respondent that this part of the award is not authorized by law (Pacific Indemnity Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com. [Cal. Sup.] 261 P. 987), and counsel stipulates that the court may annul the same.

In accordance with the stipulation of counsel for respondent, that part of the order sought to be reviewed which provides for interest on the compensation awarded is annulled without the formal issuance of any writ of review herein. Subject only to the foregoing order concerning interest, it is further ordered that the petition for a writ of review be and the same hereby is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Wm. H. Ellis, Judge.

J. F. Dukes was convicted of a violation of Pen. Code, § 149, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. E. Thompson, of San Bernardino, and Geo. F. Lord, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Albert Ford, Dist. Atty., of Riverside, for the State.

CRAIG, J. The defendant, a deputy sheriff of Riverside county, was charged by information with a violation of section 149 of the Penal Code, committed as follows:

> "The said defendant on or about the 27th day of October, 1927, at the said county of Riverside, state of California, and before the filing of this information, did willfully and unlawfully, and under color of authority as deputy sheriff of Riverside county, and without any lawful necessity, assault and beat Walden E. Trimble, said defendant being then and there a duly appointed, qualified, and acting deputy sheriff of Riverside county, Cal."

He was tried, and found guilty as charged in the information.

Three grounds of appeal from the judgment are urged: First, that the court erred in excluding certain evidence; second, that the giving of instruction No. 8 was error; and, third, that the verdict and judgment are against the evidence, and that the verdict was the result of passion and prejudice.

[1-4] The last contention is not sufficiently meritorious to require extended consideration. An appellate court has nothing to do with the weighing of the evidence on appeal. All intendments favor upholding the judgment and the action of the trial court. The evidence is to be viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution. In the statement of facts contained in appellant's opening brief, much of the testimony of the witnesses Trimble and Roberts is ignored, apparently upon the theory that these witnesses were not worthy of belief. Having found the defendant guilty, it must be assumed that the jury believed such testimony as points to his guilt. That evidence is amply sufficient to sustain the verdict. Accepting it and disregarding that which contradicts it, the transcript shows that on October 27, 1927, Trimble was driving an automobile on the highway at a rate of speed in excess of that allowed by law; that the defendant and another officer followed him, and, when he slowed down back of a truck which interfered with his progress, the officers came alongside of his machine, stopped their own, and approached his car. Dukes then shouted to Trimble: "God damn you, get out of that car. Who do you think you are, that you can come down there like that?" Trimble started to get out, but Dukes took hold of him and dragged him out of the car, struck him in the face, then jerked his glasses off, threw them on the ground, and struck him in the face again. At this point Roberts, who had witnessed the affair, remonstrated with Dukes, who replied: "Who the hell are you? I have just arrested this man for coming down that hill at an excessive rate of speed." Trimble asked Dukes why he was arresting him, and Dukes responded, "For driving down that hill in the reckless manner you did." In arresting Trimble, Dukes did not give him a citation, as required by section 154 of the Automobile Act (Laws 1923, p. 566). It appears that later Trimble entered a plea of guilty to the charge of reckless driving, and was fined $100.

To be sure, the version of the entire occurrence as given by Dukes and his witnesses was far different from the above, but their testimony simply creates a conflict in the evidence.

[5] The defendant assails instruction No. 8, given by the court, as prejudicial and erroneous. It reads as follows:

> "You are instructed that, whenever a person is arrested for reckless driving or speeding or any other violation of the Motor Vehicle Act which does not amount to a felony, the person arrested has the right to an immediate appearance before a magistrate. If the person arrested does not demand an immediate appearance before a magistrate, the arresting officer must, upon production of the operator's license or other satisfactory evidence of identity, take the name and address of the person arrested and the number of his motor vehicle, and notify him in writing to appear at a time and place to be specified in such notice, before a magistrate of the township in which the offense is committed, or before a magistrate of the township in which is located the county seat of the county in which the offense is committed. The person arrested thereupon has the right to give his written promise to appear at the time and place stated, and it is thereupon the duty of the arresting officer to release him from custody.
> "If the person arrested refuses to give his written promise to appear, or demands an immediate appearance before a magistrate, he shall be taken forthwith before the magistrate of the township in which the offense is alleged to have been committed.
> "An arrest for a misdemeanor under the Motor Vehicle Act which is made, or attempted to be made, in violation of the above rules, is an illegal arrest, and the person sought to be arrested has the right to resist such unlawful arrest, and to use such force as may be necessary, short of killing the officer or doing him great bodily harm.
> "An officer making an arrest for a misdemeanor under the Motor Vehicle Act has no right to demand that the person arrested get out of his automobile and has no right to attempt to remove the person arrested from his automobile. If the officer attempts to forcibly remove the person arrested from his automobile it is an illegal act on the part of the officer, which may be lawfully resisted by the person arrested."

This instruction contained, in addition to other matter, a correct statement of the substance of the provision of the Motor Vehicle Act prescribing the duties of an officer in arresting for misdemeanor committed under it. First, complaint is made that this instruction raises issues not presented by the information in that the only irregularity charged against the defendant is assault in making an arrest. We do not consider that the instruction is susceptible to that criticism. It was necessary that the jury take into consideration all of the circumstances of the transaction to determine whether or not the assault charged had been committed. Even if the defendant used force against Trimble, it might well have been, under the defendant's own theory of the case, that no unlawful act was committed, for Trimble's conduct may have been such as to warrant the officer in using force. However, the decision of the question thus presented necessarily involves a consideration of the conduct of the officer prior to or at the same time that the purported resistance upon the part of Trimble was offered, for, if the officer exceeded his authority in the first instance, both by acts of commission and omission, in attempting to make this arrest, the citizen may have been within his rights in offering resistance, and, if so, the assault by the officer would not have been justified, but would have been unlawful. Hence it was proper to inform the jury as to how the law contemplates that an officer may proceed in making an arrest for the particular misdemeanor charged against Trimble. Appellant concedes that some force was used, and the question then is whether more force was used than was reasonably necessary. To determine that issue, the jury were entitled to know both the extent and nature of the authority of the officer in making such an arrest.

[6, 7] Counsel argue that by all that part of the instruction which tells the jury that in making an arrest for a misdemeanor under the Motor Vehicle Act, the officer has no right to demand that the person arrested get out of his automobile, the court in effect instructed the jury as to what verdict they must return, because, it is said, it was admitted that the defendant did require Trimble to get out of his car, and also that the arrest was for a misdemeanor under the Motor Vehicle Act. Merely because, in a given case, the jury follow the court's instructions, and apply them to the admitted facts, but one verdict can be returned, does not render the instruction objectionable as directing a verdict. It occasionally happens that under the law the defendant's testimony shows him to be guilty, notwithstanding the fact that he has entered a plea of not guilty. If there were no other facts or issues in this case than those above mentioned, to wit, that the arrest was for misdemeanor under the Motor Vehicle Act, and that the officer compelled the person arrested to get out of his car, the officer would undoubtedly have exceeded his authority, and his conduct would have been illegal. However, this would not convict him of the assault with which he is here charged. Again, the evidence presented other issues, for, as appellant elsewhere argues, the officer might have wished to search for, and remove, weapons from the person or from the car of the person being arrested, or to investigate concerning violations of the law prohibiting possession or transportation of liquor. These considerations might have justified the removal of Trimble from his car, even though making an arrest for misdemeanor under the Motor Vehicle Act would not have authorized such procedure. But the fallacy of appellant's argument appears when it is observed that the instruction did not pretend to tell the jury what the officers might or might not do if their purpose was to do any of these things. Doubtless, if appellant had requested an instruction covering such issues, the court would have given one making it plain that, although an officer could not legally make an arrest for the charge here referred to otherwise than as especially prescribed by the law stated by the court, nevertheless, that, if the jury believed that the officers, in compelling the defendant to get out of his car, intended to search for liquor or firearms illegally in his possession, then it would be for the jury to determine as to whether or not such compulsion on the part of the officers was reasonably necessary under the circumstances as they then existed. On the whole, we think the instruction was, in the main, properly phrased and given, and in no sense prejudicial to the defendant.

[8] The other particular in which the action of the trial court is claimed to have been erroneous is that correspondence between the attorney for the Automobile Club of Southern California and the manager of the club at Riverside, and between that attorney and Schwinn, an attorney at Riverside, should have been admitted in evidence. It appears that Trimble complained to the Automobile Club at Pasadena of his treatment by the defendant; that the representative of the club there took Trimble's statement, and said that he would forward it to counsel for the Automobile Club, which was done. Thereafter the last-named attorney took the matter up with the other persons above mentioned. The purpose of the offer of these communications was to show bias upon the part of Trimble, and thus to discredit his testimony. We think the objections were properly sustained, because it was not shown that Trimble authorized them, or knew that they had been written. The mere fact that the action of counsel may have been calculated to be of advantage to the witness does not show bias or motive for the latter to give his testimony, unless it be shown that he expressly authorized, or at least was aware of, what the attorney had written. On this principle, evidence was held properly excluded in People v. Vickroy, 41 Cal. App. 275, 182 P. 764.

The notice of appeal states that the defendant, in addition to appealing from the judgment and sentence, appeals from the order of the court denying the defendant "his constitutional right of bail pending appeal." We find nothing in the record to show that the defendant applied for bail; hence this point need not be given consideration.

PEOPLE v. HAFLINGER. (Cr. 1617.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 13, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑516—Statement of defendant charged with stealing automobile that confederates had advised getting a car to pay traffic fine held admission and not "confession."

In prosecution for theft of automobile, statement by defendant to police officer that defendant's confederates had advised him to get a car so as to make some money to pay fine for traffic violation held to be an admission and not a "confession" that he had in fact stolen the automobile and was admissible; a "confession" being a statement by a person to the effect that he is guilty of the crime of which he is accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Confession.]

2. Criminal law 🔑753(2)—Motion for instructed verdict for accused is within trial court's discretion, and refusal is not reversible, if evidence sustains verdict of guilty (Pen. Code, § 1118).

Under Pen. Code, § 1118, a motion for what is often termed an "instructed verdict" is one directed to the discretion of the trial court, and, if there is sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict, accused cannot base petition for reversal on action of trial court in refusing to advise jury to acquit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William T. Aggeler, Judge.

Wilfred Haflinger was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Hugh Dickson, Ben S. Hunter, and James Farraher, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Defendant was accused of the crime of grand theft, and, after trial by jury, was found guilty. On October 30, 1927, J. M. Brouillard left his Chevrolet touring car parked on Brand boulevard, in the city of Glendale. Later in the same day defendant and two others were arrested while driving the car in the city of Beverly Hills. Chief of Police Blair of Beverly Hills, after laying the foundation customary for the admission of confessions, testified that he had a conversation with Haflinger in which the latter confessed that he had stolen the automobile. The witness testified:

> "He stated that he and Ball had stolen the car and had come out to Beverly Hills with the intention of trying to stick somebody up, and I asked him why they particularly came to Beverly Hills, and he said because there was a lot of rich people lived there. And that was about the amount of the conversation with him. He stated also that this little follow had told him—
> "Q. By the small man you mean the defendant Ball? A. Yes. That they had pulled a job like this before somewhere in Pasadena and got a dollar and a half."

The foregoing testimony was received by the court without objection by appellant, and no motion was at any time made to strike it out. The prosecution attempted to introduce in evidence an alleged confession claimed to have been made to F. C. Williams of the Glendale police department after appellant had been removed from Beverly Hills. Upon objection by counsel for appellant, the court permitted testimony to be taken on the question whether the alleged confession was made freely and voluntarily. The court, after hearing such testimony, sustained appellant's objection to the admission of evidence purporting to show a confession by Haflinger. The court did permit, however, the following statement by the witness to remain in the record:

> "I asked him (Haflinger) why—who had proposed the stealing of the car, and he said that he got a ticket—traffic ticket in Glendale, and Russell and Ball told him that it would cost him $15, and they had better go out and get a car that they could make some money out of."

Appellant now contends that the ruling of the trial court refusing to strike this testimony was erroneous.

[1] Respondent concedes that, if the statement of the witness just quoted was a confession, in accordance with the ruling of the trial court to the effect that it was not free and voluntary, the motion to strike should have been granted. It is contended, however, that the statement contained nothing more than an admission which tended toward the proof of the guilt of the accused, and as such was admissible without preliminary proof to show that it was free and voluntary. This contention must be upheld. A confession is a statement by a person to the effect that he is guilty of the crime of which he is accused. While it may be said that the statement tends to prove guilt, it is in effect an admission that he had been told he would have to pay a traffic fine of $15, and had been advised by others to "get a car that they could make some money out of." This falls short of confessing that he had in fact stolen the automobile. In People v. Ferdinand, 194 Cal. 555, 229 P. 341, the court clearly indicated the difference between an admission and a confession in the following language:

> "An admission as applied to criminal law is something less than a confession, and is but an acknowledgment of some fact or circumstance which in itself is insufficient to authorize a conviction, and which tends only toward the proof of the ultimate fact of guilt. On the other hand, a confession by a defendant leaves nothing to be determined, in that it is a declaration of his intentional participation in a criminal act, and must be a statement of such a nature that no other inference than the guilt of the defendant may be drawn therefrom."

[2] Appellant devotes the remaining portion of his brief to an argument which he presents under the heading, "The court should have granted motion for instructed verdict." The evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury. The corpus delicti was established by the testimony of the owner of the car, and the confession of appellant made to the witness Blair was properly received without objection. A motion for what is often termed an "instructed verdict" is one directed to the discretion of the trial court, unless the evidence presented is not legally sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty. Section 1118 of the Penal Code provides that the court may advise the jury to acquit, if the court deems the evidence insufficient to warrant a conviction. The section further provides that the jury are not bound by the advice of the court. It follows that, if there is sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict, appellant cannot successfully base his petition for a reversal upon the action of the trial court in refusing to advise the jury to acquit.

The judgment is affirmed.

DEAKINS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5999.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 4, 1928.

1. Courts ⚷489(3)—State court held to have jurisdiction of action between owners of unpatented invention, notwithstanding that "questions" might arise under patent laws; "cases" (28 USCA § 371).

State court held to have jurisdiction of action between owners of unpatented invention in which accounting was asked, notwithstanding that questions might arise under patent laws, since, under 28 USCA § 371, federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction of "cases" arising under patent laws, and there is distinction between "cases" and "questions."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Case (In Practice); Question.]

2. Removal of causes ⚷17—Defendant filing counterclaim in action involving rights to unpatented invention held to deprive itself of right to remove.

In action in state court between owners of unpatented invention, defendant by filing cross-complaint in which he sought cancellation of contract under which plaintiff claimed held to invoke jurisdiction of court and thereby deprive himself of right to remove case to federal court.

Application for writ of mandate by Grover C. Deakins, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Hugh J. Crawford, Judge. Writ granted.

Leonard Evans, of Anaheim, and Ford W. Harris and Herbert A. Huebner, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and Gordon Boller, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, J. This is an original proceeding to compel the respondent court to proceed to trial in the case of Grover C. Deakins v. Leland S. Hamer. The material facts are: Plaintiff filed a complaint in the superior court wherein he alleged that he and the defendant were the owners of a certain invention and device known as a joint breaker and tong puller; that on November 10, 1921, they entered into a contract with one Wilcox by which Wilcox was to manufacture one complete device and working model for demonstration purposes and to pay for an application for patent thereon which all three of the parties were to jointly make; that by the same contract it was agreed that each of the parties should own a one-third interest in the invention or any improvement which might be made by any of them, and that any net income which might be derived by the parties or any of them, as the result of the manufacture or sale of the invention or any improvement thereon, should inure to the joint benefit of the parties in equal shares, and that each of the three should be entitled to an accounting thereof. It is further alleged that subsequent to the execution of this contract Wilcox surrendered and released to plaintiff all of his interest in the agreement. There also follow allegations that the defendant has engaged in the business of manufacturing the device and has contracted for the manufacture thereof and has earned a considerable profit but has refused to account or pay to the plaintiff any portion thereof. Plaintiff asks for an accounting. The defendant filed his answer, in which in general effect he said that he had first conceived the device and that upon the promises of the plaintiff to furnish a portion of the money to develop the idea and perfect a working model he entered into the contract, but that plaintiff failed and refused to advance any money for that purpose; that on account of plaintiff's failure to provide any funds they had agreed to and did rescind the contract; that the device for the manufacture of which defendant had contracted is a device conceived subsequent to the time the contract was entered into and not the one covered by the agreement. By cross-complaint the defendant also sought to have the contract declared canceled on the ground that it had been abandoned and rescinded by the parties.

[1] When the case was called for trial the respondent judge, without a petition for removal, made an order removing the cause to the District Court of the United States.

Under this situation we are confronted by the question of whether the state courts have jurisdiction to entertain the action. It is provided that the jurisdiction of the United States courts "shall be exclusive of the courts of the several states: * * * Of all cases arising under the patent-right, or copyright laws of the United States." Barnes' Federal Code, § 1021 (28 USCA § 371). The construction and interpretation of this provision, at least so far as general rules thereunder are concerned, is remarkably free of confusion. One of the most exact and most explicit statements with which the great majority of the authorities are in agreement is found in the case of Pratt v. Paris Gaslight & Coke Co., 168 U. S. 255, 18 S. Ct. 62, 42 L. Ed. 458. That action was one in assumpsit to recover the purchase price of a device for the manufacture of water gas. The defendant pleaded a written contract by which plaintiffs agreed to hold defendant harmless from any claims of infringement, and also pleaded that plaintiffs' patents were void and an infringement upon certain other patents. The court says:

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

> "The action under consideration is not one arising under the patent-right laws of the United States in any proper sense of the term. To constitute such a cause the plaintiff must set up some right, title, or interest under the patent laws, or at least make it appear that some right or privilege will be defeated by one construction, or sustained by the opposite construction, of these laws. Starin v. New York, 115 U. S. 248 (6 S. Ct. 28) 29 L. Ed. 388; Germania Ins. Co. v. Wisconsin, 119 U. S. 473 (7 S. Ct. 260) 30 L. Ed. 461.
> "The state court had jurisdiction both of the parties and the subject-matter as set forth in the declaration, and it could not be ousted of such jurisdiction by the fact that, incidentally to one of these defenses, the defendant claimed the invalidity of a certain patent. To hold that it has no right to introduce evidence upon this subject is to do it a wrong and deny it a remedy. Section 711 [Rev. St. U. S. (28 USCA § 371)] does not deprive the state courts of the power to determine questions arising under the patent laws, but only of assuming jurisdiction of 'cases' arising under those laws. There is a clear distinction between a case and a question arising under the patent laws. The former arises when the plaintiff in his opening pleading—be it a bill, complaint, or declaration—sets up a right under the patent laws as ground for a recovery. Of such the state courts have no jurisdiction. The latter may appear in the plea or answer or in the testimony. The determination of such question is not beyond the competency of the state tribunals."

Applying the test just quoted the question is framed: Did the plaintiff in this action set "up a right under the patent laws as ground for a recovery?" The answer must be in the negative. He based his right to an accounting in this instance upon a contractual relation which he says the defendant failed to observe. The contract in fact recites that the device was not patented and provides ways and means by which the parties shall proceed to protect it by patent. If the plaintiff is entitled to recover it is by virtue of the contract which he pleads.

Reference should also be had to the case of Lowry v. Hert (C. C. A.) 290 F. 876, which was an action in which the plaintiff alleged that by means of fraud and misrepresentation the defendant had induced the plaintiff to assign his interest in certain patents and also in capital stock of a company interested in exploiting the patents, and sought to have the assignments declared void and a decree establishing that plaintiff was the owner of the patents, and for damages to compensate for the loss of the use of the patents, including "large sums in the form of royalties and license fees," and an accounting of the stock and its dividends. This case was removed by the state court to the United States District Court and there tried. It was determined by the Circuit Court of Appeals that the District Court never acquired jurisdiction of the cause, and the high court remanded it to the District Court, with instructions to remand it to the state court. The general rules are there announced as follows:

> "* * * That, if the case is brought either to enforce or to set aside a contract, federal jurisdiction is not found in the mere fact that the contract relates to patents, while, if the suit is one for infringement of a patent, federal jurisdiction is not necessarily lacking either because the answer sets up, or because the complaint anticipates and avoids, a defense based on contract."

It is clear from these authorities and those therein cited, as well as on principle, that the complaint in this cause was framed so as to give jurisdiction to the state courts and not to the federal courts.

[2] There is an additional reason why at the instance of defendant in this action the suit could not be removed, although it must be noted that defendant did not seek its removal, but rather moved for a dismissal on the ground that the superior court had no jurisdiction. Had the defendant filed a petition for removal a further or other question might have arisen. However, in the recital of facts we mentioned that defendant filed a cross-complaint in which he sought to have canceled the contract which is made the basis of the complaint of plaintiff. It is obvious from the discussion so far had that the United States courts would have no jurisdiction over an action to cancel this character of contract. And as is said in the case of Hansen v. Pacific Coast Asphalt Cement Co., (D. C.) 243 F. 283: "By filing this cross-complaint, the defendant became a plaintiff, and invoked the jurisdiction of the court, and thereby deprived itself of the right to remove." Counsel has argued that there is a conflict of authority upon this point, but we think the conflict arises rather in those cases where the cross-defendant seeks to have the cause removed when for the first time a federal question is raised by the cross-complaint. Many of the authorities which deny the cross-defendant the right to remove, ground their reason in the fact that he, in the first instance, invoked the jurisdiction of the court.

It is apparent from the discussion that the cause was improperly removed.

The peremptory writ will issue.

MITCHELL v. GOULD. (Civ. 5139.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 5, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 31, 1928.

1. Evidence 🔑413—In action for broker's commissions, evidence showing broker's disregard of instruction to lease for short term held not inadmissible as varying written agreement (Civ. Code, § 1625).

In action on notes representing broker's commission, defendant's evidence showing that broker induced prospective tenant to hold out for long-term lease against defendant's instructions to lease for short term held not inadmissible as varying terms of written agreement contrary to Civ. Code, § 1625.

2. Brokers 🔑65(1)—Broker must use best efforts to further principal's interest.

It is duty of broker to act in good faith and put forth best efforts to further principal's interest, and, by failure to do so, he forfeits right to commission.

3. Brokers 🔑86(7)—Evidence showing broker's disregard of principal's instruction to lease for short term held to establish bad faith.

Evidence in action for broker's commission that broker induced prospective tenant to hold out for long-term lease after principal had instructed him to lease for short term held to establish bad faith on part of broker.

4. Brokers 🔑34—Broker advising prospective lessee to insist on longer lease after principal's instruction to lease for shortest period obtainable is liable to principal for damages.

Broker, employed to lease property for shortest period obtainable, who in bad faith and in interest of another than principal advises prospective lessee to insist on longer lease and one less advantageous to principal, is liable to principal for damages.

5. Brokers 🔑85(1)—Testimony of rental value at time of trial held inadmissible to support counterclaim against broker for disregard of instruction to lease for short period.

In broker's action for commission, oral testimony as to rental value of leased property at time of trial held inadmissible in support of defendant's counterclaim for damages for broker's disregard of instructions to lease for shortest period obtainable.

6. Brokers 🔑38(7)—Measure of damages for broker's disregard of instruction in securing lease is difference between value of lease obtained and value of lease which would have been obtained except for broker's conduct.

Where broker induced prospective lessee to hold out for longer term after principal's instruction to lease for shortest period obtainable, measure of damages due principal is difference between value of lease actually obtained at time of execution and value of lease which would have been obtained had it not been for wrongful conduct of broker.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Action by R. C. Mitchell against Dave H. Gould, in which Harry E. Mitchell, executor of the estate of R. C. Mitchell, was substituted as plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Bearman & Engelhardt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hazlett & Albee, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice, pro tem. This action was commenced by R. C. Mitchell to enforce the payment of five prommissory notes executed by the defendant to plaintiff on March 3, 1921, each being in the sum of $500. After the trial of the action, R. C. Mitchell died, and Harry E. Mitchell was appointed executor of his estate and substituted as plaintiff herein. The notes were given as evidence of an indebtedness growing out of a transaction in which it is alleged that R. C. Mitchell earned a commission as broker in procuring a subtenant for defendant for a portion of the ground floor of the Brack Shops building in the City of Los Angeles; the defendant holding a lease upon said premises consisting of an unexpired term of fourteen years and five months. The written authorization under which the broker rendered services to defendant is in the following words:

"For and in consideration of your services, I hereby appoint you my exclusive agent for a period of thirty days from the date hereof, to procure a tenant for the premises known as the California Store, ground floor Brack Shops building, approximately 35x108 feet, with basement and mezzanine, on the following terms and conditions: Lease to cover a period of seven years and ——— months, commencing 30 days (thirty days) after signing of lease. The lease to include the use of the front as is, together with the fixtures as is installed throughout the store, and all other privileges enjoyed by me which are furnished by the owners of the property. The monthly rental shall be a flat rate of $2,500 for the full term of the lease. Should you procure a tenant who accepts the premises herein described, in accordance with the foregoing terms and conditions, or any other terms accepted by me, I hereby agree to pay you a commission at the regular rate authorized by the Los Angeles Realty Board, now in effect, said commission due and payable at time of said acceptance, and authorize you to notify your client of my acceptance upon your receiving a written offer from him in conformity with the above. I agree to place with your firm any insurance carried on these premises during the life of this lease. I have read the aforegoing and fully understand the terms and conditions."

[1] After making certain denials, the defendant interposed what he denominates both a defense and a counterclaim. He alleges, in substance, that at the time he employed Mitchell to lease the premises and before a tenant was otained, he stated to Mitchell that he did not want to make a lease for a longer period than seven years; that Mitchell did obtain a tenant, one Beckman, who was willing to lease the premises for a term of ten years and had actually made a deposit for such a lease, but that Mitchell advised the said Beckman that he could obtain a lease for fourteen years and five months, and thereupon, by reason of such advise from Mitchell, the said Beckman withdrew his offer and insisted upon a lease for the full term of defendant's lease (that is, fourteen years and five months); that defendant, at the time he executed the lease with Beckman, did not know that Beckman had been advised by Mitchell that the longer term lease was available. At the trial, plaintiff offered the notes in evidence and rested. Thereupon the plaintiff objected to the introduction of any evidence in support of the defense above outlined, on the ground that such matter did not constitute a valid defense. Although the court overruled the objection, a motion to strike out all of defendant's evidence was later granted. This ruling was erroneous.

Ben Beckman, the subtenant obtained by Mitchell, testified that he was willing to enter into a lease for ten years, but that he learned in Mitchell's office that the lease could be obtained for approximately fifteen years, whereupon he withdrew his offer to lease for ten years. He had not learned anything about the fifteen years' lease until his visit to Mitchell's office. The defendant testified that he informed Mitchell's representative that he "did not want to lease it for any long time," and that he "told him to rent it for a term of between five and seven years." He further testified:

> "And isn't it true you told Mr. Bridwell, or whoever it was that brought that offer of Beckman's to you, that you would not rent for longer than nine years and five months? A. I told him after he said it would be hard to rent. He said, 'We can't rent it for any five or seven years, but we have got a tenant for around ten years,' and then I told him, 'All right;' that I was willing to go—'if you can't do anything else, I am willing to go for nine years and several months.' * * *
> "Q. And then the lease was closed for fifteen years? A. No; not after a long while. I didn't care to go through for any such term. The proposition was made with Mr. Beckman for ten years, changed from seven to ten, and Mr. Beckman had executed a check with a signed letter accepting it for ten years at the rental at that time, when we were supposed to meet the next day to get together on the lease. The next day I had a telephone call from Mr. Mitchell's office that Mr. Beckman would not come through, would not take it for no ten years. He had withdrawn his first offer, and he wanted the full term.
> "Q. Continue with that conversation you had with Mr. Bridwell over the telephone. A. Mr. Bridwell said he was a desirable tenant, and he said Mr. Beckman would not take it for no ten years, he wanted the full term, which I can't explain just the details of it, however, they got me to it, and I thought the best way out of it was to get rid of it, and I said all right, and I consented. * * *
> "Q. And, when the offer was brought to you, you accepted the offer, did you? A. I did, after it was explained there was no way out of it."

The witness stated that he did not learn that Mitchell had informed Beckman of the possibility of obtaining the fifteen years' lease until after the lease had been executed and part of the commission paid. On cross-examination, it was brought out that he was told in Beckman's office "that Mitchell was the one that told him (Beckman) he could have the fifteen years and he had better stand pat on the fifteen years."

In support of the ruling of the trial court striking out the foregoing evidence, counsel for plaintiff argues that defendant was attempting to vary the terms of a written agreement, contrary to the provisions of section 1625, Civil Code. With this contention we cannot agree. Defendant agreed to pay the commission if a tenant should be found for a period of seven years or on "any other terms accepted by me." Both parties agree that a tenant was in fact found, on terms "accepted" by the defendant. The evidence introduced by defendant did not vary or attempt to vary any of the provisions of the agreement. Defendant did not attempt to prove that the contract was other than what it purported to be on its face, nor did he attempt to prove that he had not agreed to pay the regular Los Angeles Realty Board commission if Mitchell obtained a tenant for a term longer than the seven years specified in the written listing.

[2, 3] It was the duty of Mitchell, as broker, to act in good faith and put forth his best efforts to further his principal's interests. If he failed in this regard, he forfeited his right to a commission. His instructions were to find a tenant for a short period, from five to seven years, and, in fact, he did find one for ten years. The principal urged him to secure a short lease, but, according to the evidence stricken out, he informed the prospective tenant that a fifteen years' lease could be obtained, whereupon the tenant refused to enter into a ten years' lease. This testimony stood uncontradicted at the close of defendant's evidence, and, if true, established bad faith on the part of the broker. There is a very good reason for the rule requiring the exercise of good faith on the part of a broker in transactions of this kind. The principal engages a broker to secure a tenant on the best terms obtainable, in this case for a short period. He depends upon the efforts of the broker to secure a tenant. The opportunity might readily be presented to the broker to act in the interests of the tenant and against those of his principal. In the present case it was largely to the financial interest of the broker to make the longest lease possible, rather than the shortest, since his commission manifestly would be larger in amount in proportion to the length of the lease.

In Harvey v. Lindsay, 117 Mich. 267, 75 N. W. 627, the plaintiff was suing for a commission alleged to have been earned as a real estate broker. The following instruction of the trial court was approved:

> "If Mr. Gamble gave Mr. Leathers such information or made to him such statements as to cause Mr. Leathers to become satisfied that the defendants would not insist upon the price asked, and that he could press them into accepting a substantially less price for the pine, Mr. Gamble was guilty of bad faith towards the defendants and his assignee, and the plaintiff, Mr. Harvey, would not be entitled to recover any compensation for what he may have done in connection with the deal with Mr. Leathers."

In Wiggins v. Wilson, 55 Fla. 346, 45 So. 1011, the court says:

> "If they knew or thought that this alleged customer of theirs had the ability and was ready and willing to purchase the property at the price and on the terms that they were authorized to sell it, it was their duty to promptly notify their principal of such fact. Then, after receiving such notice, if the principal sold to such customer at a less price and on different terms than those given to the plaintiffs, they would be entitled to their commissions. But if the plaintiffs knew of the customer's ability, readiness, and willingness to take the property at the price and on the terms named in their contract of employment, and withheld such knowledge from their principal, it amounted to bad faith with their principal, which forfeits their right to any commissions out of a sale effected by the principal in ignorance of such facts."

In Alford v. Creagh, 7 Ala. App. 358, 62 So. 254, the court lays down these rules:

> 'The law requires that a real estate agent, employed to sell land, must act in entire good faith and in the interest of his employer. Henderson v. Vincent, 84 Ala. 101, 4 So. 180. To this end he must exact from the purchaser the price, the terms, and conditions of sale which his employer has fixed. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) p. 902. If he fails to do this, but induces the prospective purchaser to believe that the property can be bought for less, he fails to discharge that duty to his principal that good faith demands. Such conduct on the broker's part is well calculated to lead the purchaser to stand out and thereby either force from the seller a lower price than that fixed or delay the sale, even if he finally buys at the price fixed, both detrimental to the interest of the seller. * * * The real estate agent loses his right to commissions where, in his dealings in reference to the subject-matter of his employment, he is guilty of either fraud or bad faith towards his employer. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) p. 921."

[4] In his counterclaim, defendant prayed for damages alleged to have been occasioned by Mitchell in advising Beckman to insist upon the longer lease and by his failure to close the deal for the period of ten years. A broker who is employed to lease property upon the best terms possible, or for the shortest period obtainable, and who in bad faith and in the interest either of himself or any one other than his principal, not only fails to bring about the execution of the lease on the terms which are available and which are most advantageous to his principal, but also advises the prospective lessee to insist upon a longer lease and one less advantageous to his principal, is liable to his principal for damages. In 9 Corpus Jurisprudence, 537, it is said:

> "If a broker employed to sell property understates to the principal the best price obtainable, the principal may recover from him the difference between that obtained and that which might have been obtained."

See Brown v. Carpenter, 142 Ky. 676, 134 S. W. 1150; Holmes v. Cathcart, 88 Minn. 213, 92 N. W. 956, 60 L. R. A. 734, 97 Am. St. Rep. 513; Durand v. Preston, 26 S. D. 222, 128 N. W. 129.

[5, 6] In support of his counterclaim, counsel for defendant sought to establish by oral testimony the rental value of the leased property at the time of the trial. An objection to this testimony was made and sustained by the court. This ruling was correct. In such cases the measure of damages is the difference between the value of the lease actually obtained at the time of its execution and the value of the lease which would have been obtained had it not been for the wrongful conduct of the broker.

The judgment is reversed.

REES v. VIEIRA et ux. (Civ. 3463.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 5, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⟹544(2)—On appeal on judgment roll, failure to make finding on plea of limitations held not available as ground for reversal (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1).

In suit on note and to foreclose mortgage, on appeal on judgment roll, failure to make finding on plea that cause of action was barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, is not available.

2. Mortgages ⟹481—Finding that all allegations in complaint were true held to support judgment on note and foreclosing mortgage.

In suit on note and to foreclose mortgage, general finding that all allegations in complaint were true held to support judgment on note and foreclosing mortgage.

3. Appeal and error ⟹907(3)—On appeal on judgment roll from judgment foreclosing mortgage but failing to make finding as to plea of limitations, presumption is that no evidence was introduced on such issue (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1).

In suit on note and to foreclose mortgage, where some of parties pleaded limitations under Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, on appeal from judgment for plaintiff on judgment roll alone, record is silent as to whether any evidence was offered on defense of limitations, and presumption is that no evidence was introduced on such issue and that no finding thereon was required.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Edith L. Rees against W. S. Vieira and wife and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. A. Gabriel, of San Jose, and C. W. White, of Hayward, for appellants.

C. B. Sessions and David K. Watkins, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, Acting P. J. Plaintiff brought this suit to enforce the payment of a promissory note for the sum of $7,850, executed jointly by Eugene Joseph Wiegand and his wife, Mary Agnes Wiegand, in favor of Irrigosa Land Company, and, to that end, to obtain a decree foreclosing a mortgage at the same time given by the makers of said note on a tract of land, situate in Madera county, and containing 123½ acres, to secure the satisfaction of said obligation. The case was tried on the complaint and the amended answer thereto. The action was dismissed as to certain of the defendants, some of whom were fictitiously named in the complaint. Upon general findings in favor of the plaintiff, judgment was entered against the remaining defendants, W. S. Vieira, A. Manaschian, Paul C. Manoogian, and K. P. Michaelian, for the principal sum, $7,850, together with accrued interest in the sum of $1,442.50 on the principal sum, the two aggregating, in amount, the sum of $9,292.50, and also foreclosing the said mortgage and ordering the sale of the mortgaged property.

This appeal is by the defendants W. S. Vieira and his wife, Mamie A. Vieira, from the judgment, on the judgment roll alone.

The note in suit and the mortgage given to secure the same were, as is usual in such cases, simultaneously executed in favor of and delivered to Irrigosa Land Company, a corporation, by Eugene Joseph Wiegand and his wife, Mary Agnes Wiegand, for the sum of $7,850. The instruments were dated April 3, 1919, and the note was to mature and become payable on or before the 1st day of October, 1920. The real property upon which the mortgage was given was, at the time of the execution and delivery thereof, as indicated, owned in fee simple by said Wiegand and his said wife. On or about February 10, 1920, said Irrigosa Land Company assigned and transferred said promissory note and said mortgage to the plaintiff herein, and the complaint alleges that "plaintiff ever since has been and is now the lawful owner and holder of said promissory note and said mortgage."

On the 6th day of April, 1920, the defendant W. S. Vieira succeeded by purchase to the title and interest of said Wiegand in and to the mortgaged land, subject to said note and mortgage, and assumed and agreed to pay said note and so satisfy or discharge said mortgage.

In view of the conclusion at which we have been required by the record to arrive relative to this appeal, it is unnecessary to recount herein in detail other transactions relating to said land following that of the acquisition thereof by Vieira and others. It is sufficient to explain generally that the complaint states that Vieira and one Titman and his wife entered into a contract whereby the latter, upon certain specified conditions, and subject to the note and the mortgage in suit, purchased said land; that subsequently said Titman and wife sold and assigned said contract to A. Manaschian and several other Armenians, who became thereby the joint owners of said contract. This transaction was, of course, subject to all the conditions set forth in said contract as it was originally framed and executed by the Titmans and Vieira, one of which conditions was that the sale was to be and was subject to the note and the mortgage which constitute the subject-matter of this action; that said Manaschian and his associates, on purchasing said contract, procured from the plaintiff an extension of time for the payment of said note to October 1, 1922; that, in the month of September, 1922, said Manaschian and associates secured from the plaintiff a further extension of the time for the payment of said note from October 1, 1922, to October 1, 1924.

The defendant Vieira and wife demurred to the complaint on the general ground and also set up as a further ground of demurrer the claim that the cause of action set forth in the complaint was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer was, however, subsequently withdrawn upon the stipulation of the parties, and thereafter the defendants answered, admitting certain and denying other material allegations of the complaint, and also setting up the plea of the statute of limitations as a bar to the cause of action stated in the complaint.

The trial court, as above stated, found generally that the facts pleaded in the complaint were true, but failed to make a finding on the special plea in bar set up by the defendants, the Vieiras. This omission in the decision furnishes the ground for the single point upon which the appealing defendants urge a reversal of the judgment.

[1] It is obvious that, upon the record before us, consisting, as it does, entirely of the judgment roll, the point made by the appealing defendants, as above indicated, is not available as a ground for reversal.

[2] The defendants first contend that the judgment is without validity because the findings are not in form legally sufficient, in that the mere general finding, as in that form of language the court in this case did find, "that all the allegations in plaintiff's complaint contained are true," does not legally measure up to a decision of the questions of fact which will support a judgment. The contention is devoid of merit. The cases of Johnson v. Squires, 55 Cal. 103, and Krug v. F. A. Lux Brewing Company, 129 Cal. 322, 61 P. 1125, cited as in support of the point so urged, involve entirely different situations from that of the case here. The first-named case involved a contest between two conflicting claimants to the right to purchase state land; the contest having been referred as is required in such cases, to the nisi prius court for trial. The case, after decision by the state district court, was appealed to the Supreme Court, and, in its decision reversing the judgment, the latter court said that, since the Constitution (article 17, § 3) declares that "lands belonging to this state, which are suitable for cultivation, shall be granted only to actual settlers," the "facts as to the possession of the respective parties must be 'found' in all contested cases like the present." It will be perceived that the very nature of such an action would of necessity require the finding of the facts necessary to determine which of the parties is "the actual settler." In the other case mentioned (Krug v. Brewing Co.), the only findings were:

> "That all the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint in said action are true. That all the allegations of defendant's answer in said action, so far as they are inconsistent with the allegations of said complaint, are not true."

The court, with eminent propriety, held that findings so framed and phrased were insufficient, saying that they "leave entirely undecided what allegations of the answer are inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint," citing a number of other California cases. In that same case, though, the court said that a finding that "all the allegations of the complaint are true and all the averments of the answer are untrue" is sufficient.

[3] To the contention that the effect of the failure to find upon the special plea in bar of the action is to vitiate the force of the judgment, the ready answer is that, this being an appeal upon the judgment roll alone, the record is silent as to whether any evidence was offered and received to support that plea or affirmative defense, and that, in such a situation, the presumption is that no evidence was introduced upon that issue or defense, and that therefore no finding thereon was required.

"A failure to find upon some issue, a finding upon which would merely have the effect of invalidating a judgment fully supported by the findings made, will not be held ground for reversal, unless it is shown by statement or bill of exceptions that evidence was submitted in relation to such issue." Syllabus in Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 P. 504. To the same effect are Mohr v. North Rawhide Min. & Devel. Co., 177 Cal. 264, 265, 170 P. 600; Roberts v. Hall, 147 Cal. 434, 439, 82 P. 66; Haun v. Rosenmayer, 46 Cal. App. 353, 357, 189 P. 117. There are numerous other cases which likewise hold, but the rule stated is so definitely settled and so familiar to the profession that it would be wholly supererogatory to name them herein.

There is nothing in the cases to which attention is called by counsel for defendants which is at variance with the conclusions above announced upon the record now before us.

The complaint in this action unquestionably (and in effect confessedly) states a cause of action for the relief sought, and, since (as has been shown) the court found that all the allegations of the complaint are true, it of necessity follows that the findings fully support the judgment in all essential particulars.

The judgment is affirmed.

TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. et al. v. RITCHARDSON et al. (Civ. 6185.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 4, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 31, 1928.

1. Covenants ⟹114(2)—Complaint for breach of building restriction held to state cause of action in plaintiff by recital of deed made part of complaint by reference declaring restrictions to be for benefit of all lots of tract.

Though complaint for breach of building restrictions of deed does not allege restrictions were for benefit of all the lots of the tract, it states a cause of action for plaintiff owner of one of such lots by recital of deed constituting exhibit and made part of complaint by reference deed reciting that the restrictions are for the benefit of each and every lot of the tract.

2. Appeal and error ⟹877(6)—Giving right of re-entry to both plaintiffs instead of one held harmless to defendant.

If judgment for breach of building restriction gave right of re-entry to both plaintiffs, instead of the one to whom the property would revert, it would be harmless to defendant.

3. Covenants ⟹79(3)—Restrictions in deeds of lots in tract held enforceable by one grantee against another grantee of common grantor.

Where owner of tract makes deeds of different parts of it to different persons, each deed containing the same restrictions as to use of the land, which are imposed as part of a general plan for benefit of the tract and the several lots or portions thereof, the restrictions not only impose a liability on each grantee to the grantor, but give a grantee an equitable right to enforce the restrictions against another grantee.

4. Injunction ⟹62(1)—Use of property subversive of condition in deed will be enjoined.

Equity will enjoin the use of property by a grantee or his assigns which is subversive of a condition on which conveyance of the property was made.

5. Covenants ⟹108(2)—That beneficiary of corporation which was common grantor of all lots with building restrictions gave lease of certain lots free thereof held not to affect right to enforce them against other lots.

Right of common grantor of the lots in a platted tract, a corporation, or a grantee of one of the lots, to enforce against the grantee of another such lot a building restriction in his deed common to, and imposed for the benefit of, all the lots, is unaffected by a lease of other lots in the tract free from such restrictions, even though the lessor were the beneficiary of the corporation, such fact not making his unauthorized acts or declarations binding on the corporation, and he being unable to bind the purchasers of lots, in the absence of consent or waiver by them of the restrictions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Action by the Title Insurance & Trust Company and another against Mabel C. Ritchardson and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Gertrude G. Fette appeals. Affirmed.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles (B. R. Ware, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Lewis C. Preston, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action for injunction and for forfeiture brought by Title Insurance & Trust Company, a corporation, and Mia Candida Bland against Mabel C. Ritchardson and her lessee, Gertrude G. Fette. The properties owned by plaintiff Mia Candida Bland and the defendant Mabel C. Ritchardson adjoin; the lot owned by Mia Candida Bland being lot 755 and that owned by Mabel C. Ritchardson being lot 756 in that certain tract known as "Chesterfield Square" in Los Angeles county, lot 756 being held under lease by appellant Gertrude G. Fette.

The record shows that the greater portion of the tract known as "Chesterfield Square" was acquired by respondent Title Insurance & Trust Company by deed from R. D. List and Iola R. List; that the lots owned by respondent Bland and defendant Ritchardson were acquired by them from the common grantor, respondent Title Insurance & Trust Company, by grant deeds in which the identical conditions, restrictions, and reservations are contained.

The court entered judgment that defendants Mabel C. Ritchardson and Gertrude G. Fette, their grantees, heirs, successors and assigns be restrained and enjoined from continuing to violate and breach the conditions, restrictions, and covenants of the deed of conveyance from Title Insurance & Trust Company, a corporation, to Mabel C. Ritchardson, conveying lot 756 of Chesterfield Square, and ordered and required defendants to remove the buildings now upon lot 756 forthwith, and further adjudged and decreed if the defendants, or either of them, refuse to discontinue the violation and breach of the covenants and conditions, lot 756 shall be, and is declared to be, forfeited to, and reinvested in, Title Insurance & Trust Company according to the provisions contained in the deed of conveyance.

Defendant Mabel C. Ritchardson has not appealed; the appeal being prosecuted only by defendant Gertrude G. Fette, who urges the following points upon which she relies for a reversal of the judgment: (1) That the judgment is against the law in that, (a) the complaint, as far as the plaintiff Bland is concerned, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, (b) the findings of fact do not support either conclusions of law or judgment in favor of the plaintiff Bland, (c) that the findings of fact do not support the judgment; (2) that the denial of the defendant Fette's motion to set aside and vacate the judgment and to amend and correct the conclusions of law and to enter judgment for the said defendant was erroneous and against law; (3) the court below erred in refusing to permit the introduction of the lease of lots 900, 901, of Chesterfield Square tract, executed by R. D. List to W. H. Bissell, and Elmer Deen, and marked Defendants Exhibit 1 for identification.

[1] The point urged that the complaint does not state a cause of action on the part of plaintiff Bland "because there are no averments that the restrictions were intended by all the parties thereto to be for the benefit of all the lots in the tract," is without merit, as the deed which is marked Exhibit A, referred to in, and made a part of, the complaint, contains the following recital:

> "It is understood and agreed that the foregoing conditions, restrictions, and reservations are a part of the general plan for the improvement of said Chesterfield Square, which plan contemplates that certain of the lots therein shall be used for residence purposes only, and that certain others of said lots may be used for residence or apartment house or flat or hotel or church or school or library or business purposes, and are for the benefit of said tract and each and every parcel of land therein, and shall inure to and pass with said tract and each and every parcel of land therein, and are hereby imposed upon the premises conveyed by this conveyance as a servitude in favor of said tract and each and every parcel of land therein, as the dominant tenement or tenements," etc.

The other points urged that the findings do not support the judgment, and the denial of appellant's motion to set aside and vacate the judgment and correct the conclusions of law and enter judgment for defendant Fette was erroneous, may be treated together.

The findings to which appellant takes exception and which pertain to the condition in the deed claimed to have been violated, and which it is contended do not support the judgment, are:

> "II. That the plaintiff Title Insurance & Trust Company is the grantor in the various deeds made by it to the several grantees of lots in that certain tract known as Chesterfield Square, as per map recorded in Book 21, pages 90 and 91, of Maps, in the office of the county recorder of the county of Los Angeles, state of California. * * *
> "VII. That each and every of the deeds made by said Title Insurance & Trust Company to the various purchasers of lots in said tract contain the same conditions, restrictions, and reservations as those mentioned in paragraph VI of these findings.
> "VI. That the deeds under and by which said plaintiff Mia Candida Bland and the defendant Mabel C. Ritchardson acquired title to and own their respective lots in said tract, contain, among other things, the following express conditions, restrictions, and reservations, to wit: 'That this conveyance is made and accepted upon each of the following express conditions, restrictions, and reservations, which shall apply to and bind the heirs, executors, administrators, successors and assigns of the respective parties: * * * (2) No residence shall be erected upon said premises that shall cost in actual value for labor and material less than $2,500.00, and no building for any apartment house, flat, hotel, church, school, library or business purposes or any combination of said purposes, shall be erected upon said premises that shall cost in actual value for labor and material less than $2,500.00. * * * (3) All buildings placed on said premises shall be erected thereon and from new material, and no building shall be moved upon said premises. * * * (8) The property hereby conveyed shall not be used or occupied by or be permitted to be used or occupied by any person other than a person of the white or Caucasian race. Provided that all and each of said restrictions and conditions herein contained shall continue in full force and effect until January 1, 1930, and then shall terminate and be of no further effect, either legal or equitable, upon said property or on the parties hereto, their heirs, successors, devisees, executors, administrators or assigns. Provided further that a breach of the foregoing conditions shall cause said premises to revert to the grantor, its successors or assigns, each of whom respectively shall have the right of immediate re-entry upon said premises, in the event of any such breach; and as to the owner of any other lot in said tract, the foregoing restrictions and conditions shall operate as covenants running with the land, and the breach of such covenants or the continuance of any such breach may be enjoined, abated, or remedied by appropriate proceedings by such grantor, its successors or assigns, or by any such owners, their heirs, devisees, executors, administrators, successors or assigns, but by no other person. * * *'
> "VII. That each and every of the deeds made by said Title Insurance & Trust Company to the various purchasers of lots in said tract contain the same conditions, restrictions, and reservations as those mentioned in paragraph VI of these findings."

[2] Appellant complains that "upon such findings the court bases conclusions of law and judgment to the effect that the plaintiff Bland, to whom, as far as the evidence or findings disclose, there never was transferred the right of re-entry upon breach of said condition, and plaintiff Title Insurance & Trust Company is entitled to an injunction or, in case the defendants refuse to discontinue the violation of said conditions, to a reverter." We are unable to find in the judgment any right of re-entry by plaintiff Bland, but, if it had been so decreed, it may be said that appellant cannot be heard to complain, as she would suffer no injury if the judgment had given respondent Bland the right of re-entry together with respondent Title Insurance & Trust Company, to whom the property would revert, and Title Insurance & Trust Company is not complaining.

Appellant further urges that the following findings are not supported by the evidence:

"XI. That the plaintiff Title Insurance & Trust Company was at all the times mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, and now is the owner of the reversionary rights in and to said lot 756, and in and to each and all of said lots contained in said tract, Chesterfield Square, in said complaint described.

"XII. That the plaintiffs Title Insurance & Trust Company and Mia Candida Bland have not consented to the breach of or waived any of the conditions, restrictions, or covenants in said complaint set forth as and in said conveyance contained, and subject to which said defendant Mabel C. Ritchardson holds title to said lot 756, in which lot the defendant Gertrude G. Fette is interested as lessee thereof, and that said conditions, restrictions, and reservations have not been canceled or withdrawn, and that each and every one thereof are now, and at all the times mentioned in said complaint have been, in full force and effect.

"XIII. That, when it was ascertained that the defendant Gertrude G. Fette contemplated moving said buildings to and upon said lot No. 756, and before said buildings were placed on said lot No. 756, said defendants knew of, and had knowledge of, the said conditions, restrictions, and reservations contained in said deed from Title Insurance & Trust Company to Mabel C. Ritchardson, and were notified that it would be a violation of said restrictions to place said buildings on said lot 756; and that, when it was ascertained that said defendant Gertrude G. Fette was determined to and had placed said buildings on said lot 756, timely demand for the discontinuance of such violation of said restrictions was made upon said defendants; but that said defendants failed and refused to discontinue such violation, and still fail and refuse so to do.

"XIV. That by reason of the violation, by the defendants, of the conditions, restrictions, and reservations contained in said deeds from Title Insurance & Trust Company to the plaintiff Mia Candida Bland and to the defendant Mabel C. Ritchardson, and to the various other purchasers of lots in said tract, Chesterfield Square, said plaintiff Mia Candida Bland has been, and is, irreparably damaged."

If the findings here quoted and concerning which appellant contends the evidence does not support are in fact supported by sufficient evidence, and the refusal of the court to permit the introduction in evidence of the lease of lots 900 and 901 of Chesterfield Square tract, executed by R. D. List to W. H. Bissell and Elmer Deen, is not reversible error, the judgment must be affirmed.

We think the evidence justifies the findings of the trial court, and such findings support the judgment. P. L. Bishop, an employee of Title Insurance & Trust Company, and who stated that he was acquainted with the conditions and restrictions contained in the deeds issued to persons who bought lots in Chesterfield Square tract, testified as follows:

"Q. Do you know of your own knowledge whether the general plan or scheme of the subdivision, in the sale of lots, was to retain and make effective the various restrictions and conditions of the deeds as issued to Mrs. Bland? A. Yes.

"Q. Were they so carried out?

"Mr. Hutton: I object to that as indefinite and uncertain, calling for the conclusion of the witness, and, furthermore, that I do not understand— A. Meaning, were the restrictions lived up to?

"Q. (by Mr. Preston): No. Did they show in all the deeds? A. Yes, sir.

"Cross-examination by Mr. Ware: Q. Now, you say the general plan and scheme of this tract was uniform; is it not true that there are two distinct and separate forms of deeds used on the tract, one business and one for residence? A. Certain business and certain residence, yes.

"Q. Or combination of business and residence purposes? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. So that, when you say it was uniform, each deed in the tract was not the same as each other deed in the tract? A. I was referring to those deeds—this business deed that Mr. —the attorney had in front of me.

"Q. However, in the tract as a whole, there were two separate and distinct forms of deeds? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You say in certain of these deeds paragraph 4 has been eliminated; is that correct? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Entirely eliminated? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And how many, approximately, do you know? A. Our records are that there are lots 1 to 12, with the exception of one lot that was not in the trust; I don't know whether it was lot 5 or 6; one of those lots.

"Q. 5 or 6? A. Yes.

"Q. Who owns that lot? A. I don't know, sir.

"Q. Do your records disclose the owner? A. No; it was not in the trust."

Paragraph 4, which was eliminated from the deeds to lots 1 to 12, requires any residence built upon the premises to front on Slauson avenue, and permits the residence or building to be erected on the front property line, excepting that, if the premises are on a street corner and front north or south, the residence or building shall be located not less than 20 feet from the side street line, etc.

Respondent Bland testified that she never at any time consented to the buildings being placed on the lot of defendant Ritchardson adjoining her lot, and never consented to small buildings being moved onto such lot. Defendant Mabel C. Ritchardson testified that at the time she leased her lot to appellant the restrictions in her deed were called to the attention of appellant, and appellant read the deed. Appellant Gertrude G. Fette testified that before she moved the buildings onto the lot she received written notice concerning the conditions contained in the deeds:

"Q. At the time you received this notice, had you made any arrangements to make improvements under your lease from you by—? A. Yes sir.

"Q. What arrangements had you made? A. The buildings were moved up that night; they were all on timbers, and had to leave the lot.

"Q. At the time you received this notice they had not been moved, is that correct? A. They were not off the lot, but they were on timbers ready for moving, yes, sir.

"Q. They had not yet been placed on lot 756 on Slauson avenue? A. No, sir."

The evidence shows the general plan for the improvement of the tract, Chesterfield Square; that, at the time of purchasing their respective lots, both the plaintiff Bland and the defendant Ritchardson understood and agreed with Title Insurance & Trust Company, their common grantor, that the conditions, restrictions, and reservations set forth in the deeds accepted by them were and are a part of the general plan for the improvement of Chesterfield Square, which plan contemplates that certain of the lots therein shall be used for residence purposes only, and that certain others of the lots may be used for residence or apartment house or flat or hotel or church or school or library or business purposes, or any combination of such purposes, and are for the benefit of the tract, and are, by such understanding and agreement imposed upon the premises covered, by their respective deeds as a servitude in favor of Chesterfield Square tract and each and every parcel of land therein, as the dominant tenement or tenements; that, at the time of entering into and making the lease of lot 756 by the defendant Ritchardson to appellant Fette, appellant had notice of all such conditions, restrictions, and reservations, and took her lease with knowledge thereof; that both before and at the time of moving the buildings complained of both defendants Ritchardson and appellant Fette had notice of objections to the moving of the buildings onto such lot.

[3, 4] It is well settled that, when one makes deeds for different parties to a tract of land, each deed containing the same restrictions as to the use of the land to be conveyed, which restrictions are imposed as part of a general plan for the benefit of the tract and the several lots or portions thereof, the restrictions not only impose a liability upon each grantee to the grantor, but give the grantee an equitable right to enforce the restrictions against another grantee. Allen v. Barrett, 213 Mass. 36, 99 N. E. 575, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 820. Equity will enjoin the use of property by a grantee or his assigns when such use is subversive of a condition upon which conveyance of property was made. Pavkovich v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 150 Cal. 39, 87 P. 1097. In Alderson v. Cutting, 163 Cal. 503, 126 P. 157, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1, the court says:

> "The validity of restrictions like those here involved is not open to question (Firth v. Marovich, 160 Cal. 257 [116 P. 729, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1190]). In case of a violation relief may be sought by the owner of any lot in the tract for the benefit of which the restrictions were imposed;"

—and in Los Angeles, etc., Land Co. v. Marr, 178 Cal. 243, 173 P. 83, this language is used:

> "The validity of restrictions of this kind, when imposed, as was the covenant in this case, for the benefit of other lands owned by the grantor, is not questioned. Quatman v. McCray, 128 Cal. 285 [60 P. 855]; Firth v. Marovich, 160 Cal. 257 [116 P. 729, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1190]."

In Miles v. Clark, 44 Cal. App. 539, 187 P. 167, the court says:

> "The principle that covenants of the character here involved operate as a covenant running with the land for the benefit of other lots in the tract is well * * * recognized in this state. Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 136 Cal. 48, 68 P. 308; Hunt v. Jones, 149 Cal. 301, 86 P. 686; Firth v. Marovich, 160 Cal. 260, 116 P. 729, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1190; Alderson v. Cutting, 163 Cal. 504, 126 P. 151 [157], Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1; Parker v. Kenworthy, 181 Cal. 783, 183 P. 950."

The case of Werner v. Graham, 181 Cal. 174, 183 P. 945, on which appellant principally relies, is distinguished from the present case, for the reason that the restriction ran personally to the grantor of plaintiff's predecessor in interest, and was not imposed upon the premises covered by the deed there construed as a servitude in favor of each parcel of land as the dominant tenement or tenements. Nor is McBride v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 152, 215 P. 678, inconsistent with the doctrine announced in the cases quoted from.

[5] The refusal of the trial court to permit the introduction in evidence of the lease covering lots 900 and 901 of Chesterfield Square, made by R. D. List to W. H. Bissell and Elmer E. Deen, was not error. Neither of the plaintiffs was shown to have consented to such lease nor to the erection of the buildings placed on such lots. Even if R. D. List were the beneficiary of Title Insurance & Trust Company, such fact would not make his unauthorized acts or declarations binding on such company in contravention of the terms or purposes of the trust, and surely could not bind the purchasers of lots, in the absence of consent or waiver by them of the conditions contained in the deeds.

CALLAWAY et al. v. WOLCOTT et al.
(Civ. 4888.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 10, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑635(1)—Appellate court would be justified in affirming order appealed from, where appellants did not print in briefs or supplement any part of record disclosing error (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a–953c).

Where appeal was taken pursuant to alternative method provided for in Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a–953c, from an order under section 473, relieving defendant from failure to file with clerk his notice pursuant to section 953a, within time therein limited, to require preparation for certification of transcript of record in prior appeal, and appellants did not print in their brief or supplement thereto any part of record except portion of affidavit made by defendant, which failed to disclose error on part of trial court, held appellate court would be justified in affirming order appealed from.

2. Appeal and error 🔑607(1)—Granting relief from failure to file timely notice to require preparation of transcript held not abuse of discretion, where, because of death of attorney, defendant was unaware that notice had not been filed (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 953a).

Where attorney who represented defendant at trial died shortly after he filed notice of motion for new trial and defendant was informed that there was filed with clerk in connection with his appeal notice under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, requiring preparation and presentation for certification of transcript of record, and succeeding counsel, being informed that necessary notice had been filed, did not discover failure to file it until a few days before defendant applied for relief from failure to file, held that, under section 473, trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting relief from failure of attorneys to file notice within time provided in section 953a; no prejudice to plaintiff appearing.

3. Appeal and error 🔑607(1)—Trial court may relieve party from excusable failure to file statutory notice for preparation of transcript in time (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 953a).

Trial courts have right under provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing court to relieve party against whom judgment has been taken through his surprise, etc., to relieve party from his excusable failure to file notice provided in section 953a for preparation and certification of transcript of record on appeal within time therein limited.

4. Judgment 🔑364—Trial court may relieve party from legal effects of mistakes and oversights of his attorney (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Under provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing court to relieve party from judgment, order, etc., taken against him through his mistake, surprise, etc., trial court may relieve party from legal effect of mistakes and oversights of his attorney.

5. Appeal and error 🔑982(1)—Relief from judgment being addressed to court's discretion, order granting same will not be disturbed unless abuse clearly appears (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing court to relieve party from judgment, order, etc., taken against him through his mistake, surprise, etc., being addressed to sound discretion of trial court, order granting same will not be set aside on appeal unless an abuse of discretion clearly appears.

6. Judgment 🔑392—Any doubt as to granting application for relief from judgment should be resolved in favor of application (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Any doubt that may exist as to granting application under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to be relieved from judgment, order, etc., taken against party through his mistake, surprise, etc., should be resolved in favor of application, to end of securing trial upon merits.

7. Appeal and error 🔑948—All presumptions will be indulged in favor of order granting relief from judgment; burden being upon appellant to show discretion was abused (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

On appeal from an order granting relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing court to relieve party against whom judgment has been taken through his surprise, neglect, all presumptions will be indulged in favor of correctness of court's action, and burden in all cases is upon appellant to make it appear that court's discretion was abused in making order.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by Emma A. Callaway and husband against N. A. Wolcott and others. From an order relieving the named defendant of his failure to file notice to require preparation of transcript, the plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. M. Fursee and Dan V. Noland, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Stutsman & Stutsman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. Plaintiffs appeal in this action pursuant to the alternative method provided for in sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, from an order of the trial court relieving defendant (respondent) N. A. Wolcott, under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, from his failure to file with the clerk his notice pursuant to the provisions of section 953a, within the time therein limited, to require the preparation for certification of a transcript of the record in the prior appeal which he made from the judgment entered against him in the action.

[1] However, the appellants in this appeal did not print in their briefs or in a supplement thereto any part of the record except a portion of an affidavit made by defendant

Wolcott in support of his application for the relief, which printed portion in itself is insufficient to show error on the part of the trial court in granting the relief. Respondent Wolcott's brief does not aid appellants in their appeal, for he printed no portion of the record. Therefore the record properly before us fails to show error on the part of the trial court in permitting the notice to be filed with the clerk requiring the preparation of the transcript after the time limited by section 953a.

The Supreme Court definitely announced in a very recent decision, in a case where the appeal was made pursuant to the alternative method and the appellant failed to print in his brief on appeal or in a supplement thereto any part of the record sufficient to justify a reversal, that it devolves upon the appellant to affirmatively show the existence of error upon which he asks for a review. "We are unable to say, therefore, that any error was committed by the trial court. * * * All presumptions indulged in are in favor of the regularity of the judgment and proceedings upon which it is based; hence it devolves upon an appellant to affirmatively show the existence of the error upon which he asks for a reversal. * * * It has been reiterated approximately one hundred times in the decisions of this court and of the District Courts of Appeal that it is incumbent upon an appellant who relies upon a typewritten transcript to print in his brief or in a printed supplement thereto sufficient of the record to justify a reversal of the judgment or order appealed from." Dahlberg v. Dahlberg (Cal. Sup.) 260 P. 290, and cases therein cited.

[2-7] In this appeal we would be justified in affirming the order appealed from without going further, but, in order to determine whether the adherence by this court to the strict rule of procedure would work any hardship upon appellants or deprive them of any substantial rights, we have examined the typewritten transcript of the record, and it appears therefrom that the attorney who represented defendant Wolcott at the trial and who filed a notice of motion for a new trial on his behalf, died shortly after he filed the notice of motion; that defendant Wolcott was informed that there had been filed with the clerk on his behalf in connection with his appeal from the judgment, a notice under the provisions of section 953a requiring the preparation and presentation for certification of a transcript of the record; that the motion for a new trial was denied, and defendant Wolcott was not informed until after the moton was denied that the notice to the clerk had not been filed, whereupon he requested the attorney he employed to succeed the deceased attorney to file such notice. This succeeding counsel was given a typewritten transcript of the reporter's notes taken at the trial, by one of the former attorneys of defendant Wolcott, and was informed that the necessary notice had been filed, and did not discover the failure to file it until a few days before defendant Wolcott applied to the court for relief from the failure to file the notice, which application was made about two months after notice of the order denying the motion for a new trial was given. Plaintiffs did not show that the delay of less than two months to file the notice caused them any loss or injury.

Appellants contend that the provisions of section 473 do not apply to a motion for such relief, that, as the notice under section 953a was not filed within the time therein provided, the trial court lost the power to grant the relief sought, and that the record fails to show circumstances that would constitute excusable neglect or inadvertence on the part of defendant's attorneys.

None of these contentions have merit. As to the first and second contentions, our courts have definitely held that trial courts have the right, under the provisions of section 473, to relieve a party from his excusable failure to file the notice provided for in section 953a, within the time therein limited. Stenzel v. Kronick (Cal. Sup.) 255 P. 199; Vicino v. Amador, 71 Cal. App. 604, 236 P. 369; Revert v. Hesse, 184 Cal. 295, 193 P. 943; Kammerer v. Marino, 66 Cal. App. 720, 226 P. 980.

The answer to the last contention is likewise simple. Under the provisions of section 473, the trial court may relieve a party from the legal effect of the mistakes and oversights of his attorney. Broderick v. Cochran, 18 Cal. App. 202, 122 P. 972; Mitchell v. California S. S. Co., 156 Cal. 576, 105 P. 590, and the cases above cited. An application for relief under section 473 " 'is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and (the order of the court) will not be set aside on appeal unless an abuse of discretion clearly appears. Any doubt that may exist should be resolved in favor of the application, to the end of securing a trial upon the merits' [citing cases]. * * * 'All presumptions will be indulged in favor of the correctness of the court's action, and the burden in all cases is upon the appellant to make it appear that its discretion was abused in making the order.' " Hecq v. Conner (Cal Sup.) 265 P. 180.

It does not appear that the trial court abused its discretion in granting defendant Wolcott the relief from the failure of his attorneys to file the notice within the time provided in section 953a. This is particularly true, as he had a right to believe that his attorney had filed the required notice, plaintiffs showed no injury because of the short delay, and "all presumptions will be indulged in favor of the court's action."

The order is affirmed.

MIRAMONTE & LOUEDESTEL CO. v. NATIONAL SURETY CO. (Civ. 6186.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 16, 1928.

Attachment 🔑351—Attorney's fees, expended in defending attachment suit on merits, held not proper element of recovery in suit on bond.

Attorney's fees, expended in defending the original attachment suit on its merits, held not a proper element of recovery in suit on the attachment bond.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; William D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by the Miramonte & Louedestel Company, against the National Surety Company. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Henry E. Carter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. H. Swallow and Robert Richards, both of Bishop, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. This is an action for damages against appellant as surety on an attachment undertaking. Judgment was awarded in respondent's favor for the sum of $633.30, from which judgment the appeal is taken.

The action in which the attachment was issued and levied was brought by one O. N. Scott against respondent in Los Angeles county, and subsequently transferred to Inyo county. It was tried upon the merits in the latter county, and judgment given for respondent. No proceedings were ever taken to dissolve or vacate the attachment, and it was discharged only by virtue of the judgment rendered in respondent's favor after trial upon the merits. In the present action, the principal element of damages for which allowance was made consisted of an item of $500 for attorney's fees expended in defending the attachment suit on the merits; and the sole question presented for determination is whether under the circumstances stated the item of attorney's fees constituted a proper element of damage. This identical question was raised in the recent case of Soule v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. (Cal. App.) 255 P. 886, and the authorities cited and relied upon by respondent herein as sustaining the trial court's action were therein reviewed. In deciding the point it was said:

"We are of the opinion that in actions of the character of the instant case, as in analogous cases of suits on injunction bonds, the rule established by the weight of authority limits the recovery of attorneys' fees to those paid for procuring a dissolution of the attachment; and that, as said in Mitchell v. Hawley, 79 Cal. 301, supra, the allowance of such fees is exceptional, and the rule should not be extended to include counsel fees paid in defense of the principal suit."

Therefore, upon the authority of that case, and for the reasons therein stated, the judgment in the present case is modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $500 representing the expenditure for attorney's fees, and, as thus modified, the judgment will stand affirmed, appellant to recover its costs on appeal.

GENERAL SECURITIES CORPORATION v. REO MOTOR CAR CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 5800.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 11, 1928.

1. Sales 🔑473(1)—Defendant conditionally selling automobile to dealer, and allowing him to resell under conditional sales contract bought by plaintiff, cannot assert title against plaintiff (Civ. Code, §§ 2317, 3543).

Where defendant, after selling automobile under conditional sales contract to dealer, allowed dealer with apparent title to resell under conditional sales contract, which was bought by plaintiff, defendant cannot assert title against plaintiff, notwithstanding that investigation by plaintiff would have disclosed that automobile was not registered in dealer's name, since dealer had ostensible authority within Civ. Code, § 2317, and under section 3543 innocent person whose negligence caused loss must suffer, notwithstanding general rule that buyer under conditional sales contract in which title is expressly reserved cannot, in subsequent sale, grant any better title than he himself has.

2. Sales 🔑473(1)—Conditional seller of automobile authorizing resale cannot complain, as against innocent third person, that dealer did not advise him of resale (Civ. Code, § 1142).

Where defendant selling automobile under conditional sales contract to dealer gave dealer express authorization to resell, he cannot, under Civ. Code, § 1142, complain, as against innocent purchaser of dealer's conditional sale contract, that dealer did not keep good faith by advising him before resales were actually made.

3. Sales 🔑473(1)—Buyer of conditional sales contract covering automobile held not put on notice of seller's defective title, where in assignment seller warranted title.

Plaintiff purchasing conditional sales contract from seller of automobile held not put on notice as to defect in seller's title by language of assignment in which dealer assigned his "right, title, and interest" in contract and automobile, where in such assignment dealer also guaranteed, warranted, and defended title of the property conveyed, and that he was owner of full and complete title.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery of an automobile by the General Securities Corporation against the Reo Motor Car Company of California. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Loyd Wright and Charles E. Millikan, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Defendant was at the time of the transaction which gave rise to this litigation, engaged in the business of selling automobiles to dealers, and plaintiff was engaged in the business of buying conditional sale contracts on automobiles from dealers who were selling automobiles to purchasers on such contracts. The car handled by defendant was known as the "Reo," and one F. S. Stewart was the Reo dealer in the city of Santa Barbara. Stewart conducted a business establishment in that city in which he was engaged in the business of buying and selling automobiles, and in which he displayed automobiles for sale to the general public. On January 23, 1922, defendant sold to F. S. Stewart the automobile described in the complaint by conditional sale contract. This automobile was delivered to Stewart and by him displayed for sale in his place of business at Santa Barbara. On February 8, 1922, Stewart drew up a conditional sale contract purporting to sell the car to one L. C. Simmons, the contract reciting a valuable consideration. Thereafter Stewart, in the ordinary course of business and for a valuable consideration, sold the Simmons conditional sale contract to plaintiff. At that time plaintiff did not know that Stewart did not own the automobile or that it had been purchased under conditional sale contract by Stewart, but believed that Stewart was the owner of the automobile and entitled to sell it. Most of the facts are stipulated by the parties. The court found, upon evidence which fully sustains the findings:

> "That during said period of time said F. S. Stewart bought from the defendant herein many Reo automobiles on conditional sales contract, and that defendant during all of said times knew of, permitted, allowed, and directed the said F. S. Stewart to resell in his own name on conditional sales contract to the general public cars which it, the said defendant, had sold to him, the said F. S. Stewart, on conditional sales contract before he, the said F. S. Stewart, had paid it, the said defendant herein, the balance due on said conditional sales contract, and permitted and allowed the said F. S. Stewart during all of said times to hold himself out to the general public as being owner of and also as being entitled to sell said cars in his own name, and convey clear title thereto. That the said F. S. Stewart, with the knowledge of the defendant, did not have sufficient money or means to finance or carry on his business or to pay the defendant for cars purchased by him on conditional sales contract or otherwise, without reselling such cars so purchased and selling all conditional sales contracts taken by him, the said F. S. Stewart, on the resale of said cars to the general public. That this defendant knew at all of said times that the said F. S. Stewart was in his own name reselling all of the cars sold to him by it on conditional sales contract to the general public on conditional sales contract, and in order to obtain money to pay the balance due it, the said defendant, he, the said F. S. Stewart, was selling said conditional sales contracts so taken by him in his own name on such resales to some finance company, who was in the business of purchasing paper of that kind, and that during said period of time he did sell to the plaintiff herein many of said conditional sales contracts and turned over the money received therefrom to the defendant herein to be applied upon his said indebtedness to it."

Both the contract by which Stewart purchased from defendant and the contract by which Stewart purported to sell to Simmons provided that the title to the car should be retained by the respective sellers until the purchase price thereof should be paid. On March 1, 1922, Stewart was in default in the payment of the balance of the purchase price due on his contract, and the defendant took possession of the automobile which it thereafter sold to one Weise. No payments were made on the contract sold to the plaintiff, and at the time of the commencement of the action many payments were due and unpaid. The trial court gave plaintiff judgment for the value of the car, and from this judgment defendant appeals.

[1] Defendant rests upon the general rule that "a vendee of personal property, under conditional sales contract in which title is expressly reserved and remains in the vendor, cannot, in a subsequent sale, grant or sell any better title than he himself has." Ample authority can be found for this rule. Authorities are equally numerous, however, in holding that, "where the owner of the property clothes another with the apparent title to or power of disposition over it, and an innocent third party has thereby been induced to deal with the apparent owner in reference thereto," the true owner in such case is estopped from afterward asserting his title. Chase v. Whitmore, 68 Cal. 545, 9 P. 942. Section 2317 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Ostensible authority is such as a principal, intentionally or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess."

In Shirey v. All Night and Day Bank, 166 Cal. 50, 134 P. 1001, the court said:

> "Where the true owner holds out another, or allows him to appear as the owner of or as having full power of disposition over the property, and innocent third parties are thus led into dealing with such apparent owner, they will be protected. Their rights in such cases do not depend upon the actual title or authority of the party with whom they deal directly, but are derived from the act of the real owner, which precludes him from disputing, as against them, the existence of the title or power, which through negligence, or mistaken confidence, he caused or allowed to appear to be vested in the party making the conveyance."

See Schultz v. McLean, 93 Cal. 329, 28 P. 1053; Gardiner v. McDonogh, 147 Cal. 313, 81 P. 964; Chucovich v. S. F. Securities Corp., 60 Cal. App. 700, 214 P. 263.

It was held in Carter v. Rowley, 59 Cal. App. 486, 211 P. 267, that, where the owner of an automobile, knowing that a certain dealer is engaged in the business of selling secondhand cars, delivers his car to said dealer for the purpose of finding a purchaser, he thereby clothes said dealer with such indicia of authority to sell the car as usually accompanies such authority according to the custom of trade and the general understanding of business men, and he cannot recover the machine from an innocent purchaser from said dealer on the latter's premises, even though said dealer exceeded his authority in making the sale. The court said:

> "As between two innocent persons, one of whom must suffer, the loss should fall on the principal who has armed the agent with apparent authority and thus has enabled him to obtain the advantage of the person with whom he trades, rather than on the purchaser, where the agent acts within the apparent scope of his authority and there is nothing in the transaction to put the purchaser on notice that the agent is exceeding his authority."

Section 3543 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer."

In the case at bar the owner of the automobile placed it in the hands of a dealer who was engaged in the business of buying and selling automobiles and authorized him to place it on sale to the general public. Defendant undoubtedly allowed Stewart to appear as the owner of the car, or at least as having "full power of disposition" over it. Plaintiff had no notice whatever of any claim of ownership by any one other than Stewart. Plaintiff was undoubtedly an innocent party in the transaction and its rights should be protected. If Stewart failed in his duty toward defendant, the responsibility does not rest with plaintiff, who was dealing with Stewart at arms' length. Defendant cannot escape liability by showing that an investigation on the part of plaintiff would have disclosed that the automobile was not registered in Stewart's name. We know of no rule which, in the absence of circumstances putting him on guard, requires the purchaser of personal property from a dealer at a regularly established place of business to commence an investigation to determine the status of the title of the dealer having possession of the article offered for sale.

[2] Under the findings of the trial court and the facts as proved at the trial, defendant not only vested Stewart with ostensible authority to sell the automobile, together with the conditional sale contract thereon, but gave him absolute authority to do so. The treasurer of defendant company testified that for a long period of time Stewart was buying cars from defendant on conditional sale contracts, and was in turn reselling them on conditional sale contracts with the knowledge and consent of the officials of defendant company. The witness knew that it was necessary for Stewart to conduct his business in this way for financial reasons. The plan was agreed to by the defendant, but with the promise on the part of Stewart, so the witness testified, that defendant would be advised before the resales were made by Stewart. It thus appears that express authorization was given Stewart by defendant to resell the cars by the method followed in the instant case. Defendant is not now in position to complain if Stewart did not keep good faith by advising defendant before the resales were actually made. Section 1142, Civil Code, provides:

> "Where the possession of personal property, together with a power to dispose thereof, is transferred by its owner to another person, an executed sale by the latter, while in possession, to a buyer in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, for value, transfers to such buyer the title of the former owner, though he may be entitled to rescind, and does rescind, the transfer made by him."

[3] Defendant contends that plaintiff was put upon notice by the language of the assignment of the Simmons contract in which Stewart assigned to plaintiff his "right, title and interest" in and to the contract and to the automobile. It is a complete answer to this contention to point out that in the assignment Stewart further says:

> "I further guarantee, warrant, and defend the title of said property hereby conveyed * * * and that the undersigned, party of the first part, is the owner of the full and complete title to said property."

The judgment is affirmed.

GENERAL SECURITIES CORPORATION v. REO MOTOR CAR CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 4679.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 12, 1928.

1. Sales 🔑473(1)—Seller of automobile under conditional sales contract, authorizing buyer to represent himself as owner for purpose of resale, cannot assert title as against innocent third person dealing with buyer.

Seller of automobile under conditional sales contract, who authorized buyer to resell and to represent himself as owner for such purpose, cannot assert his title as against innocent third person dealing with buyer.

2. Replevin 🔑8(3)—Right to possession determines right to relief in claim and delivery action.

Where pleadings show that action is one of claim and delivery, right to possession determines right to demand relief asked.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery of an automobile by the General Securities Corporation against the Reo Motor Car Company of California. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Dave F. Smith, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff and defendant presented to the trial court a stipulation of facts upon which the court rendered judgment for defendant. In its findings the court adopted the language of the stipulation, omitting certain exhibits referred to therein. The findings are as follows:

"First. That the plaintiff herein is a corporation, organized under the laws of the state of California; that it is now, and has been for some years last past, engaged in the buying of conditional sales contracts on automobiles from dealers, who sell automobiles on conditional sales contracts and dispose of said paper.

"Second. That defendant has been for some years last past engaged in the selling in the state of California and elsewhere of automobiles known as the Reo, and that it maintains an office in the city of Los Angeles, state of California, for that purpose.

"Third. That F. S. Stewart was, during the year 1921 and a part of the year 1922, in the city of Santa Maria, state of California, engaged in the business of buying and selling automobiles, and during said time he had a place of business in said city, where he displayed such automobiles to the general public for sale, and during said period of time he bought many automobiles and sold the same to the general public in the ordinary course of business; all of which facts both the plaintiff and defendant knew.

"Fourth. That during said period of time the said F. S. Stewart bought from the defendant herein several Reo automobiles, for cash and on conditional sales contracts, and sold them to the general public, with the knowledge of defendant.

"Fifth. That on the 8th day of November, 1921, the defendant herein delivered to said F. S. Stewart the car in litigation herein, on a conditional sales contract.

"Sixth. That said automobile was taken by the said F. S. Stewart of Santa Maria, displayed in his place of business for sale, and was on the 30th day of December, 1921, in the ordinary course of business, sold to one L. W. Clark, for valuable consideration, and on a conditional sales contract.

"Seventh. That on the said 30th day of December, 1921, and in the ordinary course of business, said conditional sales contract last above mentioned was for a valuable consideration sold to plaintiff herein by the said F. S. Stewart.

"Eighth. That prior to the purchasing of said contract plaintiff had its agent at Santa Maria ascertain that the said F. S. Stewart was in possession of said automobile on the said 30th day of December, 1921, and that he had sold the same to the said L. W. Clark on said date under said conditional sales contract.

"Ninth. That neither the said L. W. Clark or this plaintiff knew on the said 30th day of December, 1921, or for some time thereafter, that the said F. S. Stewart did not own the said automobile, or that it had been purchased under said conditional sales contract from defendant, but believed that the said F. S. Stewart was the owner thereof, and entitled to sell the same.

"Tenth. That thereupon, and on said 30th day of December, 1921, the plaintiff and the said L. W. Clark had said automobile registered with the motor vehicle department of the state of California.

"Eleventh. That the said L. W. Clark was in possession and use of said automobile for about three months, when it was taken to a garage, (connected with the place of business of the said F. S. Stewart, but not owned or operated by him), for repairs; that defendant prior to the commencement of this action, found the said automobile at said place and took possession of the same.

"Twelfth. That all damages caused by the detention of said automobile are hereby waived.

"Thirteenth. That defendant, before taking said automobile, demanded the balance due on the conditional sales contract from F. S. Stewart.

"Fourteenth. That said defendant has never been paid by any one the balance due on said conditional sales contract."

[1] On these findings the court erred in concluding that defendant was entitled to the possession of the property referred to therein. We have this day filed our decision in General Securities Corporation v. Reo Motor Car Co., civil No. 5800, 266 P. 576, in which it is held, on facts quite similar to the facts in the present case, that the defendant was not entitled to the possession of the automobile. In that case the same dealer, F. S. Stewart, had sold a car under circumstances showing that he had been given at least ostensible authority to make the sale as the owner. From the stipulation in the case now before us, it is manifest that the defendant impliedly, if not expressly, authorized Stewart to sell the car to the public and to represent himself as its owner for this purpose. In the case above referred to, our civil No. 5800, the law applicable to these facts is discussed at some length. It is not necessary to repeat the discussion here other than to point out that there is ample authority to support the rule that "where the owner of the property clothes another with the apparent title to or power of disposition over it, and an innocent third party has thereby been induced to deal with the apparent owner in reference thereto," the true owner in such case is estopped from afterward asserting his title. Chase v. Whitmore, 68 Cal. 545, 9 P. 942; Shirey v. All Night and Day Bank, 166 Cal. 50, 134 P. 1001; Schultz v. McLean, 93 Cal. 329, 28 P. 1053; Gardiner v. McDonogh, 147 Cal. 313, 81 P. 964; Carter v. Rowley, 59 Cal. App. 486, 211 P. 267; Chucovich v. F. S. Securities Corp., 60 Cal. App. 700, 214 P. 263; Civ. Code, § 2317.

[2] Judgment cannot be rendered for the plaintiff on the findings of the trial court and upon the record as it comes from the lower court, for the reason that it is not disclosed whether Clark, the purchaser of the car, was in default in his payments at the time of the commencement of the action. This point is not mentioned in the briefs, and was doubtless inadvertently omitted by counsel. If Clark had made all his payments, he would have been the proper party to sue; otherwise the plaintiff had a right of action. The pleadings show that the action is one of claim and delivery. Therefore the right to possession determines the right to demand the relief asked. The record is incomplete in other particulars. It cannot be determined therefrom in whose possession the car was left upon the rendition of the judgment and pending appeal. The record is silent as to the value of the property. We have only the allegation in the complaint that the car at the time of the commencement of the action was of the value of $2,000, and the allegation in the cross-complaint that its value was only $1,650.

By a stipulation recently filed in this court, the information necessary to a termination of the litigation has been furnished. It appears therefrom that the car in question was on March 17, 1922, of the value of $1,650; that L. W. Clark was in default in his payments on said contract on March 17, 1922; and that the car has been sold under stipulation and the proceeds of the sale deposited in a bank pending the outcome of the litigation.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment be, and it is hereby reversed, with directions to the superior court to render judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1,650, with interest thereon from March 17, 1922.

We concur: HOUSER, Acting P. J.; YORK, J.

PALATINE INSURANCE COMPANY, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. REO MOTOR CAR COMPANY OF CALIFORNIA, Defendant and Appellant. (Civ. 5799.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 12, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 11, 1928.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Loyd Wright and Charles E. Millikan, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. This action was tried in the superior court at the same time as the case of General Securities Corporation v. Reo Motor Car Co. of California, Civil No. 5800, in which our opinion is this day filed, 266 P. 576. The facts are the same in the two cases except that in the instant case F. S. Stewart, the Reo dealer at Santa Barbara, executed a conditional sale contract for the automobile in question in favor of R. B. Stewart, reserving title in himself until the purchase price should be paid. Defendant sold and delivered to F. S. Stewart the automobile in question on January 24, 1922, by conditional sale contract in which title was reserved in defendant. F. S. Stewart displayed the automobile for sale in his place of business at Santa Barbara until February 1, 1922, when he sold to the General Securities Corporation the said conditional sale contract in which R. B. Stewart was the purchaser. R. B. Stewart was the wife of F. S. Stewart, but this fact did not appear in the document. The plaintiff in the present action carried insurance on the automobile at the instance and request of the General Securities Corporation, and has paid the General Securities Corporation a loss pursuant to the contract of insurance. Prior to the commencement of the action the General Securities Corporation assigned to plaintiff its rights under the contract. On February 12, 1922, F. S. Stewart was in default in his payment to defendant, and upon demand he delivered the automobile to defendant on February 27, 1922, by storing it in a garage in Los Angeles and sending the ticket to the defendant. Thereafter, defendant received the automobile from the garage where it had been stored. R. B. Stewart defaulted in the payments due under the contract sold to General Securities Corporation. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for the possession of the automobile or the sum of $1,500, the value thereof, in case delivery could not be had, and from this judgment defendant appeals. Other facts necessary to the consideration and decision of this appeal are the same as the facts in the case of General Securities Co. v. Reo Motor Car Co., supra. The same rules of law govern both cases.

For the reasons therein stated, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: HOUSER, Acting P. J.; YORK, J.

91 Cal. App. 44

PEOPLE v. EGAN. (Cr. 1440.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 13, 1928.

1. Assault and battery 🔑74—Charge by information held substantially to conform to definition of assault so as to be sufficient to charge such crime (Pen. Code, § 240).

In prosecution for assault with intent to rape, wherein defense was that allegations of information were insufficient to charge an assault, held that since it could easily be gathered from such allegations that defendant was charged with having willfully and unlawfully attempted, coupled with then present ability, to commit a violent injury upon the person of another, the charge substantially conformed to definition of an assault as given in Pen. Code, § 240, so as to be sufficient to charge such crime.

2. Assault and battery 🔑96(1)—Restricting issue to "simple assault" held not error on ground no such crime existed; "simple assault" being "an assault."

Where the information charged assault with intent to commit rape, court's restricting issue to "simple assault" held not error on ground no such crime existed; "simple assault" meaning, because of common usage, "an assault."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Simple Assault.]

3. Criminal law 🔑543(2)—Court held not to have abused discretion in permitting deposition of absent prosecuting witness, taken at preliminary examination, to be read at trial (Pen. Code, § 686, subd. 3).

In prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, court held not to have abused discretion in finding that prosecuting witness could not, with due diligence, be found within state, and consequently permitting, under Pen. Code, § 686, subd. 3, deposition of such prosecuting witness, taken at the preliminary examination, to be read at trial.

4. Criminal law 🔑1169(2)—Judgment of conviction held not reversible even if admission of deposition was improper where evidence was ample to support verdict.

In prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, wherein admission of deposition of prosecuting witness, taken at preliminary trial, was objected to, held on review that even if the admission of such deposition was error because of sufficient grounds not having been laid for its admission, judgment should not be reversed on that ground alone, where evidence was ample to prove assault.

5. Assault and battery 🔑83—Excluding testimony offered by defendant as to previous relations with prosecuting witness held not error, where charge of assault with intent to commit rape was treated as simple assault.

Where, in prosecution under information charging defendant with having committed an assault with intent to commit rape, the charge of an assault with intent to commit rape was eventually eliminated and prosecution proceeded on ground of simple assault, there was no error in court's excluding testimony sought to be given by defendant as to his previous relations with prosecuting witness.

6. Criminal law 🔑768(1)—Defendant calling witnesses dirty liars and vile names held not entitled to instruction that jury should not be prejudiced against him because of outbursts.

Sane defendant calling witnesses dirty liars and calling one witness a vile name during trial held not entitled to instruction that jury should not be prejudiced against him because of outbursts.

7. Criminal law 🔑808½—Instruction on impeachment of witnesses held not erroneus where in statutory language (Code Civ. Proc. § 2051).

Instruction relative to impeachment of witnesses, containing no indication that it was directed toward any particular witness, held not erroneous, where given in identical language of Code Civ. Proc. § 2051.

8. Criminal law 🔑808½—Court's reading to jury Penal Code provision held not error. since provision merely codified pre-existing legal principles on which juries have been instructed (Pen. Code, § 1096, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039).

In prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, court's reading to jury section 1096 of the Penal Code as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039, held not error, for the reason that the section as amended merely codified the legal principles upon which juries have been instructed for years.

9. Criminal law 🔑750—Where criminal charge included lesser offense, court could confine issue to lesser offense included in greater.

Since the charge in prosecution of assault with intent to commit rape included the lesser offense of an assault, trial court had power to confine the issue to such lesser offense.

10. Criminal law 🔑1168(6)—If court erred in confining issue of defendant's guilt to lesser offense included within greater, defendant, being benefited thereby, could not complain.

If the court erred in confining issue of defendant's guilt to a lesser offense included within the greater, defendant, being benefited thereby, could not complain.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Raglan Tuttle, Judge.

Peter George Egan was convicted of simple assault, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest Spagnoli, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State.

KNIGHT, J. Appellant was charged by information with having committed an assault with intent to commit rape. At the conclusion of the evidence the court withdrew from the consideration of the jury the higher grade of crime charged and restricted the issue to "simple" assault by submitting to the jury but two forms of verdict, one reading, "Guilty of misdemeanor, to wit, simple assault;" and the other, "Not guilty." The jury agreed upon and returned the former, and appellant was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail, and thereafter took this appeal from the judgment of conviction.

Briefly stated, the facts established at the trial by the prosecution were as follows: The appellant and the prosecutrix, a Mrs. Ethel Schmilk, occupied different living apartments in the same building. Appellant had entertained some friends at a party held in his apartment during the night, and the next morning about 9:30 o'clock, while still intoxicated, went to the apartment occupied by the prosecutrix, dressed only in his underclothes, knocked at the door, and when the prosecutrix, who was fully dressed, having just come in from shopping, opened the door appellant seized her and started to force her down the hallway toward his room. She screamed and during the struggle which followed she was either knocked or fell to the floor. Appellant tried to muffle her screams, but finally released her and she ran into the street. Some of the neighbors heard her screams and came to her assistance. They summoned two police officers, and upon the arrival of the latter appellant was found in his room partially disrobed, and in conversation with the officers admitted having acted in the manner described by the prosecutrix and stated the purpose he had in mind in attempting to force her into his room. He was placed under arrest and later formally charged with an assault with intent to commit rape.

[1, 2] The first contention made is that the allegations of the information are insufficient to charge an assault and that there is no such crime as "simple" assault of which appellant was convicted. We find no merit in either point. It may be easily gathered from the allegations of the information that appellant was charged with having willfully and unlawfully attempted, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury upon the person of another, and consequently the charge substantially conformed to the definition of an assault as given in section 240 of the Penal Code. As to the second point, although the Penal Code does not employ the appellation "simple" assault in denouncing as a crime the acts mentioned in said section 240, still, ever since the rendition of the decision in the early case of People v. Apgar, 35 Cal. 389, in the year 1868, the term "simple assault" has been repeatedly used synonymously with the term "assault" in the administration of the criminal laws, particularly by trial courts in charging juries and by the reviewing courts on appeals in differentiating between assaults which amount only to misdemeanors and those committed with felonious intent; so that by common usage the term "simple assault" has long since been understood to mean the same thing as "an assault." The case of People v. St. Clair, 56 Cal. 406, cited and relied upon by appellant, does not touch the point. There the defendant was charged with the burglarious entry into a building with intent to commit "larcey" instead of "larceny"; and it was held in substance that since there was no such crime as "larcey" (nor in fact any such word), the charge against the accused was meaningless. Moreover, the record in the present case shows that after the jury had been deliberating a short time, it returned into court and requested an instruction defining simple assault; and, in response, appellant consenting, the court read to the jury section 240 of the Penal Code defining "an assault," and amplified it with other instructions; consequently there could have been no misunderstanding on the part of the jury as to the nature of the charge.

[3, 4] On account of the absence of the prosecutrix from the trial, the prosecution was allowed, over appellant's objection, to read in evidence her deposition taken at the preliminary examination (subdivision 3, § 686, Penal Code), at which time her testimony was taken down by question and answer, appellant being present and represented by counsel, who cross-examined said witness. The substance of the proof adduced as the foundation for the introduction in evidence of said deposition was as follows: Rachel Katz, a close friend of the prosecutrix for 20 years, testified that during the month preceding the trial, which took place on October 26, 1927, Mrs. Schmilk stayed at her apartment, and upon departing went to New York; that later, and on September 23d, she received a letter from Mrs. Schmilk which she knew was in the latter's handwriting, purporting to come from and the same was postmarked "New York"; that she knew Mrs. Schmilk well enough to know that if the latter had returned to California she would have let her know. Further testimony was given by a police officer to the effect that about two weeks prior to the trial he had been given a subpœna to serve upon Mrs. Schmilk, but after a search had been unable to find her; that, although he had not visited any hotels or rooming houses in the city, he had searched for her at her former address and had made inquiries as to her whereabouts from her friends and former neighbors; that he had possession of the subpœna for about a week, and during the week preceding the trial had continued his search by going around the neighborhood where she formerly lived. From the foregoing evidence we are not prepared to hold that the trial court abused its discretion in permitting the deposition to be read in evidence (People v. Lewandowski, 143 Cal. 574, 77 P. 467; People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 77 P. 169; People v. Caballero, 41 Cal. App. 146, 182 P. 321); and in any event, even though the deposition should have been excluded, the judgment should not be reversed upon that ground alone for the reason that, aside from the testimony of Mrs. Schmilk, the evidence is ample to prove an assault (People v. Hayes, 72 Cal. App. 292, 237 P. 390).

[5] In view of the fact that the charge of an assault with intent to commit rape was eventually eliminated from the case, there was no error in the court's ruling excluding the testimony sought to be given by appellant as to his previous relations with Mrs. Schmilk.

[6] Nor do we find any merit in appellant's contentions regarding the instructions. While one of the police officers was testifying, appellant loudly shouted at him, "You're a dirty liar," and called him a vile name; and while one of the women witnesses for the prosecution was testifying, appellant likewise shouted at her that she was a "dirty liar." At the conclusion of the evidence appellant requested the court to give the jury the following instruction: "You are not to be prejudiced against the defendant or his defense because of any outbursts made by him during the course of the trial." We think the instruction was properly refused, for if a defendant on trial, who does not claim to be insane, conducts himself at the trial in the presence of the jury in such a disorderly manner as to lessen the respect the jury would otherwise have for him, he must not expect and much less is he entitled to have the court in its instructions apologize for him.

[7-10] There was nothing contained in the instruction given upon the subject of impeachment of witnesses indicating that it was directed toward any particular witness. It was given in the identical language of section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and was therefore proper. Nor was it error for the court to read to the jury section 1096 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1039), for the reason that the section as amended merely codified the legal principles upon which juries have been instructed for years. The charge made in the information included the lesser offense of an assault, and therefore it was within the power of the trial court to confine the issue of appellant's guilt to the lesser offense. If in doing so a mistake was made, appellant was benefited by it and consequently he is not in a position to complain.

MOORE GROCERY CO. v. LOS ANGELES NUT HOUSE et al. (Civ. 5083.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 11, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑939—Mere appearance of respondent's attorneys at time judge other than one trying case certified transcript held not to authorize assumption that respondent acquiesced therein (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Court of Appeal cannot presume that respondent consented and acquiesced in certification of transcript by judge other than one who tried case contrary to Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, by its appearance in court at the time, and apply rules of Civ. Code, §§ 3515 and 3516, where only record is extract from clerk's minutes merely showing fact of appearance of respondent's attorneys.

2. Appeal and error 🔑612(1)—Requiring judge who tried case to certify record does not require an "idle act" (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a; Civ. Code, § 3532).

To require trial judge who tried case while sitting temporarily to certify transcript, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, cannot be said to require an "idle act" within Civ. Code, § 3532, which the law does not require.

3. Appeal and error 🔑612(1)—Evidence is not presented for review, where transcript was not certified by judge trying case (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Where transcript was not properly certified by judge who tried case, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, there is nothing presented from which a review of the evidence can be made.

E. F. Gerecht and C. W. Hall, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove and Robert B. Murphey, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. This was an action for damages for breach of contract. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff for $1,500 and costs, and from this judgment defendants appeal.

Respondent contends that, upon the record presented, none of the appellants' contentions can be considered because the reporter's transcript on file is not properly authenticated, in that it was not certified by the trial judge, as required by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The case at bar was tried and decided, and the findings and judgment signed by Hon.

George F. Buck, a judge of the superior court of San Joaquin county, sitting temporarily in department 24 of the superior court in Los Angeles county, who then returned to San Joaquin county. A motion for a new trial was made in said department 24 and heard by Hon. Walter Guerin, whose regular department it was. Subsequently, defendants appealed and noticed the settlement of the reporter's transcript before the said Judge Guerin in said department 24, whereupon the following entry was made in the clerk's minutes:

> "Moore Grocery Co. v. L. A. Nut House et al. Case Called. Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove by A. L. Keister appearing for pltff. and E. F. Gerecht by phone consenting the reporter's transcript is settled, allowed and filed as record in this case,"

—and the said reporter's transcript was signed and certified to by said Judge Guerin.

In Bell v. Brigance, 194 Cal. 445, 229 P. 27, the court, after remarking that section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure does not require that the judge who tried the case shall certify to the truth and correctness of the transcript, says:

> "But we may assume, for reasons at once apparent without stating them, that such was the intention of the Legislature."

In the case at bar the record contains an affidavit of Judge Buck, who tried the case, as follows:

> (Title and venue.)
> "George F. Buck, being first duly sworn, deposes and says: That on December 2, 1924, and for some time prior thereto and at all times since, he has been, and is now, a duly elected, qualified, and acting judge of the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, state of California; that he presided at the trial of the above-entitled action in department 24 of the superior court of Los Angeles county, on December 2, 1924, and as such presiding judge signed the findings of fact and conclusions of law and judgment in said action, which were filed with the clerk of the superior court for the county of Los Angeles, state of California, on or about December 9, 1924.
> "That no request has ever been made upon him, nor has he ever refused, to certify to the truth and/or correctness of any reporter's transcript of the evidence introduced and proceedings had at the trial of said action or of any reporter's transcript prepared or attempted to be prepared in accordance with section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure; that he has not been removed from office, and has not resigned his office as judge of the superior court of said San Joaquin county, nor was he absent from the state of California at any time between December 2, 1924, and the date of the making of this affidavit. That at no time has he become disqualified to certify to any reporter's transcript prepared or attempted to be prepared under section 953a, C. C. P., in connection with the above-entitled case. That he is not a party to the above-entitled case, nor is he, nor has he ever been, interested therein in any way, directly or indirectly. That he is not, nor has he ever been, related to any of the parties to said action, or to any attorney, counsel or agent of any of the parties to said action by consanguinity or affinity within the third degree, or otherwise or at all. That he has never been attorney or counsel for any of the parties to said action either in the above-entitled case or proceedings or in any other previous action or proceeding involving any of the same issues, or otherwise, or at all. That he has never given advice to any of the parties in said action upon any matter involved in the said action or proceeding. That he has never had any bias or prejudice against any of the parties to said action.
> "[Signed] George F. Buck."

[1] Appellants argue that respondent consented to, and acquiesced in, the act of Judge Guerin in certifying the transcript by their appearance in court at that time. The only record as to this before us is the extract from the clerk's minutes quoted above from which nothing appears except the fact of the appearance of respondent's attorneys, and there is nothing upon which to base even a presumption that they consented or acquiesced, and to apply the rules laid down by sections 3515 and 3516 of the Civil Code, cited by appellants.

[2] Appellants finally argue that to have required Judge Buck to have returned to Los Angeles for the purpose of certifying the record would have been "an idle act," and that section 3532 of the Civil Code provides that "the law * * * does not require idle acts." But it can scarcely be successfully contended that to require compliance with a Code provision and a rule of the Supreme Court is an idle act and non constat, but that Judge Buck, who was familiar with the evidence, rulings, acts, or statements of the court during the trial, might have refused to certify to the correctness of the transcript. These Code provisions and the rule of the Supreme Court are based upon substantial and real reasons, and are not merely technical, and to require compliance with them cannot correctly be called an idle act.

[3] There is therefore nothing presented from which a review of the evidence can be made. We find no assignment of error by appellants that the findings do not support the judgment. Examining the judgment roll, we find no error which will warrant a reversal being ordered. The findings of the court seem to support the judgment and to have been within the issues made by the pleadings. Yount v. Arakalian Bros. Co., 26 Cal. App. 472, 147 P. 467.

Ex parte HECKMAN. (Cr. 1025.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 6, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 31, 1928.

1. Prisons 🔑9—Technical rules of pleading do not apply to proceeding before prison directors.

Technical rules of pleading, to be enforced when prisoner is charged with offense and brought to trial before a jury, do not apply to proceeding before board of prison directors.

2. Prisons 🔑9—Prison directors act under authority of state laws as interpreted by state courts.

The board of prison directors acts under authority of the laws of California as interpreted by the courts thereof.

3. Prisons 🔑15—Prison directors may forfeit credits of paroled prisoner arrested on charge of violating Harrison Narcotic Act, though acquitted by federal court because of officers' search of his room without warrant (St. 1913, p. 1048, § 1½, as added by St. 1915, p. 981; Pen. Code, § 1588).

Under Pen. Code, § 1588, board of prison directors, irrespective of parole law, St. 1913, p. 1048, § 1½, as added by St. 1915, p. 981, may forfeit credits of prisoner arrested on charge of violating Harrison Narcotic Act (26 USCA §§ 211, 691–707; U. S. Comp. St. §§ 6287g–6287q) while on parol, though acquitted in federal court because of federal officers' search of his room without warrant; commission of crime not being disproved by searching officers' want of authority.

4. Habeas corpus 🔑92(1)—Sufficiency of testimony to justify prison directors' forfeiture of credits for violating parole cannot be considered on habeas corpus (St. 1913, p. 1048, § 1½, as added by St. 1915, p. 981; Pen. Code, § 1588).

Whether testimony before board of prison directors was sufficient to justify forfeiture of prisoner's credits for violating terms of parole under St. 1913, p. 1048, § 1½, as added by St. 1915, p. 981, Pen. Code, § 1588, cannot be considered by Court of Appeal on habeas corpus proceeding for discharge from prison warden's custody.

5. Prisons 🔑15—Evidence that paroled prisoner was violating federal or state narcotic acts authorizes forfeiture of credits by prison directors, though parole officer's charge is technically insufficient (St. 1913, p. 1048, § 1½, as added by St. 1915, p. 981; Pen. Code, § 1588).

Evidence that prisoner on parole was violating Harrison Narcotic Act (26 USCA §§ 211, 691–707; U. S. Comp. St. §§ 6287g–6287q), or any state narcotic or drug acts, is sufficient foundation for forfeiture of his credits by board of prison directors, under St. 1913, p. 1048, § 1½, as added by St. 1915, p. 981, or Pen. Code, § 1588, though charge filed by parole officer is technically insufficient.

6. Pardon 🔑9—Prisoner on parole is under prison directors' jurisdiction and constructively a prisoner of state.

While outside prison walls on parole, prisoner is under jurisdiction of board of prison directors, and constructively a prisoner of the state.

7. Holidays 🔑6—Statutes do not require closing of public offices, nor prohibit exercise of quasi judicial functions by boards or commissioners, such as prison directors, on Saturday afternoon (Pol. Code, § 10, as amended by St. 1923, p. 838; Code Civ. Proc. § 134).

Pol. Code, § 10, as amended by St. 1923, p. 838, declaring every Saturday afternoon a holiday as regards transaction of business in public offices of state, and Code Civ. Proc. § 134, providing that no court except Supreme Court shall be open for transaction of judicial business on holidays, do not require that public offices be closed on Saturday afternoons, nor prohibit exercise of quasi judicial functions by boards or commissioners, such as board of prison directors, acting as state agencies.

8. Holidays 🔑6—Prison directors' forfeiture of prisoner's credits on Saturday afternoon held not invalid (Pol. Code, § 10, as amended by St. 1923, p. 838; Code Civ. Proc. § 134).

Board of prison directors' forfeiture of prisoner's credits on a Saturday afternoon for violating terms of parole held not invalid, under Pol. Code, § 10, as amended by St. 1923, p. 838, declaring every Saturday afternoon a holiday as regards transaction of business in public offices of state; neither such act, nor Code Civ. Proc. § 134, prohibiting actions by such board on Saturday afternoon.

Original application by Albert Heckman for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This is an original application by Albert Heckman for a writ of habeas corpus, praying that he may be discharged from the custody of the warden of the state prison at Folsom. The application is made on the ground that the petitioner is now illegally confined in said state prison; that the illegality consists in keeping him in confinement after the expiration of the term for which he was sentenced.

The record shows that the petitioner was committed to the state prison at San Quentin on the 9th day of August, 1924; that on or about the 28th day of August, 1925, the term of imprisonment of said prisoner was fixed at the period of four years, beginning with his reception at San Quentin on the said 9th day of August, 1924. On the 27th day of February, 1926, petitioner's application for a parole was granted, and on the 14th day of August, 1926, said petitioner was released from the state prison on parole. On the 25th day of

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

June, 1927, the parole granted as aforesaid to said petitioner was revoked, and on the 12th day of September, 1927, the petitioner was received at Folsom prison to complete his term of imprisonment as a parole violator. On the 10th day of December, 1927, all the credits earned and to be earned by the petitioner were declared forfeited on account of the alleged violation by the petitioner of his parole. If the proceedings referred to were properly taken and are valid, the effective discharge date of the petitioner would be October 26, 1928. The petitioner alleges that his credits were illegally revoked: First, for insufficient grounds; and, second, that the action of the board of revoking his credits took place on Saturday afternoon, December 10, 1927, at a time when the board had no jurisdiction to act thereon. The record is silent as to the hour on which the board of prison directors took the action revoking the applicant's credits, but the oral testimony of the petitioner taken upon the hearing hereof was to the effect that it did not take place until after 12 o'clock of that day.

The minutes of the board of prison directors, made a part of the return to the petitioner's application herein, set forth the following:

"Office of the Clerk, State Prison at Folsom, Represa, California, December 10th, 1927.

"S. Q. No. 39766, Albert Heckman, now Fol. No. 14905, Forfeiture of Credits:

"Excerpt of the minutes of the board meeting held on the above date:

"Ed H. Whyte, state parole officer, having charged the above named prisoner with having willfully and with evil intent violated the terms and conditions of his parole and ticket of leave on or about the 15th day of April, 1927, by being arrested in San Francisco, by federal agents, on the charge of violating the Harrison Narcotic Act, and by being held to answer to the United States District Court on this charge:

"This complaint came on for trial at the session of the state board of prison directors held in their meeting room at said prison on the 10th day of December, 1927. The prisoner being in attendance before the board answered the complaint by saying that he was not guilty of the offense thereby charged.

"Proof was made that a copy of the complaint had been personally delivered to the prisoner on the 3d day of October, 1927, together with a written notification of the time and place when and where the complaint would be tried and the prisoner brought before the board to be heard in answer to the complaint.

"Oral and documentary evidence to show the particulars involved in said matter was introduced and considered by the board. Thereupon the board, having duly considered all the evidence, determined that due proof had been made that the prisoner had with evil intent violated the rules and regulations of the prison, was guilty of the offense specified in the complaint, and should be punished therefor by a forfeiture of such time credits as hereinafter specified; whereupon the board resolved that the said prisoner, for the said offense, should be punished by a forfeiture of such time credits as he has heretofore earned, or may hereafter earn, under S. Q. No. 39766, and the clerk was directed to make the necessary entries upon the prison records to carry said determination and resolution into effect.

"Attest: Henry Crowle,
"[Seal.] Assistant Clerk, State Prison at Folsom."

[1-3] Neither the petition for a writ herein nor the return thereto set forth what conditions, if any, were printed upon the ticket of leave given to the petitioner at the time he was allowed to go on parole on the 14th day of August, 1926, and the petitioner calls our attention to section 1½ of the act approved June 16, 1913, Statutes 1913, p. 1048, as amended in 1915, Statutes of that year, p. 981, which section, among other things, provides that the board may, upon granting parole to a prisoner, impose any condition or any term or terms that it may deem proper, etc., and may impose, as a condition, that all or a portion of his credits earned or to be earned may be forfeited, etc.; and, further, that no parole shall be revoked and no credits forfeited without cause, which cause must be stated in the order revoking the parole or forfeiting the credits. The section also provides for a hearing, and that the prisoner shall be given an opportunity to present witnesses, etc. No question is presented as to the sufficiency of notice being given the petitioner of the hearing had by the board of prison directors relative to canceling the credits or forfeiting the credits which the applicant had theretofore earned or might thereafter otherwise be entitled to. The contention in this particular is that the complaint of the state parole officer, upon which the petitioner was arrested and returned to the state prison, following which a hearing was had, was not sufficient in form or substance to give the board of prison directors jurisdiction to act thereon, in that the complaint did not charge the petitioner with the commission of a crime but only with having been willfully and with evil intent violating the terms and conditions of his parole by being arrested on a charge of violating the Harrison Narcotic Act (26 USCA §§ 211, 691–707; U. S. Comp. St. §§ 6287g–6287q). It is true the complaint of the parole officer would not be sufficient, as an information or an indictment, upon which a prisoner might be prosecuted, and would, of course, be subject to demurrer. But we do not think that the technical rules of pleading which the courts are called upon to enforce when a prisoner is charged with some offense and brought to trial before a jury apply to proceedings before boards of prison directors. The minutes of the board of directors which we have set forth show that oral and documentary evidence was introduced to show the particulars concerning the offense charged against the petitioner.

[4-6] We may here state that upon a hearing had before this court testimony was introduced tending to show that the petitioner was acquitted in the United States District Court of the offense charged against him, but that such acquittal was brought about by reason of the fact that the room occupied by the petitioner, in which a narcotic substance was found, had been entered, and the narcotic substance found and taken possession of by federal officers, without first having obtained a search warrant authorizing a search of the room occupied by the petitioner and the seizure of any narcotics found therein. The board of prison directors act under the authority of the laws of the state of California, and as those laws are interpreted by the courts of this state. Under the laws of this state, and the interpretation given by the courts thereof, no such result could be had. Whether a crime has been committed is neither proven nor disproved by the want of authority of an officer who makes a search, and the board of prison directors, in determining whether the credits earned by the petitioner, or to be earned thereafter by him, were not bound by the technical limitations imposed upon federal officers in making searches and seizures. Irrespective of the parole law, the board of prison directors are authorized by section 1588 of the Penal Code to forfeit the credits of any prisoner who shall have violated any of the rules and regulations of the prison or any of the laws of the state, and the action of the board of prison directors is not made to depend upon proceedings which may be taken and had against the prisoner in jurisdictions having no control over the determination of whether a prisoner's credits should or should not be forfeited. The minutes show that the board inquired into the circumstances concerning the alleged offense. Whether the testimony before the board of prison directors was sufficient to justify their determination is a matter into which we cannot inquire upon this proceeding. In the Matter of the Application of Stanton, 169 Cal. 607, 147 P. 264, the Supreme Court held as follows:

> "The courts will not, on habeas corpus, consider the sufficiency of the evidence of a convict's misconduct, on which the board acted in declaring a forfeiture of his credits, or hold their proceedings invalid, if the offense charged is one which can fairly be considered as embraced within the provisions of the statute applying to the forfeiture of credits."

The mere fact of being arrested does not constitute a violation of any law of this state, but an inquiry into all the circumstances pertaining thereto may disclose sufficient evidence to justify the board of prison directors in declaring a forfeiture on account of the misconduct of the prisoner involved, and if the testimony in this case established that the petitioner was violating the Harrison Narcotic Act, or any of the narcotic or drug acts of this state, sufficient foundation would be laid for the action of the board of prison directors, even though the charge filed by the parole officer was technically insufficient. The minutes show that the board made inquiry, that is, they received oral and documentary evidence as to the particulars of the matter, and if we had the power to inquire into the sufficiency of such testimony, there is nothing before us upon which we could act, as the testimony taken before the board is not in the record. During the time petitioner was outside the prison walls upon parole, and at the time he is alleged to have violated his parole, the petitioner was under the jurisdiction of the board of prison directors and was constructively a prisoner of the state. Matter of Stanton, 169 Cal. 607, 147 P. 264; In re Sanders, 47 Cal. App. 368, 190 P. 647.

[7] It is further contended on the part of the petitioner that even though the board of prison directors had cause for forfeiting his credits, the order of the board was made upon a Saturday afternoon, and therefore that such order is invalid, as having been made upon a holiday. In this particular the petitioner relies strongly upon the case of In re Dal Porte, 198 Cal. 216, 244 P. 355. That case had to do with a judgment pronounced in a police court in the city of Santa Cruz, on a Saturday afternoon. Having been pronounced on a holiday the judgment was set aside.

The appellant also cites the note to Moss v. State, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 16. These cases and others might be cited holding that courts cannot perform any judicial functions upon a holiday, and basing his arguments upon the decisions so holding, the petitioner contends that the board of prison directors, in revoking his credits, was acting in a judicial capacity and, therefore, any such action taken on a Saturday afternoon is void.

Section 10 of the Political Code, as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 838), reads: "Every Saturday from 12 o'clock noon until 12 o'clock midnight is a holiday as regards a transaction of business in the public offices of this state," etc. The concluding paragraph of that section also specifies: "All public offices of the state and all state institutions, including the state university and all public schools in the state shall be closed on the 9th day of September of each year, known as 'Admission Day.'" Section 10 of the Political Code does not provide that public offices shall be closed on Saturday afternoon. It simply provides that it is a holiday as regards the transaction of business in the public offices of this state. Outside of what we have stated, there is no prohibition contained in the codes of this state against keeping a public office open. Section 134 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that no court except the Supreme Court shall be open for the transaction of judicial business on holidays, the language being: "No court, other than the Supreme Court, must be open for the transaction of judicial business on * * * holidays * * * except for" specified purposes. The prohibition which we have just set forth refers only to courts. It does not refer to boards or commissioners which may at times be exercising quasi judicial functions. It has been frequently decided that boards of supervisors, commissioners and others which simply act as state agencies are not courts. In the case of Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 247, 187 P. 965, the Supreme Court took occasion to pass upon this question, and after stating that such boards exercise quasi judicial functions, used the following language:

> "Nevertheless it is now well established in this state that tribunals such as the board of medical examiners or other boards empowered to revoke licenses which they have previously granted, for cause defined by the law, are not courts in the strict sense; they are not exercising 'the judicial power of the state' as that phrase is used in the Constitution conferring judicial power upon courts, and that statutes creating such boards and conferring upon them such powers are constitutional."

A number of cases relating to different boards are there cited. See, also, Chinn v. Superior Court, 156 Cal. 478, 105 P. 580, where it was held that a board of supervisors was not a court from which an appeal could be taken, and was not a court within the meaning of that word as used in the Constitution.

It has been frequently decided that as a general rule a quasi judicial act performed on Sunday is valid in the absence of a prohibitory statute. See cases cited and Ann. Cas. 1916B, 16, where a long list of cases so holding are quoted. Following this rule the Supreme Court of this state, in the case of People v. Town of Loyalton, 147 Cal. 774, 82 P. 620, held that an election in that town which took place on the 9th day of September was valid, even though such date was a holiday; that there was nothing within the statutes prohibiting elections on such days. The court there said, with reference to the contention that the holding of an election on the 9th day of September was void:

> "That day being a holiday under the provisions of our statute (Political Code, § 10), it is claimed that no valid election could be held thereon. Appellant has pointed out no statute prohibiting the holding of such an election on a holiday, and we know of none. There is a statutory prohibition as to the transaction of certain judicial business on certain holidays. * * * But the holding of an election does not come within that term. * * * The rule appears to be that on all such days all transactions not within the statutory prohibitions may be carried on as on any other day."

That all acts not prohibited by the statutes may be performed upon a holiday, see, also, note to St. Paul v. Robinson, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 847. See, also, note to Ex parte Seward, 31 A. L. R. 676, where acts of the Legislature on holidays are upheld. Even many acts pertaining to courts may be performed on holidays, such as are purely ministerial. 23 Cal. Jur. p. 970, § 8. In the case of State (Mueller) v. Egg Harbor City, 55 N. J. Law, 245, 26 A. 89, the Supreme Court of New Jersey held that an act which made Saturday afternoon a legal holiday did not apply to proceedings taken before a common council. The act there involved provided that certain days should be considered as holidays so far as transacting business in the public offices of the state was involved.

[8] As we have stated, the record in this case is silent as to the hour of the day on which the board of prison directors took action in the matter of forfeiting the petitioner's credits, but if petitioner's oral testimony taken upon the hearing of his petition be accepted, it shows that the order was made upon a Saturday afternoon, but under the authorities which we have cited, and the fact that the statutes contained no words prohibiting action by the board of prison directors upon a Saturday afternoon, we think that its action, if so taken, was not invalid by any of the provisions of section 10 of the Political Code.

The writ is denied.

RIGNELL v. FONT et al. (Civ. 6078.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 9, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 6, 1928.

1. Automobiles 🔑160(1)—Vehicles and pedestrians must each exercise right to use street with due regard to rights of other.

Neither vehicles nor pedestrians ordinarily have superior right to use of public street, but each must exercise privilege with due regard to the rights of the other.

2. Automobiles 🔑217(1)—Pedestrian must exercise constant vigilance for his own safety while crossing busy street.

Pedestrian is required to exercise constant vigilance for his own safety while crossing busy city street.

3. Automobiles 🔑217(1)—Pedestrian crossing street may rely on expectation that automobiles will conform to customary traffic rules.

In exercise of ordinary care in crossing city street, pedestrian may rely on expectation that automobiles will conform to customary rules of traffic and travel only on proper side of street.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

4. Automobiles 🔑245(67)—Contributory negligence is ordinarily fact question.

In action for injuries to pedestrian struck by automobile while crossing street, question as to existence of contributory negligence is ordinarily one of fact, to be determined by court or jury.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence as to contributory negligence will not be disturbed on appeal.

Where testimony is conflicting as to contributory negligence of pedestrian struck by automobile while crossing street, and finding of court is supported by substantial evidence, it will not be disturbed on appeal.

6. Automobiles 🔑244(36, 50)—Evidence held to support finding that accident was result of automobilist's negligence, and that pedestrian was not contributorily negligent when struck by car traveling on wrong side of street.

In pedestrian's personal injury action, evidence held to support finding that accident was proximate result of defendant's negligence and that plaintiff was not contributorily negligent, where plaintiff was truck after crossing half of street by defendant's automobile, which was traveling on wrong side of street.

7. Witnesses 🔑388(4)—Witness' signed statement of circumstances of accident, not mentioned on chief examination, held properly rejected, notwithstanding reference to it in cross-examination.

Where, in pedestrian's action for injuries when struck by automobile while crossing street, witness of accident was called by defendants and testified, refusal to admit written statement of circumstances of accident previously signed by witness, but not mentioned in chief examination, held not error, notwithstanding that plaintiff's counsel had referred to it in cross-examination.

8. Witnesses 🔑388(2)—Witness must be given opportunity to explain alleged discrepancy before being impeached by evidence of inconsistent statements (Code Civ. Proc. § 2052).

Witness cannot, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, be impeached by evidence that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with present testimony, without calling his attention to specific statements and giving him opportunity to explain or correct alleged discrepancy.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Personal injury action by Carl Rignell against Anthony Font and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and J. E. Reardon, all of San Francisco, and Enid Childs, of Berkeley, for appellants.

Edmund J. Holl, of San Francisco, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of $3,500 which was awarded the respondent as compensation for injuries sustained as a result of having been struck by appellants' automobile while he was engaged in attempting to cross the Embarcadero at San Francisco.

The appellants urge a reversal of the judgment on the grounds that (1) the evidence affirmatively discloses the presence of contributory negligence on the part of respondent; and that (2) the trial judge erred in sustaining an objection to appellants reading in evidence a written statement of the circumstances of the accident made by one of their own witnesses prior to the trial. It is claimed this statement was competent for the purpose of impeachment.

At the time of the accident, the respondent was engaged as a stevedore at pier 29 on the water front at San Francisco. For ten years the appellant Anthony Font had been the manager of the harbor car service for the appellant California Stevedore & Ballast Company, and was thoroughly familiar with the traffic in that vicinity. At the time of the accident, Font was engaged in driving his employer's Chevrolet car northerly among the Embarcadero, which is a broad paved street parallel with and adjacent to the water front north of the Ferry building in San Francisco. Car tracks traverse the westerly side of the Embarcadero, which street, at the time of the accident, was undergoing repairs, in the process of which an excavation had been dug and a mound of dirt was piled in the center of the street leaving an open space of some 25 or 30 feet in width for the use of vehicles on the easterly side. The street was not congested with traffic. At 11 o'clock a. m. on January 24, 1924, the respondent, who was a man in the full vigor of life, possessing good eyesight and hearing, walked southerly from the place of his employment at pier 29 along the sidewalk to a point opposite pier 25, where he paused at the curbing facing the street, and looked both to his right and left for approaching vehicles. Upon the opposite side of the easterly portion of the Embarcadero he observed a truck some 300 feet to the north, traveling southerly at the rate of 8 or 10 miles an hour. Toward his left he saw a car, near at hand, which was being driven northerly close to the curbing upon which he stood. Beyond this car was a Fordson tractor coming slowly along the street in his direction. Behind this tractor, nearly a block away, was the appellants' Chevrolet car approaching in a course near the easterly curbing at a rate of 30 or 35 miles an hour. The respondent waited until the first car had passed the point where he stood, and then proceeded to cross the Embarcadero in a westerly direction for the purpose of obtaining his lunch at a restaurant. He passed ahead of the tractor, and reached a point about 18 feet westerly from the curbing, where he stopped to permit the truck, which was approaching from the north, to pass ahead of him. Here he stood facing southwesterly so as to keep an eye on the truck and at the same time to watch the northbound vehicles which were approaching along the easterly portion of the street. The appellants' Chevrolet had overtaken the Fordson, and, as it passed the tractor, suddenly without warning or the sounding of a horn respondent saw the Chevrolet at a distance of about 25 feet swerve toward him. It was then traveling at the rate of 25 or 30 miles an hour, and apparently its course was changed in order to pass the tractor. Mr. Lawson, the driver of the tractor, testified that the Chevrolet passed upon his left, and that the accident occurred when it reached a point about 25 feet ahead of him. Observing the sudden change in the course of the Chevrolet, the respondent jumped to avoid the collision, but was struck and sustained a compound fracture of the left leg, together with other bruises and contusions. The testimony of Mr. Miller indicates that the Chevrolet ran 25 or 30 feet beyond the point of contact before it was brought to a stop, and skid marks were found upon the surface of the pavement. The respondent's version of the accident was substantially corroborated by two other witnesses. The appellant Font testified that at the time of the accident he was driving northerly at the rate of only 15 to 20 miles an hour, along a course 3 or 4 feet from the easterly curbing of the Embarcadero, when suddenly, without warning and without looking in his direction, the respondent sprang from the curbing directly in front of his machine, and that, in spite of prompt application of his brakes, he was unable to avoid the collision.

[1-6] It is apparent that, if appellants' version of the circumstances were true, the respondent would clearly be guilty of contributory negligence. Upon the contrary, if respondent's version is correct, it follows that this court could not find as a matter of law that he was guilty of contributory negligence, for, after looking both ways before leaving a point of safety at the easterly curbing, he succeeded in crossing nearly two-thirds of the traveled portion of the street to a point where a prudent person would ordinarily have a right to assume he would be safe from north-bound vehicles traveling along the easterly portion of the street. It cannot reasonably be said that, before one may lawfully attempt to cross a busy thoroughfare, in the absence of an ordinance to the contrary, he must wait upon the curbing until he can cross the entire street ahead of all vehicles which may be in sight. If this were true, a pedestrian might wait all day long in vain for an opportunity to venture across a city street congested with traffic. Neither vehicles nor pedestrians ordinarily have a superior right to the use of a public street, but, upon the contrary, each must exercise the privilege with due regard to the rights of the other. Mayer v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 740, 173 P. 174; Kinnear v. Martinelli (Cal. App.) 258 P. 686. A pedestrian is required to exercise constant vigilance for his own safety while crossing a busy city street, but this duty will not ordinarily charge him with contributory negligence merely because he fails to anticipate danger from an automobile which is traveling upon the wrong side of the street. Wright v. Foreman (Cal. App.) 261 P. 481. In the exercise of ordinary care, a pedestrian may rely upon the expectation that automobiles will conform to the customary rules of traffic and travel only upon the proper side of a street. Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55, 161 P. 1155, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560; Averdieck v. Barris, 63 Cal. App. 495, 218 P. 786; Gornstein v. Priver, 64 Cal. App. 249, 221 P. 396. Evidently the trial court accepted the respondent's version of the circumstances of the accident as true. The question of the existence of contributory negligence is ordinarily one of fact to be determined by the court or jury. 1 Thompson on Negligence, 408, § 425; 29 Cyc. 631; Kelly v. Santa Barbara, etc., R. R. Co., 171 Cal. 415, 423, 153 P. 903, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 67; Phillips v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co. (Cal. App.) 264 P. 538. Where the testimony is conflicting as to contributory negligence and the finding of the court is supported by substantial evidence, it will not be disturbed on appeal. 19 Cal. Jur. 783, § 168. The evidence in the present case is ample to support the court's findings that the accident was the proximate result of appellants' negligence and that respondent was not guilty of contributory negligence.

[7] In the course of the trial, appellants called and examined at length Mr. Lawson, the driver of the Fordson tractor. At the request of appellants, this witness had previously signed a written statement of the circumstances of the accident which conflicted in certain respects with his testimony given at the trial. The appellants, however, failed to suggest either to the witness or to the court that this conflict existed, or that appellants were taken by surprise by the testimony which he gave at the trial. The former written statement was not mentioned on the chief examination of the witness. At the close of a lengthy cross-examination by respondent, the following proceedings occurred:

> Mr. Holl, examining the witness for respondent, asked: "Q. When you were 25 feet from the place where you first saw Mr. Rignell, this Chevrolet passed you? * * * A. Yes. Q. Now Mr. Lawson before coming here to-day, I take it (for granted) you discussed your testimony? A. I gave a statement the first day when Mr. Curtaz came around. Q. Who is Mr. Curtaz?"

Mr. Reardon, attorney for appellants, replied: "He is right down there. * * *"

Mr. Holl continuing: "Q. The only person you spoke to since the date of the accident * * * was Mr. Curtaz? A. Yes. Q. That was the written report you gave him at the time? A. Yes."

Mr. Reardon, speaking to counsel for respondent: "I show you the statement. Ask him if this is the statement, as long as you have asked him about it."

Mr. Holl continuing: "Q. Is that the statement? A. Yes."

Mr. Reardon speaking: "Are you going to introduce it in evidence?"

Mr. Holl replying: "No."

Then resuming the examination of the witness: "Q. Mr. Font was there, and you had a blackboard and measurements, and locations were fixed where the accident occurred? A. I didn't see any measurements on it. I told them (it was) between 23 and 25 feet (from me) where the accident occurred. Q. Did you tell Mr. Reardon * * * that this Chevrolet passed your machine * * * 25 feet from the place of the accident?"

Mr. Reardon addressing the court: "I think the statement is the best evidence."

Mr. Holl replying: "I will not press the question."

Thereupon Mr. Reardon took the witness upon redirect examination, and, merely exhibiting the document, asked: "Q. That is your signature? A. Yes. Q. It is dated December 17, 1924, and witnessed by Benjamin Curtaz? A. Yes sir."

Addressing the court, Mr. Reardon then said: "I would like to read it (in evidence)."

Mr. Holl: "I object to that as not proper redirect examination."

The Court: "I will sustain the objection."

Mr. Reardon: "Counsel has gone into it. * * * I would like to make a formal offer of the statement of Harry O. Lawson, dated December 17, 1924, on behalf of the defendants in this case."

The Court: "He has not read any part (of it). * * * He did not say anything about the statement, or its contents. * * * The objection is considered to have been made on the grounds stated by counsel, and it is sustained."

[8] It is contended by appellants for the first time on appeal that they were entitled to read this contradictory statement of their own witness to impeach him. It will be observed, however, that the former written statement was not offered by appellants on the ground that they were taken by surprise at the evidence which was given at the trial; nor did they suggest either to the witness or to the court that this written statement contained assertions in conflict with the testimony given at the trial. No conflicting statements were called to the attention of the witness, nor was his written statement offered to him for his examination. He was not aware of the fact that appellants even contended that he had made conflicting statements, and he was given no opportunity to explain or correct any such variance in the statements which the document may have contained. Upon the contrary, it is evident that the appellants did not offer the former written statement in evidence for impeachment purposes, but rather assumed that, because counsel for respondent had referred to it, therefore they were entitled to have the entire document received in evidence. However, the moment appellants suggested that the document was the best evidence of its contents, the subject was abandoned, and it was not again referred to. No part of the contents of this statement was read or offered by respondent. No foundation was laid for impeachment. There was therefore no error in refusing to receive the document in evidence. Under the circumstances, it was incompetent for any purpose, and the objection was properly sustained. Section 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "A witness may also be impeached by evidence that he has made, at other times, statements inconsistent with his present testimony; but before this can be done the statements must be related to him, with the circumstances of times, places, and persons present, and he must be asked whether he made such statements, and if so, allowed to explain them. If the statements be in writing, they must be shown to the witness before any question is put to him concerning them."

It would be eminently unfair to a witness to seek to impeach him without calling his attention to the specific statements which it is claimed he has fabricated, and giving him an opportunity to explain or correct the alleged discrepancy. This is absolutely necessary before one may impeach either his own or an adverse witness. 6 Jones Com. on Ev. 4810, § 2431; 7 Enc. of Ev. 109, § 6b; People v. Lambert, 120 Cal. 170, 52 P. 307; People v. Orosco, 73 Cal. App. 580, 592, 239 P. 82; Hyde v. Buckner, 108 Cal. 522, 41 P. 416.

The judgment is affirmed.

EARL FRUIT CO. v. HERMAN et al.★
(Civ. 6227.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 5, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 31, 1928.

1. Principal and surety 🔑59—Generally surety may stand upon express terms of contract.

Generally surety is entitled to stand upon express terms of his contract.

2. Principal and agent 🔑143(2), 144—Both agent and principal may sue on contract made by agent on behalf of undisclosed principal.

Where agent enters into contract in his own name on behalf of an undisclosed principal, not only may principal sue in connection with such contract in his own name, but also agent himself may in like manner sue thereon.

3. Principal and agent 🔑144—Agent, procuring surety bond for benefit of undisclosed principals to secure payment for fruit shipped and sold, held entitled to maintain action on bond in his own right.

Where agent selling fruit through one who had guaranteed price, giving bond signed by surety to secure payment, acted for undisclosed principals, held that agent was entitled to sue surety in own right.

4. Principal and surety 🔑151—Agent held entitled to sue on surety bond, which he had procured to secure payment of fruit shipped for principal, as trustee of express trust; "real party in interest" (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 367, 369).

Where agent shipping principal's fruit procured surety bond to secure payment therefor sued on bond, held that agent was real party in interest within Code of Civ. Proc. § 367, by reason of section 369, making one in whose name contract is made for benefit of another trustee of an express trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Real Party in Interest.]

5. Principal and surety 🔑151—That surety bond was specialty would not change situation in agent's action on bond, since distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments was abolished by statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1932; Civ. Code, § 1629).

In agent's action on surety bond, fact that obligation was in nature of specialty held not to change situation, since Code of Civ. Proc. § 1932, and Civ. Code, § 1629, abolished distinctions between sealed and unsealed instruments.

6. Principal and surety 🔑104(1)—Surety bond, given as security for payment of shipments of fruit, held not affected by shipper's taking of trade acceptances which matured date of payment for fruit.

In action on surety bond given to secure payment of shipments of fruit, where one of shippers took trade acceptances from principal on bond which did not extend time of payment but fixed date of maturity, held that terms of bond were not changed by trade acceptances, which consequently did not operate to release surety as by an extension of time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by the Earl Fruit Company against Samuel Herman and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the Globe Indemnity Company appeals. Affirmed.

Hartley F. Peart and Gus L. Baraty, both of San Francisco (Sylvester J. McAtee, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action upon a bond executed by defendant Globe Indemnity Company, as surety, in favor of plaintiff corporation. The complaint, in substance, alleges that on or about the 13th day of September, 1923, the plaintiff, Earl Fruit Company, entered into an agreement with defendant Samuel Herman, whereby said company agreed to make daily shipments of grapes during the season of 1923 to said Herman on consignment, the grapes to be sold by Herman as agent for plaintiff; that Herman agreed to remit to plaintiff the amount received from the proceeds of the sales less any charge for commission to which he might be entitled; that, in consideration of entering into the contract, Herman, as principal, and defendant Globe Indemnity Company, as surety, made and delivered to plaintiff a surety bond in writing conditioned upon Herman faithfully accounting for and properly remitting to plaintiff such moneys as might be due to it from the sale of the grapes. The bond, which is made part of the complaint, is in the sum of $7,500, and it recites that it is to remain in full force and effect until the 31st day of December, 1923. Proceeding, the complaint alleges that, in pursuance of the agreement, plaintiff made shipments of grapes to Herman on consignment, and that Herman, as agent, sold the same, and, on or about December 1, 1923, received the proceeds of such sale, but that he failed to remit to plaintiff a portion of such proceeds amounting to the sum of $3,954.25, which sum it is alleged is now due and owing to plaintiff, and judgment is prayed for in this amount. Defendant Globe Indemnity Company by its answer, among other things, denied ownership in plaintiff of the grapes referred to in the complaint and alleged ownership in one Henry Martin, who, it is claimed, delivered the same to plaintiff, as agent, for shipment to defendant Herman; that thereafter said grapes were shipped to said defendant by plaintiff for and on behalf of Martin, and said Martin thereupon entered into a new agreement in writing directly with defendant Herman without the knowledge or consent of defendant Globe Indemnity Company, whereupon Herman issued to Martin four certain trade acceptances under which the time of payment was extended. It is then alleged that at this time Herman was solvent but thereafter became insolvent and unable to pay for the grapes.

The facts adduced at the trial are without substantial conflict. It appears therefrom that plaintiff, Earl Fruit Company, is a corporation, engaged in the business of buying and selling fruits, including grapes for its own account, and that it handled grapes for others. The grapes concerning which suit was brought were owned by one Henry Martin and some seven others. Prior to September 13, 1923, Earl Fruit Company agreed to ship said grapes to defendant Herman on consignment and under a guaranteed price; said Herman agreeing to remit to Earl Fruit Company the amount guaranteed or received from the proceeds of the sale thereof, less any charge for commission to which he might be entitled. The identity of the various owners of the grapes was disclosed to Herman, together with an estimate of the tonnage to be produced by each owner. It was further agreed that Herman should have the right to sell the grapes to his trade upon credit and was to have a certain period of time in which to make his payments in order to enable him to collect the proceeds of his sales, provided he would furnish to plaintiff a surety bond as security, that he would account for and properly remit to plaintiff such moneys as might be derived from the sale or guaranteed price of the grapes, less his commission, and that the term or duration of said bond would be such as to fully protect plaintiff in securing such proceeds of sale by reason of the credit to be extended to him. Pursuant to such understanding, the bond in question was executed by Globe Indemnity Company in favor of plaintiff upon its own stationery, and was so issued for a compensation. Thereafter plaintiff shipped grapes to Herman to the amount of $8,285.80, and advanced the additional sum of $168.45 for freight charges upon boxes forwarded by Herman to plaintiff for use in shipment. Defendant paid $5,500 on account of this amount, leaving a balance due in the sum of $3,954.25, which is the amount of the demand of plaintiff against defendants. The period for the shipment of grapes having ended about November 1, 1923, plaintiff demanded a statement of account from Herman and payment for the amount due for the grapes shipped to him. Thereafter on or about November 15th following, this statement was furnished, but payment was not made, Herman requesting plaintiff to receive certain trade acceptances, representing the same would mature prior to the expiration of the bond furnished by Globe Indemnity Company, and that the taking of said trade acceptances would not prejudice any right that plaintiff might have against such company upon its bond. Plaintiff refused to take the offered trade acceptances, whereupon Herman interviewed one Sam Martin, son of Henry Martin, one of the owners of the grapes, making like representations to him respecting the offered acceptances. Martin agreed to the proposal and thereupon four trade acceptances, each dated November 15, 1923, were made to the order of Henry Martin for the sum of $998.56 each, payable respectively December 1, December 10, December 15, and December 20, 1923, and were accepted by Sam Martin on behalf of his father, Henry Martin, with the knowledge of plaintiff and in the presence of its representative, but against his consent and without the knowledge or consent of defendant Globe Indemnity Company. Each of the acceptances were presented by Henry Martin for payment and dishonored. Subsequent to the dishonor of the one due December 1, 1923, plaintiff advised Globe Indemnity Company of the execution and delivery of said trade acceptances, the dishonor of the first, and that plaintiff would look to it for payment by reason of the bond. On March 4, 1925, defendant Herman was declared a bankrupt by voluntary bankruptcy proceedings, and the balance due by reason of the transaction was reduced by the sum of $205.62, paid to plaintiff by the assignee, leaving a net balance of $3,748.63. Under these facts judgment was rendered against Herman for this sum and for the sum of $3,580.18 against defendant Globe Indemnity Company, the court holding that the amount of $168.45 advanced by plaintiff in connection with freight charges was not covered by the bond and that such amount should, therefore, be deducted so far as it was concerned.

Appellant Globe Indemnity Company here contends: (1) That the plaintiff, having suffered no loss, it cannot recover from the surety, and, as a corollary, that the plaintiff cannot recover from the surety on behalf of the real owners of the grapes; (2) that even if plaintiff had suffered a loss, nevertheless, due to a material alteration of the contract and of the obligation for the payment of which the bond was given, the surety has been released.

[1-5] In support of the first point, it is argued that plaintiff is not the real party in interest; it never having owned the grapes, and that as to the true owners the surety has incurred no obligation, the bond running to plaintiff as sole obligee and to which alone the surety is liable. In this connection it is claimed that there is no privity of contract between the owners and the surety, and such surety has the right to stand strictly upon the terms of its obligation and to answer solely to the obligee named therein for any loss it may have suffered. While it is generally true that a surety is entitled to stand upon the express terms of his contract, it is equally true, that, where an agent enters into a contract in his own name on behalf of an undisclosed principal, not only may the principal sue in connection with said contract in his own name, but also the agent himself may in like manner sue thereon. The right of an agent to sue on a contract which has been entered into in his own name has met with universal recognition. Whenever the agent contracts directly with a third person, the law allows the agent, treated as a principal, to sue on the contract in his own name, whether the fact of the agency was or was not known to the other contracting party. Tustin Fruit Ass'n v. Earl Fruit Co., 6 Cal Unrep. 37, 53 P. 693; Parker v. Otis, 130 Cal. 322, 62 P. 571, 927, 92 Am. St. Rep. 56; Kelley Clarke Co. v. Leslie, 61 Cal. App. 559, 215 P. 699. The fact, therefore, that plaintiff is not the real party in interest is of no consequence. The contract with Herman, and the bond given by the Globe Indemnity Company were negotiated by plaintiff and entered into by it in its own name. Plaintiff received the grapes as agent of the owners for the purposes of sale, and it sold the same under its agency. Having directly contracted with appellant as a principal, the law allows the agent to sue in his own name, though not the real party in interest, and, as above indicated, the fact that the agency was or was not known to appellant is of no consequence. The rule that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest (section 367, Code. Civ. Proc.) is subject to the further rule that a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another is a trustee of an express trust which permits him to sue with like effect as though he were the principal in fact. (Section 369, Code Civ. Proc.) Nor does the fact, as claimed, that the obligation is in the nature of a specialty alter or change the situation. Whatever the rule may be in other jurisdictions, our Code provisions abolish all distinctions between sealed and unsealed instruments. Section 1629, Civ. Code; section 1932, Code Civ. Proc. Here plaintiff was an agent in whose name the instrument sued on has been executed and he may sue thereon for the purpose of enforcing the obligations thereof. There is no merit in this objection.

[6] The remaining contention that, even assuming plaintiff to have suffered a loss, and therefore entitled to sue in his own name, nevertheless due to a material alteration of the contract and of the obligation for the payment of which the bond was given, appellant has been released, is, in our opinion, equally without merit. The contention is based upon the act of Sam Martin in agreeing to receive the trade acceptances offered by Herman. The trial court found that Sam Martin acted solely on behalf of his father and was not authorized by any of the other growers to take the same. Irrespective of any question of authority in Sam Martin in the premises, it seems clear to us that his act in no manner prejudiced appellant. The bond involved provides that it shall remain in full force and effect until the 31st day of December, 1923. None of the trade acceptances extended the time of payment beyond that period. The bond was given to insure payment of the grapes received by Herman and which he sold on credit. The agreement between the parties with reference to payments to be made by Herman was silent as to any particular due date. At most, the trade acceptances definitely fixed such date. There never was an extension of the time of payment, for without a due date a subsequent agreement fixing such date is not an extension. Such an agreement merely establishes the maturity of the obligation which theretofore had been indefinite. The term of the bond was up to December 31, 1923, and the only meaning this limitation can have is that plaintiff had the right to extend credit to Herman up to this time within which to make payments of the grapes shipped to him. Up to the time of the execution of the bond no term of credit had been definitely agreed upon, and the bond fixed the period so far as the surety was concerned, and the trade acceptances were within the limitation agreed upon. Under these circumstances the terms of the bond were not changed, as the trade acceptances merely marked the period of credit within which the payments were to be made. In other words, they fixed a due date which was still within the period limited in the bond. Tyson v. Reinecke, 25 Cal. App. 696, 145 P. 153.

The judgment is affirmed.

CHARLES R. McCORMICK LUMBER CO. v. O'BRIEN et al. (Civ. 5262.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 11, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⟹931(1)—On appeal from judgment on findings for plaintiff, evidence must be considered in light most favorable to plaintiff.

On appeal from judgment on findings in favor of plaintiff, evidence must be considered in light most favorable to plaintiff's contentions.

2. Mechanics' liens ⟹281(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding that one making alterations in which materials were furnished was house owner's agent, not independent contractor.

In action on materialman's lien, evidence held sufficient to sustain trial court's finding that defendant, engaged by codefendant owner of house to make alterations in which materials were used, was owner's agent rather than independent contractor.

3. Master and servant 🔑5—One without right to control means by which he renders services is "employee," not "independent contractor."

One performing services for another is an employee, not an independent contractor, if he does not have the right to control the means by which the services are rendered; right to control, rather than actual exercise of control, being the test.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé; Independent Contractor.]

4. Master and servant 🔑5—"Independent contractor" is one exercising independent occupation and representing employer only as to results of work.

An "independent contractor" is one who exercises an independent employment or occupation in rendering services, and represents his employer only as to results of work, not as to means whereby it is to be accomplished.

5. Master and servant 🔑5—Whether one rendering services for percentage of cost of labor and materials is independent contractor depends on particular circumstances.

One rendering services for another for a certain percentage of the cost of labor and materials used may or may not be an independent contractor, depending on circumstances of individual case.

6. Master and servant 🔑5—In absence of written contract expressly affirming or negating power of control and direction, court must draw reasonable inferences from surrounding circumstances in ascertaining whether person doing work was employee or independent contractor.

In absence of written contract expressly affirming or negating power of control and direction of one engaged to perform services, it is trial court's duty to draw reasonable inferences from surrounding circumstances in ascertaining whether he was employee or independent contractor.

7. Master and servant 🔑5—Right to discharge and exercise thereof is strong circumstance tending to show that person doing work was employee.

That owner of house had right to discharge one engaged to make alterations when he pleased, and exercised such right, is strong circumstance tending to show that latter was employee rather than independent contractor.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by the Charles R. McCormick Lumber Company against M. J. O'Brien and another. From a judgment against named defendant, he appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Wilde, of San Diego, for appellant.

G. F. Hoff and E. S. Torrance, both of San Diego, for respondent Charles R. McCormick Lumber Co.

Dwight D. Bell, of San Diego, for respondent M. R. Essery.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff alleges in the complaint that it sold and delivered certain building materials to defendants O'Brien and Essery at their instance and request, and seeks to recover the sum of $530.32, the balance due on the purchase price. O'Brien was the owner of a house on which certain alterations were being made, and Essery was engaged to make the alterations under an agreement by which his compensation was to be calculated on the basis of 10 per cent. of the cost of labor and materials used in the work. The defendants answered separately, O'Brien claiming that Essery was an independent contractor, and therefore solely liable, and Essery claiming that he was merely the agent of O'Brien. The trial court found in favor of the contentions of Essery and rendered judgment against O'Brien, who prosecutes this appeal.

[1, 2] Determination of the appeal depends upon the question whether the findings are supported by the evidence. Since the findings are in favor of plaintiff, the evidence must be considered in the light most favorable to its contentions. Hoppin v. Munsey, 185 Cal. 678, 198 P. 398. Nearly all the evidence on the subject is found in the testimony of Essery and certain exhibits received by the court. Concerning the making of the contract, Essery testified:

> "I told him (O'Brien) the only way I would car to handle a job of that kind in the country, and an alteration job, would be on a percentage basis, which would be—I would act as his agent as superintendent, on the basis of 10 per cent. plus cost of the job, and settlement would have to be made every week, at any time he was dissatisfied with me, he could fire me. * * *
> "Q. Then what did Mr. O'Brien say? A. All right. * * *
> "Q. As to the general method of the doing of this construction work by you for Mr. O'Brien, the employment of all labor and the purchase of all necessary material was left with you to attend to, was it not? A. Practically—with his suggestions, of course. He made suggestions, and I advised him. Always advised with him.
> "Q. That is, he directed generally as to what he wanted done and what should be done; but as to the duties of procuring the necessary material and the duties of the necessary labor to carry it out, that was left with you? A. Yes, sir. * * * I drew a sketch of the plan that he wanted, and he kept changing it from time to time, adding to it and enlarging it. * * * I told him that I would handle the work, that the only way I could handle a job like that would be on what we call percentage plan, he to pay all bills, and make a settlement each week, and give me 10 per cent. of the cost for that week, each weekly settlement; that I would handle the job on that basis. And he said that he did not want to bother writing out all these checks, and asked me if I would do it. I told him, if he would give me the money to pay the bills, I wouldn't mind using my checks. I had a voucher check, and showed it to him. And he seemed to think it was a very good arrangement. He said it would please him better because he was very busy; give me one check a week instead of a number of checks. So that was arranged that way. * * * He said he * * * would pay all the bills and give me 10 per cent. for my trouble in looking after it and drawing the plans and furnishing carpenters, and so forth. * * * Mr. O'Brien bought some of the material himself personally."

Concerning the ordering of the material from plaintiff, Essery testified:

> "I told Pearsall it was another percentage job; and just then Mr. Richardson, the bookkeeper, stepped up, he says, 'Who is O'Brien?' I told Mr. Richardson that he was a Canadian gentleman who had been spending his winter here for a number of years, and had rented a house from me once and paid the rent in advance, and had shown me his pass over a Canadian railroad issued to 'Senator M. J. O'Brien,' and admitted to me that was who he was. And Richardson said, 'All right, we'll send that out.' * * * Q. Just one moment. I desire particularly to call your attention to any conversation you had with him as to who you were representing in the matter; whether yourself individually or some other person. A. I don't think I told Mr. McDermott, but I told Mr. Richardson and Mr. Pearsall over the counter.
> "Q. What did you say to them? A. I handed the order in, and told them I had another percentage job here at Grossmont for M. J. O'Brien, and that I had spoken to McDermott about it, and that I had brought this order in for him. They said he was not in, but they would see he got it. Then Mr. Richardson come up and took the order and said, 'Who is O'Brien?' and then I told him, as previously stated, who O'Brien was. And Richardson said he would send it up. Yes, sir. 'All right, we'll send it up,' he said. I told him, of course, he understood that O'Brien was to pay the bills, and he nodded and went back to his desk. That is all there was to it."

Essery further testified that he was discharged by O'Brien before the work was finished. There was received in evidence a letter from O'Brien to Essery, in which the writer states:

> "I have in mind that you complained about not having been able to get labor to do the excavation up there, and I sent you some laborers that applied for work and that were not engaged. These men are now working at Grossmont in the quarry there. They are good men, and all think they should have been employed. I would like to know what was the reason they were not so employed when they were sent. Please be good enough to send me these details as asked for before Saturday. * * *"

Mr. O'Brien, being ill, did not testify.

[3, 4] Sufficient evidence appears in the foregoing to sustain the finding of the trial court that Essery was the agent of O'Brien rather than an independent contractor. It is well settled that one performing services for another is an employee if he does not have the right to control the means by which the services are rendered. 13 Cal. Jur. 1019. In Luckie v. Diamond Coal Co., 41 Cal. App. 468, 183 P. 178, it is stated:

> "The accepted doctrine is that, where the essential object of the employment is the performance of work, the relation of master and servant does not exist unless the employer retains the right to direct the mode and manner in which the job shall be done; or, in other words, not only what shall be done, but how it shall be done."

The right to control is the test rather than the actual exercise of control. Press Pub. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 190 Cal. 114, 210 P. 820; Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 P. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390. "An independent contractor is one who, in rendering services, exercises an independent employment or occupation, and represents his employer only as to the results of his work, and not as to the means whereby it is to be accomplished. * * * The chief consideration which determines one to be an independent contractor is the fact that the employer has no right of control as to the mode of doing the work contracted for." Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 78 P. 337. In Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 P. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390, it is said:

> "The real test by which to determine whether a person is acting as the servant of another is to ascertain whether, at the time when the injury was inflicted, he was subject to such person's orders and control and was liable to be discharged by him for disobedience of orders or misconduct."

In Press Pub. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 190 Cal. 120, 210 P. 823, the court said:

> "In the absence of any express terms affirming or negating the power of control and direction, its existence must be determined from the reasonable inferences to be drawn from all of the circumstances surrounding and attending the making and execution of the contract considered in conjunction with the nature of the contract and the duties ordinarily to be performed thereunder."

[5, 7] One rendering services for another under the so-called percentage plan might or might not be an independent contractor, depending upon the circumstances of the individual case. In the case now before us there was no written contract, and there is an "absence of any express terms affirming or negating the power of control and direction." It was therefore the duty of the trial court to draw reasonable inferences from the surrounding circumstances to determine who had the right to control the means of doing the work. Press Pub. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., supra. We find that O'Brien had the right to discharge Essery when he pleased, and did in fact exercise this right. This is a "strong circumstance tending to show the subserviency of the employee." 13 Cal. Jur. 1034. We also find that O'Brien personally bought some of the material used in the work, an act entirely inconsistent with the claim that Essery was an independent contractor. From his letter to Essery it appears that O'Brien sent laborers to be employed on the job, and demanded an explanation why they had not been put to work. A finding that Essery was an independent contractor would necessarily involve holding that O'Brien had no right to purchase any of the material, and that Essery had the absolute right to determine where each article of the material used should be purchased. In view of all the circumstances, it cannot be said that the trial court was not justified in holding that Essery was the agent of O'Brien rather than an independent contractor.

Counsel have not called to our attention any California decision in which a percentage building contract is construed with reference to the liability of the owner for bills incurred by the builder. Decisions from several other states have been cited, but these do not conflict with the views herein expressed. The statements of facts in the decisions cited are either incomplete as to the terms of the contract or definitely show that the builders had the right to control the details of the work. The case of Carleton v. Foundry & Machine Products Co., 199 Mich. 148, 165 N. W. 816, 19 A. L. R. 1141, relied upon by appellant does not assist him, for the reason that Carleton, who did the work on a percentage basis, had complete control of the details of the work. The court, quoting from an earlier Michigan decision, states:

> "We are of the opinion that the test of the relationship is the right to control. It is not the fact of actual interference with the control, but the right to interfere, that makes the difference between an independent contractor and a servant or agent."

The judgment is affirmed.

JOHNSON v. SCHIMPF. (Civ. 3467.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 12, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 11, 1928.

1. New trial 🔑72—Verdict for plaintiff for damages for breach of contract to convey real property held against weight of evidence justifying granting new trial.

In action for damages for breach of contract to convey real property, evidence held to sustain trial court's finding that verdict of jury for plaintiff was against the evidence, justifying setting aside verdict and granting new trial.

2. Appeal and error 🔑977(3)—New trial 🔑6—Granting new trial is within trial court's discretion, whose action will not be disturbed, absent abuse of discretion.

A motion for new trial for insufficiency of evidence to justify verdict of jury is addressed to sound legal discretion of trial court, and its action in granting new trial will not be disturbed on appeal unless it appears that there was a clear abuse of such discretion.

3. New trial 🔑39—Trial 🔑253(5)—Instructions in action for breach of contract to convey real property held erroneous in failing to submit questions, justifying new trial; "properly" (Civ. Code, § 3306).

In action for damages for breach of contract to convey real property, in which damages for bad faith were claimed under Civ. Code, § 3306, which limits amount recoverable to expenses "properly" incurred by plaintiff in preparing to enter upon land, instructions omitting question of reasonable value of structures which plaintiff alleged he paid for and which payment constituted amount of damages sought and which set forth certain facts to be found, but did not require finding that acts of defendant were in bad faith, held erroneous, justifying trial court in granting new trial; the word "properly" ordinarily meaning in a proper manner; suitably; fitly; strictly; rightly.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Properly.]

4. Costs 🔑264—Neither trial court nor clerk could allow items of cost bill for costs in Supreme Court not filed within statutory time (Code Civ. Proc. § 1034).

Where plaintiff's cost bill for costs in Supreme Court was not filed within time required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1034, plaintiff's objection to hearing of motion to strike out certain items on ground of defective notice of motion to strike is without merit, since neither trial court nor clerk had jurisdiction either to allow or to enter up such items.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by J. W. Johnson against Marie Schimpf. From order setting aside a verdict for plaintiff and granting a new trial and from an order striking out items of plaintiff's cost bill on a former appeal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

granting defendant a new trial. Plaintiff also appeals from an order of the trial court striking out his costs on appeal awarded on a previous appeal.

The action was brought to recover the sum of $4,000 damages for an alleged breach of contract to convey certain real properties situated in the city of Marysville, Cal. A demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint was sustained by the trial court without leave to amend, plaintiff appealed from the judgment entered, and the District Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment of the lower court, but on a hearing in the Supreme Court the judgment of the superior court was reversed. Defendant then answered the amended complaint, and the case was tried before the superior court of Yuba county and a jury. The verdict rendered was for the sum of $3,250.

The following is the order of the trial court made in granting defendant's motion for a new trial:

(Title of court and cause.)

"In the above-entitled matter, the defendant, Marie Schimpf, moves for a new trial upon practically all the statutory grounds, which said motion has been argued by respective counsel and submitted to the court for its decision. The grounds relied upon are specified in the notice of motion, and are: The damages appear to have been excessive; insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; the verdict is against law; errors of law occurring at the trial.

"The action was brought by plaintiff to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff because of the breach by defendant of a contract to convey real property. It will be unnecessary to set out the facts alleged in plaintiff's complaint in detail.

"The court has carefully reviewed the testimony given by the plaintiff and his principal witness, E. E. Venters, upon the trial, and is satisfied that error was committed in the giving to the jury, at the request of plaintiff, of certain instructions, bearing upon the measure of damages found in section 3306, C. C., within the provisions of which section the Supreme Court, on appeal, held that the complaint herein alleged facts constituting a cause of action. The court held on said appeal that plaintiff's recovery should be limited by the concluding clause of said section 3306, C. C., viz.: 'In case of bad faith, * * * the expenses properly incurred in preparing to enter upon the land.'

"Plaintiff claims that he purchased of and from Venters, upon defendant's promise and agreement to sell plaintiff certain land, with the full knowledge, consent, and approval of defendant, the slaughterhouse, shed, corrals and appurtenances on said land of defendant, and paid said Venters therefor the sum of $4,000, in lawful money of the United States of America, the reasonable value thereof, and entered into possession of the premises with the knowledge and consent of defendant and pursuant to said agreement for the purchase of the land, which plaintiff claims defendant promised to sell for $800 per acre.

"His whole testimony shows that Mrs. Schimpf never at any time represented Venters to be the owner of all the slaughterhouses, sheds, corrals and other structures upon the land, but pointed out to him a portion only thereof as the property of Venters. His testimony shows he entered into possession of said property on or about March 10, 1923, and remained in possession thereof until on or about the 1st day of September, 1923, during which time he conducted the business of wholesale meat dealer.

"The case was tried upon the theory that all material averments of the complaint were denied and were in issue, for the defendant denied the alleged oral or verbal agreement with plaintiff in toto, and denied that Venters, her tenant under a lease in evidence, had any ownership in any of the structures upon said land, which were all a part of the realty. In support of her denials, she introduced the lease, subsisting at the time of the alleged transaction with plaintiff, between herself and her tenant Venters.

"A careful scrutiny of the evidence will show that Venters, prior to and at the time plaintiff began his negotiations to acquire the property, was carrying on a wholesale butcher and slaughterhouse business; and although plaintiff himself declared that the sum of $4,000 was paid by him solely for the structures claimed by Venters, Venters, by whose testimony plaintiff is bound, testified as follows: 'Q. By Mr. Carlin. Now, you say you told Mr. Johnson you would take $4,000; did you have a business there? A. Had my slaughterhouse there; yes. Q. You had your slaughterhouse there, didn't you? A. Yes. Q. You were selling the business too? A. Selling what I had there. Q. All the improvements and your business, didn't you, that went with it? A. Well, yes; he took that over.' (Testimony of Venters, pages 4 and 5.)

"This conclusively shows that the sum of $4,000 paid included not only an amount paid for certain structures and improvements, but for the business of Venters as well, and throughout the testimony there is not a scintilla of testimony which would enable the jury to ascertain the value of that business, which, according to Johnson's own testimony, was the principal thing he wished to buy. Of the total sum of $8,389, paid by Johnson to Venters, the excess over $4,000 was paid for live stock upon an inventory of the same, and was not in any sense a payment for the business.

"The instructions of plaintiff do not call attention to this important element of value of the business purchased by Johnson, and, as stated, there is no evidence to throw light upon that matter. Johnson took that business with him when he left the premises and established it on another piece of land about a mile north of the old location.

"There is no testimony at all in the case upon the reasonable value of the structures owned or claimed to have been owned by Venters, and there was nothing before the jury to show whether the price paid by Johnson was the reasonable value thereof, as alleged in the complaint, or not. But, conceding, for argument's sake, that $4,000, the price paid was the reasonable value of all of the slaughterhouses and other structures on the premises, some of them concededly belonged to defendant, as, for instance, the slaughterhouse which was there before Venters ever entered upon the premises, there was no testimony pointing out to the jury the particular structures covered by the alleged transaction between Johnson and Venters, and no testimony to indicate whether $4,000 was a reasonable price for the structures claimed to be owned by Venters, or not.

"Under the averments of the complaint, Johnson entered into possession of the premises on or about the 10th of March, 1925, remained in possession until the following September, during which interval he was in possession of all of the property, including all the structures upon the land—those concededly Mrs. Schimpf's, as well as those claimed by Venters—conducting his wholesale butcher business, for all of which use and occupancy no allowance was made by him in the reduction of his damages, if any, occasioned by her alleged breach of contract to sell the land. Such use and occupancy must have had a very considerable value, and evidence upon that matter should have been offered, not only by the defendant, who denied the existence of any executory contract of sale and also denied any and all damage to plaintiff, but by plaintiff also, and the burden was upon him to establish his actual damage.

"Testimony was offered as to the value of certain structures not definitely described, but consisting of some corral-fencing removed from the premises by plaintiff. Plaintiff declared in one part of his testimony that what he took away was of no value, but subsequently corrected that statement by saying it amounted to not more than $50. The jury evidently rejected his testimony, and made an allowance apparently of $750 from the amount of damage claimed, and there is no possible way to determine how the jury found the credit of $750, because except for Johnson's own testimony there was none at all as to the value of the removed property. It is argued that because the jury placed the credit for the removed property at a much larger figure than named by plaintiff in his testimony, defendant has no right to complain. That argument, however, seems unsound, for perhaps the credit should have been a much larger sum than $750, particularly in view of Johnson's statement that upon his removal he endeavored to tear down fences and corrals so that the premises could not again be used for the conduct of a slaughterhouse and wholesale butcher business. This points to the fact that the verdict was not based upon any evidence adduced upon the trial. It also illustrates that if credit in reduction of damages should have been given, and perhaps was given by guess, for structures and property removed from the premises, further credit should have been given also for the use and occupancy from March to September. It seems apparent also that if the structures were reasonably valued at $4,000, as they stood on the premises for the purposes of the business there carried on, one wrongfully deprived of their use, in destroying or removing some of them, should allow in reduction of his own claimed damage their proper value as they stood prior to the destruction or removal. If, by tearing down and removing parts of them, he could claim such parts had only a nominal value under $50, when, as they stood he claimed they were very much more valuable, perhaps to the value of $4,000, he could not enhance his own damage by their removal or destruction, without giving due credit to the amount of their value when in place on the land.

"The foregoing considerations lead me to conclude that instructions numbered 13, 14, 15, and 16, given at plaintiff's request, were erroneous and misleading.

"Instruction No. 10, also given at the request of plaintiff, in theory drawn in an attempt to conform to the doctrine of estoppel mentioned in Johnson v. Schimpf, 197 Cal. 43, 239 P. 401, in conclusion therein, after the hypothetical statement of facts, that 'it makes no difference whether Venters was, in fact, the owner of the buildings or not,' may perhaps be a correct statement of law, but seems to me to impinge upon the constitutional inhibition against instructing jurors upon questions of fact. It is apparent that the statement, 'it makes no difference whether Venters was, in fact, the owner of the buildings or not,' may have misled the jury into disregarding all the evidence as to the ownership for all purposes. The jury had the duty and the right to consider that question of ownership in weighing the probabilities and the truth as to the alleged oral agreement between plaintiff and defendant. Plaintiff testified flatly that defendant verbally promised, in the event of his buying Venters' improvements on the land, that she would sell the land to him. Defendant flatly denied any such agreement. There were no other persons immediately present except plaintiff and defendant at the conversation.

"The evidence in the case, including the lease between Venters and the defendant, and the testimony that the slaughterhouse was on the premises when Venters first entered under his lease, established without contradiction that Mrs. Schimpf in fact owned all the buildings and structures as a part of the realty, excepting perhaps a few panels of fencing not attached to the soil. It seems improbable that the actual owner, without any apparent, rational motive, would have misrepresented and falsely stated that some one else owned her property, when an ostensible purchaser was trying to buy that same property, and when she admittedly, according to plaintiff's own testimony, was trying to obtain the largest possible price for her premises. There is no evidence of any agreement, either verbal or written, whereby Mrs. Schimpf had ever given or granted any rights to Venters in and to the property other than he had by virtue of his lease. It therefore was very important for the jury to consider the fact as to the real ownership of the improvements in determining whether or not the main agreement for the sale of the land was in fact as claimed by plaintiff, verbally consummated.

"In the opinion of the court, the plaintiff would only be entitled to recover damages in this case at all under the last clause of section 3306, C. C., after establishing by a preponderance of the evidence the existence of the executory oral agreement claimed by him. The preponderance does not appear in that respect to be with the plaintiff, unless the jury considered that foolish and unreasonable statements and promises against her own interest were made by Mrs. Schimpf at the time of the alleged transaction. If the jury rejected, under instruction 10 above cited and under the theory of estoppel, for all purposes, the testimony as to ownership, the contrary conclusion as to the main agreement, which plaintiff is not seeking to enforce in this proceeding, might well have been reached.

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant's motion for new trial be and it hereby is granted.

"Dated July 15, 1926.

"Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge."

[1, 2] It is apparent from the foregoing order that the trial court came to the conclusion that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence and that certain erroneous instructions were given. The order should be affirmed if the court's action can be sustained on either of those grounds. An inspection of the record discloses two main issues of fact in the case arising under the pleadings, both of which had to be determined in plaintiff's favor to justify a verdict in his favor.

The damages sought are for breach of an alleged contract of the defendant to sell certain land to plaintiff. Whether the contract was oral or written does not appear from the complaint, but the evidence at the trial discloses that the contract, if any, was an oral one. Its making is positively denied by the answer of defendant. Whether or not there was a contract of defendant to sell any land to plaintiff was therefore a most vital issue in the case.

The damages sought were not the damages ordinarily arising through breach of a contract to convey or sell real property but depend entirely upon determining that the refusal to convey the lands was in bad faith on the part of defendant, and the measure of the damages recoverable, even if defendant's bad faith was shown, was the expenses properly incurred by plaintiff in preparing to enter upon the land, in accordance with the rule prescribed in section 3306 of the Civil Code.

Plaintiff claimed that he was misled by statements of defendant into paying one Venters $4,000 for buildings on the property, which, plaintiff alleged, Venters, a lessee of defendant and in possession of the property, represented he owned, which statement he alleges defendant confirmed by her oral declarations made to him when he negotiated with her for a sale of the lands on which the buildings were situated. The reasonable value of the buildings is alleged in the amended complaint to be the sum of $4,000. Outside of the statement of plaintiff that he paid Venters $4,000 for the buildings there is nothing in the evidence offered to show what was the reasonable value of the buildings on the property. Part of the structures were removed from the land after defendant refused to make and execute a deed and the evidence is not at all clear or satisfying as to the reasonable value of the property so removed. There is a flat conflict in the evidence on all the material issues in the case and it does not disclose or suggest a motive or reason for defendant representing that her lessee and not herself owned the buildings or structures placed on her premises. Her lease to Venters introduced in evidence is silent as to the disposition of improvements on its termination and the improvements made as disclosed by the evidence were of the character which would ordinarily be deemed affixed to the land in the absence of an agreement providing for their removal by a lessee at the termination of his leasehold.

A consideration of all the evidence offered amply supports the conclusion of the trial court that the verdict of the jury was against the weight of the evidence. The rule laid down by the Supreme Court in Wendling, etc., Co. v. Glenwood, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 411, 95 P. 1029; Warner v. Thomas, etc., Works, 105 Cal. 409, 38 P. 960; Gordon v. Roberts, 162 Cal. 509, 123 P. 288; Empire Investment Co. v. Mort, 169 Cal. 732, 147 P. 960; and Tweedale v. Barnett, 172 Cal. 271, 156 P. 483; Bjorman v. Fort Bragg Redwood Co., 92 Cal. 500, 28 P. 591; Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 411, 35 P. 1024, that a motion for a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict of a jury is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court and that its action in granting a new trial will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it appears that there was a clear abuse of such discretion, should be applied in this case.

[3] An examination of the instructions given which the trial court refers to and discusses in its order granting the new trial satisfies this court that the conclusion reached by the lower court that these instructions were erroneous must be sustained. The damages recoverable in this action are limited to the expenses which plaintiff properly incurred in preparing to enter upon the lands. Plaintiff is in a position resembling that of a buyer of property who is deprived of its possession. The general rule measuring damages in such cases is deemed to be the price for which plaintiff might have bought an equivalent thing in the market nearest to the place where the property ought to have been put into his possession. The general rule regarding the extent of damages in all classes of actions is set forth in section 3359 of the Civil Code, which provides that damages in all cases must be reasonable. Section 3306 of the Civil Code does not provide that any and all expenses incurred by plaintiff in preparing to enter upon the lands are recoverable, but limits the amount recoverable to those properly incurred. The ordinary meaning of the word "properly" is: "In a proper manner; suitably; fitly; strictly; rightly." The view of the trial court as to the meaning of the word "properly," as used in section 3306 of the Civil Code, when making its order granting the new trial, apparently was that it meant such sum of money as the Venters structures were reasonably worth when he sold them to plaintiff. That such was the belief of the plaintiff when he instituted this action seems manifest from the allegation in his complaint that these structures were of the reasonable value of $4,000. In the instructions given to the jury there was no direction that the reasonable value of the Venters structures was a material fact for consideration and determination. That the jury desired instructions on this question is evident from a request made by it to the court during its deliberations as to whether or not it had the authority to appraise the value of the buildings. In answer to this, the court simply reread its previous instructions, all of which are silent in this regard.

Instruction numbered 13 given the jury reads as follows:

> "The amount of money, if any, which plaintiff paid to Venters for the buildings and appurtenances situated upon the land in question, is an expense properly incurred in preparing to enter upon the land within the meaning of the law, if you find that any amount was so paid by plaintiff in reliance upon defendant's promise to sell and convey to him the land in question, and if you further find from the evidence, that plaintiff is entitled to damages for the breach by defendant of the alleged agreement to sell and convey the land in question, then the amount of money, if any, so paid to Venters by plaintiff, less such amount as you may find to be the reasonable value of any of said buildings and appurtenances, if any, which you may find plaintiff did remove from the land, should be allowed to plaintiff as damages, and your verdict should be for the plaintiff and against the defendant for such amount of money."

This instruction not only omits to instruct on the question of reasonable value of the venters structures, but also instructs as to the facts upon which if the jury finds them to exist its verdict should be for plaintiff. The instruction sets forth certain facts which must be found, but fails to specify that before any damages can be awarded, the jury must find that the acts of defendant were in bad faith. That in this class of damage actions the bad faith of a vendor is a principal question for determination and that it is a fact for the jury to find and determine is clearly decided by the Supreme Court in the case of Hamaker v. Bryan, 178 Cal. 128, 172 P. 391.

Instructions numbered 14, 15, and 16, given at plaintiff's request, are erroneous for the same reason as is instruction No. 13, in failing to specify as matters to be considered and found upon by the jury in arriving at the amount of damage allowable, the reasonable value of the Venters structures and the bad faith of the defendant.

[4] Plaintiff filed a cost bill after judgment in which certain costs on the former appeal of this case amounting to the sum of $110.75 were included, which items on motion were stricken out and disallowed by the trial court. It is not disputed that the remittitur from the Supreme Court was filed with the clerk of the trial court on October 15, 1925, and that the cost bill in question was not filed until May 24, 1926. Under section 1034, Code of Civil Procedure, plaintiff's costs in the Supreme Court should have been filed within 30 days after the remittitur was filed with the clerk of the trial court. As the statutory time for filing the cost bill had expired when it was filed, so far as costs on appeal are concerned, there is no merit in plaintiff's objection interposed to the hearing of the motion to strike out these costs on the ground of defective notice of motion to strike, as there was no jurisdiction in the trial court, or its clerk, to either allow or enter up these items. Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 529, 2 P. 418; Riddell v. Harrell, 71 Cal. 254, 12 P. 67; People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 P. 651; Griffith v. Welbanks & Co., 26 Cal. App. 477, 147 P. 986.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed, and the order striking out the items of plaintiff's costs on the former appeal is affirmed.

BURTON v. CURTIS. (Civ. 5100.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 12, 1928.

1. Reformation of instruments 🔑45(15)—Evidence sustained finding of mistake in sale contract by plaintiff, which defendant knew or suspected, authorizing its reformation (Civ. Code, § 3399).

On plaintiff's prayer for reformation of contract for sale of certain personal property, evidence held to sustain trial court's finding, that insertion of certain word had its origin in the mistake of plaintiff, which defendant at the time knew or suspected, by reason of which alleged mistake, contract failed to express truly the intention of the parties, within Civ. Code, § 3399, authorizing court to reform contract.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1033(8)—Defendant cannot complain of allowance of brokerage commission as offset to defendant because not raised by issues, since defendant was benefited thereby.

In action for breach of contract, whereby defendant was to resell the property and credit plaintiff with excess over certain amount, defendant cannot complain of an allowance to her as an offset of reasonable brokerage commission for sale of property because no issue as to it was raised, since defendant was benefited thereby.

3. Sales ⟹384(1)—Defendant, in action for breach of contract, held not entitled to credit for sum paid for assignment of lease other than one provided for in contract.

Where contract for sale of certain personal property by plaintiff to defendant and its resale by latter provided for allowance to defendant of certain sum as payment to landlord for assignment of lease from plaintiff to defendant, in action for breach of such contract, defendant was not entitled to allowance for sum paid for an assignment of lease other than from plaintiff to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Action by Martha A. Burton against Emma F. Curtis for damages for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. M. Harker and Harry Hirsh, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles E. Williams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. The main purpose of the action in controversy was to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract. In order to establish that a breach of the contract had occurred, it was first necessary that the contract as signed by the parties there be reformed. It appears that the plaintiff, who was the owner of certain personal property consisting of the furniture and furnishings of an apartment house, sold the same to defendant, and that, according to the final written agreement between the parties, whatever sum in excess of $16,500 "net" was received by defendant on a resale by her of the property was to be placed to the credit of plaintiff on account of an indebtedness of $2,500 owing by plaintiff to defendant, which indebtedness was evidenced by a promissory note and trust deed. A part of such indebtedness arose from the claim of defendant that the sum of $500 thereof represented the cost of assigning from plaintiff to defendant a lease of the real property upon which stood the apartment house in which the furniture and furnishings sold by plaintiff to defendant were located.

In accordance with the allegations contained in the complaint, on the trial of the action plaintiff attempted to prove that, notwithstanding the language of the contract as finally written, to wit, in effect that whatever sum in excess of $16,500 net for which the property might be sold was to belong to plaintiff, the intention of the parties was that any sum in excess of $16,500 (omitting the word "net") which the property might bring on a resale was to become the property of plaintiff.

[1] Section 3399 of the Civil Code provides that:

> "When, through fraud or a mutual mistake of the parties, or a mistake of one party, which the other at the time knew or suspected, a written contract does not truly express the intention of the parties, it may be revised on the application of a party aggrieved, so as to express that intention. * * *"

Originally the proposed contract between the parties, which plaintiff had read, or which had been read to her, and with which she was thoroughly familiar, did not contain the word "net" in connection with the resale price of the personal property. No claim is made by plaintiff that the interlineation of the word "net," following the figures "$16,500," arose from a "mutual mistake of the parties"; but the prayer of the complaint for a reformation of the contract rests on the allegation that the insertion of the word "net" had its origin in the "mistake of one party which the other at the time knew or suspected," and by reason of which alleged mistake the contract failed to "truly express the intention of the parties." The findings, conclusions of law, and judgment by the trial court are all in accordance with the allegations of the complaint. Appellant, however, contends that such findings of fact are not supported by the evidence. An examination of the testimony of plaintiff shows that, so far as she was concerned, at the time she signed the contract she had no knowledge that the word "net" followed the statement of the resale price of $16,500, and assumed that no change had been made in the language used in the contract between the time when she read it, or it was read to her, and the time when the contract was signed by her. On the other hand, defendant testified to facts from which it appeared that she had knowledge of the fact that such change had been made. The conclusiveness of the finding that such change was made without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, and that the alleged mistake on the part of plaintiff in signing the contract in its altered form constituted a mistake on her part which was known or suspected by defendant, depended entirely upon the credibility which the trial court accorded to the testimony of the several witnesses in the case. While witnesses on behalf of defendant testified in substance that prior to the time when plaintiff signed the contract the matter relating to the appropriate insertion therein of the word "net" was fully discussed by plaintiff and defendant in the presence of witnesses, and that at the same time, with the consent of plaintiff, such word was interlined in the language of the contract as it finally appeared, it was the province of the judge of the trial court to weigh the evidence and to determine where lay the truth. He had the right to accept as true the whole or any part of the testimony of any of the witnesses; and, judging solely from the findings, it is clear that he adopted as true the statement on the part of plaintiff that she did not know of the change made in the contract, and from the testimony of defendant and her witnesses, that at the time the contract was executed defendant "knew or suspected" that the "mistake" on the part of the plaintiff had been made. It follows that appellant's point cannot be sustained.

[2] Appellant also complains that after in substance finding that the contract (as finally written and signed) with the word "net" following the stipulated basic resale price of $16,500 for the personal property did not "truly express the intention of the parties," but that the contract should be revised so as to express their intention to the effect that the resale price might be $16,500, without reference to whether such sum was to be considered as "net," the further finding of fact was made by the court that the sale of the personal property was made for the sum of $19,000, and that in the circumstances defendant should be allowed a 5 per cent. commission as a reasonable brokerage charge to be paid to the agents who brought about the sale, as an offset against the difference between the sale price of $16,500 and the $19,000 for which the personal property was actually sold. Appellant directs attention to the fact that no issue was presented by the pleadings as to what constituted a reasonable brokerage commission for the sale of the property, as well as to the further fact that no evidence was introduced by either party to the litigation with reference thereto. It is apparent that, if the proposed sale price of $16,500 was not to be construed as "net," and in pursuance of the terms of the contract between the parties a credit for broker's commission for effecting a sale of the personal property was not within their contemplation, no allowance therefor should have been made to defendant by the trial court. But it is also clear that, by allowing such a commission as an offset to defendant, she was benefited thereby to the extent of $950, and consequently cannot be heard to complain on account thereof.

[3] In the original transaction between the parties, in payment of the furniture and furnishings belonging to plaintiff, defendant transferred and conveyed to plaintiff certain real property. In order to adjust the difference in values of the respective properties, etc., it was agreed that plaintiff give to defendant a note and trust deed, amounting to the sum of $2,500, covering the real property in the transaction. The agreement then provided that:

> "And it is further agreed that the party of the first part (defendant) will use $500 of the amount secured by said trust deed note in her favor to pay the amount demanded by the landlord of the said Hirsh Apartments as a condition precedent to securing an assignment of the lease of said premises from party of the second part (plaintiff) to party of the first part (defendant), the remaining $2,000 secured by trust deed note to be and remain the property of the party of the first part, subject to the conditions hereinafter stated."

On the trial of the action, it was shown that plaintiff never had a lease of the real property upon which the apartment house was located, and consequently that nothing was paid by defendant for the assignment of such supposed lease. However, it was shown that several months later, when the furniture and furnishings were resold, defendant did pay the sum of $500 to the landlord for an assignment of a lease which she had acquired from the landlord after the original transaction had taken place between the plaintiff and defendant. The conclusion of the trial court was that defendant held the $500 for the use and benefit of plaintiff, and judgment was ordered accordingly. With reference thereto, appellant does not contend that the evidence does not support the findings. The criticism is that, as it appeared that the $500 was actually spent by defendant in obtaining an assignment of a lease, defendant should not be obligated to repay the amount to plaintiff. But it should be remembered that the agreement was that the $500 should be used for the purpose of obtaining a particular assignment of a specified lease, which was not the assignment which defendant procured, and that, according to the finding and conclusion by the trial court, the amount actually paid by defendant for the assignment could not be credited to her, for the reason that the contract between the parties (as reformed) did not permit of such allowance to defendant on a resale of the personal property.

It is ordered that the judgment be and it is affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF ORLAND v. BALL, County Treasurer. (Civ. 3488.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 6, 1928.

1. Agriculture 🔑5—Counties 🔑167—Statute does not authorize supervisors to delegate powers or aid private persons who have taken on themselves the conduct of county fair or other advertising effort; assignee of county warrant issue to agricultural association could not recover thereon (Pol. Code, § 4041, subds. 6, 33).

Pol. Code, § 4041, subds. 6 and 33, relative to board of supervisors advertising the county and to the conducting of county fairs, does not authorize county boards of supervisors to delegate their powers or to assist private persons who have taken on themselves the conduct of a county fair or other advertising effort, and hence assignee of county warrant issued to agricultural association to maintain county fair could not recover thereon.

2. Counties 🔑50—Power vested in board of supervisors to perform certain acts cannot be delegated.

Power vested in the county board of supervisors to perform certain acts cannot be delegated.

Application by the First National Bank of Orland, a corporation, for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to E. S. Ball, as Treasurer of the County of Glenn, requiring him to pay a certain warrant. Writ denied, unless amended petition be filed within stated time.

George R. Freeman, of Willows, for petitioner.

R. M. Rankin and Duard F. Geis, both of Willows, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This is an original application by the petitioner praying that a writ of mandate be directed to E. S. Ball, as the treasurer of the county of Glenn, to pay a certain purported warrant drawn upon the county treasurer of the county of Glenn, by J. W. Monroe, the auditor of said county.

The amended petition filed herein sets forth the following: The corporate existence of the plaintiff; the official character of the defendant; the fact of Monroe being the duly elected, qualified, and acting auditor of the county. The petition then recites:

"That on July 18, 1927, the board of supervisors of the county of Glenn duly made its order and appropriation in the words and figures following, that is to say: 'Ordered that the sum of $2,000 be, and is, appropriated from the advertising and exhibit fund, and allowed to the Glenn County Live Stock & Agricultural Association towards the maintenance of the annual Glenn County Fair, thereby inducing immigration to the county, and the auditor is directed to issue a warrant on said fund in favor of the secretary of said association covering said allowance. The petition then alleges that, in pursuance of said order, the auditor of said county proceeded to draw two warrants in the words and figures following, to wit:

"State of California, County of Glenn Auditor's Office, Glenn County, Calif. The County Treasurer of Glenn County will pay to Glenn
No. 704
August 9, 1927
$1000.00
County Agricultural Assn. or order the sum of One Thousand and no/100 dollars for donation to Glenn County Fair accrued August 9, 1927, allowed August 9, 1927, and charge to Advertising and Exhibit.
"[Signed] J. W. Monroe, Auditor,
"By Marion Banning."

"State of California, County of Glenn Auditor's Office, Glenn County, Calif. The County Treasurer of Glenn County will pay to
No. 1152
August 17, 1927
$1000.00
Glenn Co. Agricultural Assn. or order the sum of one thousand dollars for donation to Glenn County Fair, accrued August 17, 1927, allowed August 17, 1927, and charge to Advertising and Exhibit.
"[Signed] J. W. Monroe, County Auditor."

The petition then alleges that, after the issuance of said warrants, they were duly assigned to the petitioner herein, were presented for payment, and payment refused. Following these allegations, the petition sets forth that on the 7th day of September, 1927, the board of supervisors of Glenn county levied a tax of one cent on each $100 of the assessed valuation of the property of said county, to be used for advertising purposes, etc., as provided in subdivision 33 of section 4041 of the Political Code, and that, at the time of the presentation of said described warrants, there was, and is now, in the hands of the respondent as treasurer of said county, to the credit of the advertising fund of said county, the sum of $1,544.60, and that there will be available in said fund before the end of the present fiscal year the sum of $2,300. The prayer of the petition is that a mandate issue from this court directing the treasurer to forthwith pay the warrant dated August 9, 1927, and numbered 704.

Upon the return date named by this court in its order to show cause the respondent herein filed a demurrer to said petition, setting forth the following grounds: That said petition fails to state facts sufficient to warrant a writ of mandate; that the board of supervisors of said county of Glenn, on July 18, 1927, had no power or authority under the laws of this state to make the order and appropriation alleged in said petition; that the said appropriation purports to be and constitutes a donation or gift of the funds of the county of Glenn raised by taxation, and is prohibited by the express provisions of section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution of the state of California; that it does not appear from said petition what amount a tax levy of one cent on each $100 of assessed valuation of all property within said county would produce; nor does it appear that the said sum of $2,000, attempted to be appropriated as alleged does not exceed 70 per cent. of the auditor's estimate of revenue for the fiscal year of 1927-1928, that will accrue to the advertising and exhibit fund of said county of Glenn; that it does not appear from said petition that any warrant was issued in favor of the secretary of Glenn County Live Stock & Agricultural Association pursuant to the alleged appropriation; that it does not appear that any claims were filed against said county pursuant to the provisions of sections 4075 and 4076 of the Political Code; that it cannot be ascertained from said petition that said donation or appropriation was in consideration of any services rendered to the county of Glenn by the Glenn County Live Stock & Agricultural Association. Other grounds of demurrer were also set forth, but, not being of vital importance, are not herein stated. Subject to the demurrer, the respondent also filed an answer. The cause was then argued and submitted for the court to first determine the merits of the demurrer, and, in the event the demurrer should be overruled, to take up and consider the facts and the law as presented by the petition and answer and the accompanying proofs.

Before taking up and considering the questions presented by the respondent's demurrer, we may here state that the act approved May 9, 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 621), amending section 4056b of the Political Code, did not become effective until some days after July 19, 1927, the day upon which the board of supervisors of the county of Glenn purported to make the appropriation as set forth in the petition. Hence, whether any of the provisions contained in said amendatory act would authorize the appropriation of money as attempted herein, or whether said act or any portion of the amendment to section 4056b of the Political Code is violative of section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution, is not before us for consideration.

At the time of the passage of the resolution by the board of supervisors of the county of Glenn, subdivision 33 of section 4041 of the Political Code constituted the only authority for any act on the part of the board of supervisors relative to the levying of a tax to raise money for advertising, exploiting, and making known the resources of the county of Glenn, as attempted by the resolution herein set forth. Subdivision 33 of section 4041 of the Political Code then read as follows:

> "To levy a special tax not to exceed two cents on the one hundred dollars of the assessed valuation of all property within the county to be used for advertising, exploiting and making known the resources of the county for the purpose of inducing immigration [thereto], and increasing the trade and commerce of, said county, or for the purpose of exhibiting or advertising the agricultural, mineral, or other resources of the county; and provided, however, that if said rate of two cents will not raise five thousand dollars in any one year the boards of supervisors may appropriate from the general fund of the county an amount sufficient to make up the deficiency existing between the amount raised as the result of the two cent levy and five thousand dollars; and provided, further, that such tax shall be in addition to any tax which may now or hereafter be authorized to be levied for the purpose of creating a fund to be used for collecting, preparing and maintaining an exhibition in any domestic or foreign exposition; and provided, further, that nothing herein contained shall prevent any county from creating a bonded indebtedness under the provisions of section four thousand eighty-eight of the Political Code of California for the purpose of obtaining funds with which to build, construct or furnish an exposition building or buildings for exhibiting and advertising its resources."

[1] There is nothing in this section which authorizes the board of supervisors to make any appropriation or any donation to finance, or assist in financing, any county fair conducted by a private association or by an association of private individuals. The subdivision set forth herein does authorize the county to levy a tax to be used for advertising, exploiting, and making known the resources of the county. In other words, it authorizes the board of supervisors to perform such services either by itself or by its agents, duly appointed, or with whom it has contracted for such purposes. However, it does not authorize the board of supervisors, in the event that some private association or association of individuals may go to work and hold a fair, to make either an appropriation, donation, or gift to such private association or association of individuals to aid in the financing or paying the expenses thereof after such fair has been held. To state that matter again in another form, the subdivision of the section referred to authorizes the board of supervisors, under its own management, direction, and control, to expend certain funds of the county, raised in a certain manner, for the particular purposes mentioned. There is nothing in the subdivision of the section set forth authorizing boards of supervisors to delegate their powers or to assist or aid private persons who have taken upon themselves the conduct of a county fair or other advertising efforts. Subdivision 6 of section 4041 of the Political Code authorizes the board of supervisors of counties to acquire and maintain buildings in which to hold expositions, etc., but there is nothing in that section authorizing the board of supervisors to delegate such powers.

[2] In the case of Stowe v. Maxey, 258 P. 717, this court had occasion to go extensively into the subject of delegation of powers by boards of supervisors, and we need only to refer to that case as authority to the point that power vested in a board of supervisors to perform certain acts cannot be delegated.

Upon the face of the petition, the order of the board of supervisors and the warrants drawn by the auditor appear to be a donation or a gift from the funds of the county to the Glenn County Live Stock & Agricultural Association. This, of course, is not authorized by subdivision 33 of section 4041 of the Political Code, and, if authorized, would contravene section 31 of article 4 of the state Constitution. Directing our attention more specifically to the petition, we find that there is no allegation contained therein, and nothing from which it can be inferred, that the board of supervisors of Glenn county ever contracted with any one for the collection or exhibit of agricultural or other resources of the county for the purposes of making, or to make, an exhibit thereof for the purposes of advertising such resources or for any purpose whatsoever. The petition does not show that the board of supervisors ever took any action whatever employing, authorizing, or contracting with any one to make such an exhibit. Whether such an exhibit was ever made does not appear from the petition. There being no showing that the board of supervisors of Glenn county ever took any action toward making such an exhibit or contracting with any one for such an exhibit, it follows that the petition fails to show that the county of Glenn ever became obligated to pay any individual or association of individuals for such service. No claim appears to have been presented showing the performance of such service, and, so far as the petition is concerned, there was no foundation laid for the appropriation of any money from the advertising fund, and no foundation laid for the issuing of the warrants set forth in the petition. Upon oral argument, it was suggested that donations and appropriations had been made by the supervisors of Glenn county for many years as set forth in the petition. We do not very well see how the want of legislative authority can thus be supplied or a constitutional section amended by long-continued violations. It may be further added that the petition does not show that the requirements of section 4071 of the Political Code as to the aggregate of allowances which may be made against any fund prior to the 1st day of January of any fiscal year had been complied with.

Without going more specifically into the various objections urged by respondent, it is sufficient to say that what we have set forth shows that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the respondent's demurrer must be sustained. As counsel for petitioner requested permission to amend in the event that respondent's demurrer should be sustained, and not being advised as to whether the defects in the petition herein pointed out may be cured, time will be given for the filing of an amended petition, if the petitioner is so advised.

It is therefore ordered that the demurrer interposed to the petition herein be sustained, with leave to the petitioner to file an amended petition, if so advised, within 30 days after the filing of this opinion, and, if such amended petition be not filed, then and in that event the prayer of the petition for a writ of mandate stands as denied.

We concur: HART, Acting P. J.; BUCK, Justice pro tem.

SHAVER et al. v. UNITED PARCEL SERVICE et al. (Civ. 6163.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 11, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 6, 1928.

1. Automobiles 🔑245(2, 68)—Negligence and contributory negligence held for jury, in action for death of one trying to stop loaded runaway trailer which crossed highway.

In action for death resulting from collision between automobile and loaded runaway trailer which rolled from gravel bunker adjacent to highway across road, and which deceased was trying to stop at the time of the accident, issue of negligence of truck driver and contributory negligence of deceased held for jury.

2. Evidence 🔑241(1)—Admissions of employee not prompted by excitement of accident, are no part of res gestæ and not binding on employer in action for employee's negligence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2).

Admissions of employee, which are not prompted by the excitement of the accident, are no part of the res gestæ, and cannot bind employer in action for injuries for employee's negligence, and are incompetent, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2.

3. Evidence 🔑222(8), 243(4)—Statement, immediately after accident, of employee driving truck, "I could have stopped," held competent as against employee, but incompetent to bind employer in action for death (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2).

In action against truck driver and his employer for death resulting from accident due to alleged negligence of employee, employee's statement immediately after accident, "I got out of this lucky; I could have stopped, but I thought the trailer was going to stop," held competent as admission against interest of driver, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2, but incompetent to bind employer.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1053(6)—Admission, over employer's objection, of admissions of employee driving truck, held not prejudicial error, in action against employer and employee for death, where evidence was subsequently limited to employee.

In action against employer and employee for death resulting from employee's alleged negligence in driving truck, error in admitting testimony, over objection of employer, as to employee's admission after the accident that he could have stopped, held not prejudicial, where the evidence was subsequently limited to the employee, and jury was correctly instructed as to its application.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1053(2)—Erroneous admission of evidence is cured by subsequent elimination with instructions to disregard it.

As a general rule, the erroneous admission of evidence is cured by its subsequent elimination from the record, where the jury is clearly instructed to disregard the testimony.

6. Appeal and error 🔑930(2)—Jury is presumed to have understood and observed unambiguous instructions.

Jury must be deemed to have understood and observed clear and unambiguous instructions.

7. Witnesses 🔑255(9)—Witness may refer to transcript of his testimony given at former trial to refresh recollection, provided record has first been established (Code Civ. Proc. § 2047).

For the purpose of refreshing the memory of a witness, it is competent to read or exhibit to him a transcript of his testimony respecting the same subject-matter given at a former hearing or trial under Code of Civ. Proc. § 2047, provided the record of the first trial has been first proved to be true and correct, but the authenticity of the record must first be established.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1048(4)—Error in permitting witness to use unestablished transcript of testimony at prior hearing to refresh recollection held not prejudicial, where witness' resulting testimony was merely cumulative (Code Civ. Proc. § 2047).

In action for death resulting from alleged negligence of truck driver, error in exhibiting to witness an unestablished transcript of his testimony, given at coroner's inquest concerning truck driver's admissions, for avowed purpose of refreshing his memory, held not prejudicial, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2047, where testimony of witness given after reference to the transcript was merely cumulative of testimony of another witness.

9. Trial 🔑29(3)—Court's remarks that jury did not have to accept expert's testimony held not prejudicial as invading jury's province, in view of instructions.

Remarks of court in admitting testimony of expert witness in response to question, "Does the use of a transit give you more accurate information than the use of angles?" that "the jury don't have to accept that, the statements of an expert, * * * if the statements of the witness do not appeal to their sound judgment," held not prejudicial as a comment on weight of evidence invading jury's province, even if question was proper and intelligible, where court added that it had no right to pass upon the weight of the evidence or the credibility of witnesses, but that such matters were within the sole province of the jury.

10. Evidence 🔑588—Jury may disregard testimony of witnesses which is not in accord with sound judgment.

Jury is not bound to accept testimony of either lay or expert witnesses, where their statements are not in accordance with common sense or sound judgment, since jury is sole judge of the weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses.

11. Appeal and error 🔑1064(1)—Instructions upon commonplace matters or reasonably cautionary instructions do not warrant reversal, in absence of prejudice.

Giving of instructions upon commonplace matters of which jurors are presumed to be cognizant, or reasonably cautionary instructions, is not ground for reversal, in absence of showing of prejudice.

12. Trial 🔑206—Competent expert testimony should be permitted to go to jury without disparagement.

Expert testimony, when competent and admissible, should be permitted to go to jury without disparagement like the evidence of any other witness, leaving them to pass upon its weight and sufficiency, but court may give reasonably cautionary instructions.

13. Automobiles 🔑243(5)—Evidence of effect of wooden ramp, which covered sidewalk, upon movements of trailer, held inadmissible, in action for death resulting from collision between truck and trailer which rolled from gravel bunker, adjacent to highway.

In action for death resulting from collision between truck and runaway trailer which rolled from gravel bunker adjacent to highway, rejection of testimony concerning effect of wooden ramp which covered sidewalk upon movements of trailer in crossing it upon former occasions held not error.

14. Appeal and error 🔑928(4)—Where record failed to show which side offered instructions, or what instructions were modified or refused, it was presumed all instructions were given at appellants' request, and appellants could not complain.

Where record failed to disclose what instructions, if any were modified or refused, or which instructions were offered by respondents, it was presumed that they were all offered by and given at the request of the appellants, who were therefore not in position to complain of any errors in the instructions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Action by Daisy C. Shaver and another, by Irl D. Shaver, guardian ad litem, against the United Parcel Service, a corporation, and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. W. Kidd and Walter O. Schell, both of Los Angeles (Gerald F. H. Delamer, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Irl D. Brett, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from the verdict of a jury and the judgment of the court awarding $15,000 damages for the death of respondents' intestate, caused by the alleged negligence of appellants in driving their Ford truck into a loaded runaway trailer which had rolled from a gravel bunker adjacent to the highway, into Cromwell avenue in Los Angeles county. At the time of the accident, the decedent was engaged in trying to stop the trailer.

For grounds of reversal, the appellants contend that (1) the judgment is not supported by the evidence; (2) that the testimony fails to show negligence on their part; (3) that the evidence affirmatively establishes contributory negligence on the part of the deceased; and (4) that the court erred in the admission of testimony, in giving and refusing certain instructions, and in commenting on the weight of evidence to which an expert witness is entitled.

Cromwell avenue is a paved street 38 feet wide, extending east and west along the base of the Hollywood hills. A 6-foot cement sidewalk borders this avenue on the north, and is elevated above the level of the street about 6 inches. On the north side of this highway, at a point opposite the place where the accident occurred, the land slopes gradually upward to a gravel pit and sand bunkers owned by William Kerr, which are situated 20 feet from the upper edge of the sidewalk. The soil of the driveway leading to these bunkers consists of loose eroded shale or deteriorated granite. Opposite this driveway, the sidewalk was covered with timbers. A plank apron furnished the means of descent from the elevation of the walk to the level of the street. West from the point where the accident occurred, two streets join Cromwell avenue from the south, but do not extend beyond it The nearest street to the west is Observatory avenue, which is 30 feet distant, and Commonwealth avenue is 300 feet beyond. Cromwell avenue, upon which the accident occurred, is perfectly straight in this locality, and ascends with a considerable grade from Commonwealth avenue to the point where the collision occurred. The view from Commonwealth avenue to the bunkers and the street below is clear and unobstructed.

On February 2, 1924, at about 9 o'clock in the forenoon, the deceased and one Burke were engaged in loading an automobile trailer with gravel at these bunkers. For this purpose the trailer was backed against the bunker, and gravel was deposited in the box by means of a chute which extended half the length of the vehicle, thus loading the front part first, after which the trailer was moved forward in order to load the rear end. The driveway, where the trailer stood, descended slightly to the level of the sidewalk. In spite of this slight grade, the trailer would usually stand stationary without blocking the wheels. But, because the weight and force of the gravel in the process of loading would sometimes start the trailer forward, the wheels were blocked by placing a piece of planking 3 inches thick and a foot in length upon the ground in front of a rear wheel. At the time of the accident, Mr. Burke stood in the trailer box distributing the gravel as it was deposited from the chute. The deceased was engaged outside upon the ground. When the front end of the box had been filled, according to custom, the plank which blocked the rear wheel was kicked forward 2 or 3 feet to permit the machine to roll away from the bunker so as to load the rear end. Upon this occasion, however, the block failed to stop the car. The witness Nemmo testified: "* * * The ground was soft, and the block failed to stop the trailer." The weight of the partially loaded car crushed the block into the soil, and it rolled slowly on into the street. Upon observing that the block failed to stop the car, the deceased ran ahead of it and attempted to force the end of the tongue which protruded ahead of the car into the earth with his foot. Failing in this effort, standing upon the tongue, he reached for the brake lever at the left side of the box, which he applied with all his strength. While the speed of the car was greatly checked, it nevertheless continued to move forward no faster than a man could walk, and ran into and across Cromwell avenue at right angles.

About the time this trailer started on its course for the highway, the appellant Faulds drove a Ford truck up Commonwealth avenue and turned into Cromwell avenue within plain view of the scene above described, not more than 350 feet away. He knew of the presence of the bunkers. The runaway trailer was 16 feet in length, and the body was painted red. There was no traffic upon this highway, and nothing to obstruct a clear view of the trailer as it slowly ran across the pathway of the approaching truck. In spite of this evident danger, the appellant Faulds drove his car up this grade to the point of impact at a rate of speed variously estimated at from 20 to 35 miles an hour. As he reached a point 30 or 40 feet from the point of collision, his car was seen to turn first sharply to his left as though he were intending to pass behind the trailer, then he appeared to speed up and turn to the right with the evident intent of dashing ahead of the trailer. No horn or other warning of his approach was given, and there is no evidence that the deceased even knew of his danger.

Mr. Burke, who held his position in the trailer, testified:

> "Mr. Shaver first stood with both feet on the trailer tongue, trying to push the tongue into the dirt, pulling the brake at the same time to stop it. * * * When he saw he wasn't going to make it that way, he took one foot off the trailer * * * so as to get more pull—more leverage. * * * The truck kept coming on. When the (defendants') truck got to the east side of the center of the street (Observatory avenue) it made a noticeable turn to the left, * * * then it made a turn to the right again, and then straightened its course out. It looked as if the truck slowed down and then speeded up again, and it looked to me as if the driver of the truck tried to get in front of the trailer, and there was not room. * * * Mr. Shaver was standing, at the time of the impact, with his left foot on the trailer tongue and his right foot on the ground walking backward slowly. * * * Mr. Shaver was wedged in between the Ford and the trailer. The Ford had run over the trailer tongue."

The appellant Faulds testified:

> "From Commonwealth east to Observatory I was driving uphill, and continued to drive uphill until the time of the accident. * * * I did not see the bunker, but I knew it was there. I did not see the trailer at all until the time of the impact."

In attempting to dash through between the south curbing of Cromwell avenue and the approaching trailer, it is quite evident the Ford truck struck the protruding tongue of the trailer and knocked the deceased from his position on the tongue, wedging him in between the trailer and the truck. Both machines stopped. The tongue of the trailer extended between the front and rear wheels of the truck, which was jammed against the south curbing of the street. The trailer had to be shoved back to release the body of the deceased, which then fell to the pavement. He was taken to the emergency hospital, and soon died from the effect of the injuries which he had sustained.

[1] The appellant Faulds had ample opportunity to avoid the accident. He took a desperate chance, as the result conclusively proved, in attempting to pass ahead of the trailer. He claims to have been traveling only 20 to 25 miles an hour, and testified: "* * * At the speed that I was going, I could have stopped the Ford between 20 and 25 feet." The deceased was doing his utmost to stop the trailer, and was evidently unaware of the presence of the speeding truck. Observing the predicament of the runaway trailer, and the imminent danger of attempting to pass ahead of it, it was the duty of the driver of the Ford to slacken his speed or stop if necessary to avoid the collision. We are of the opinion that his conduct under the circumstances furnishes ample evidence of negligence on his part. The question of appellants' negligence and of the charge of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased were matters for the determination of the jury, and we are satisfied that their findings upon these subjects are supported by substantial evidence.

[2-6] Two of respondents' witnesses were permitted to testify that the driver of appellants' machine, immediately after the accident had occurred, stated: "I got out of this lucky; I could have stopped, but I thought the trailer was going to stop." This testimony was received over the objection of the appellants on the ground that it was incompetent and that it constituted no part of the res gestæ. Subsequently the court reversed this ruling and struck the evidence out so far as its application to the appellant corporation was concerned, permitting it to stand only as admissions against the appellant Faulds. The court said:

> "It is received against Faulds (only). The jury is so advised, and will note the (subsequent) instruction (which will be given) with relation to the matter stricken out. * * * The jury is admonished to disregard these statements of the driver as to (their application to) the defendant corporation."

Instruction number 10, which was later given, directed the jury that:

> "You must not consider for any purpose any evidence * * * which has been stricken out by the court. Such evidence is to be treated as though you had never heard it."

The statements of the chauffeur of an automobile, made subsequent to an accident in which he is involved, are competent as admissions against the interest of the driver. Lampton v. Davis Standard Bread Co., 48 Cal. App. 116, 119, 191 P. 710; section 1870, Code Civ. Proc. subd. 2. But the admissions of an employee which are not prompted by the excitement of the occasion and are no part of the res gestæ cannot bind the principal and are incompetent. Luman v. Golden Ancient Channel M. Co., 140 Cal. 700, 709, 74 P. 307; Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos, etc., Co., 156 Cal. 379, 390, 104 P. 986; Baker v. Western Auto Stage Co., 48 Cal. App. 283, 192 P. 73; 3 Jones, Com. on Ev. 2217, § 1207. The application of the forgoing admissions was properly limited to the appellant Faulds, and they were properly stricken from the record to the extent to which they may have affected the appellant corporation. It was not prejudicial error to have first admitted the testimony as affecting both appellants, since the evidence was subsequently properly limited, and the jury was clearly instructed as to its application. Shupe v. Rodolf, 185 Cal. 371, 197 P. 57; Rystinki v. Central California T. Co., 175 Cal. 336, 342, 165 P. 952; Atkinson v. United Railroads of S. F., 71 Cal. App. 82, 97, 234 P. 863; 2 Cal. Jur. 1021, § 607. It is a general rule that the erroneous admission of evidence is cured by its subsequent elimination from the record, where the jury is clearly instructed to disregard the testimony. 4 C. J. 989, § 2972; Walker's Errors in Civ. Proc. 549, § 177. A jury must be deemed to have understood and observed clear and unambiguous instructions. McCollum v. Barr, 38 Cal. App. 411, 429, 176 P. 463; Johns v. Pond, 38 Cal. App. 643, 649, 177 P. 293; Keena v. United Railroads, 197 Cal. 148, 152, 239 P. 1061; 24 Cal. Jur. 763, § 44.

[7, 8] When the respondents' witness Nimmo was first asked regarding the foregoing statement of the appellant Faulds, he said that he did not recall the conversation. Over the objection of appellants, he was then shown a transcript of his testimony on that subject which was previously given at the coroner's inquest, for the avowed purpose of refreshing his memory. Upon examination of this record, the witness asserted that he recalled the incident, and then testified to the foregoing statement, which conformed to his evidence at the inquest. It is claimed by the appellants that this was error. We are of the opinion, however, that under the circumstances of the present case the ruling was not prejudicial, in spite of the fact that the authentication of the transcript of the evidence adduced at the coroner's inquest was not first established, for the reason that Mr. Burke, another witness, testified to precisely the same statement, and the evidence complained of was therefore merely cumulative. For the purpose of refreshing the memory of a witness, it is competent to read or exhibit to him a transcript of his testimony respecting the same subject-matter, given at a former hearing or trial, after the record has been first proved to be true and correct. People v. Mercado, 59 Cal. App. 69, 74, 209 P. 1035; section 2047, Code Civ. Proc.; 5 Jones Com. on Ev. 4689, § 2386; 2 Hyatt on Trials, 1186, § 1246. This rule, however, is for the purpose of awakening a dormant memory and stimulating present recollection of circumstances sought to be elicited. The former testimony may not be received as proof to establish a fact in the present case, except that, pursuant to the exercise of great caution, a witness may be permitted to testify from a writing made by him or under his direction, in accordance with the requirements of section 2047, Code of Civil Procedure, even though he may retain no recollection of the particular facts. The authenticity of a record from which a witness is permitted to refresh his memory should, however, be first established. Since the ruling complained of in the present case affected only evidence which was cumulative, it was harmless, and did not constitute prejudicial error. Siemon v. Finkle, 190 Cal. 611, 618, 213 P. 954; 2 Cal. Jur. 1020, § 607.

It is contended that the court invaded the province of the jury in commenting upon the weight to be given to the testimony of an expert witness. William Kerr, the owner of the bunkers in question, testified that he was an architect and builder, and that he had taken certain measurements "with tape lines and straight edges" from which he prepared the diagram which was received in evidence. In opposition to this testimony, the appellants called Mr. Borders, whom they sought to qualify as an expert engineer. While it appeared that he had taken the engineering course at the Kansas University for two years, he was not a graduate of any institution, and his experience consisted of three years' service in the army and in establishing railroad grades, during which he acted as a transit or level man. However, the court assumed that he was qualified as an expert, and, over the objection of respondents upon that ground, he was permitted to answer the question, "Does the use of a transit give you more accurate information than the use of angles?" This was for the evident purpose of discrediting the measurements testified to by Mr. Kerr, but our attention is not called to any figures wherein it is claimed the data secured by these gentlemen differed in any respect. Borders testified to no other material fact. It is manifest that, if his measurements did not differ from those from which Mr. Kerr prepared his diagram, there would be no prejudice, even if the court's remarks respecting an expert were indiscreet. However, we are disposed to think they are scarcely open to this criticism. In permitting the answer to that question, the court said:

> "I will allow the testimony. The jury don't have to accept that—the statements of an expert. An expert is for the purpose of assisting the jury in reaching their conclusions, and, if the statements of the witness do not appeal to their sound judgment, they do not have to accept it."

The court then added:

> "I have prepared an instruction (regarding the weight to be given to the opinions of experts) which I will give to you so that you can govern yourselves regarding (the consideration of) expert testimony."

The instruction to which the court referred was in fact given as follows:

> "The opinions of experts are not conclusive; their opinions are not to be substituted for the common sense and judgment of the jury. The purpose of the introduction of such evidence is to supplement the general knowledge and experience of the jury in relation to the matters before the jury, and thereby to aid the jury in the exercise of its own judgment to the end that a more just and accurate conclusion may be drawn from the evidence."

The jury was further instructed that:

> "Neither the judge nor the jury may trespass upon the province of the other. Our provinces are entirely distinct and separate, and you will understand that in this charge the court in no manner or form is expressing or desiring to express any opinion on the weight of the evidence, or any part of it, or on the truth or falsity of any witness' testimony, or that any alleged fact in the case is or is not proved."

[9] The question which prompted the remarks of the court which were criticized by appellants, to wit, "Does the use of a transit give you more accurate information than the use of angles?" seems unintelligible. It would appear to require something more than the wisdom of an expert engineer to answer this question. Probably it was the intention to ask this witness whether the use of a transit would furnish more accurate measurements for a diagram than would the use of a straightedge and tape line. A surveyor's transit is used for measuring distances and horizontal angles. Cent. Dict. A straightedge and tape line may be used for the same purpose. Common knowledge should teach the nonexpert that the transit is more reliable. It may therefore be doubtful whether this inquiry is a proper subject for expert testimony. But, assuming that it was a proper, intelligible question, and that the testimony of these expert witnesses conflicted with respect to their measurements, we nevertheless think that the remarks of the court were not prejudicial. The effect of the court's language inferred that whatever may be the answer of the witness to this unanswerable question, the jury is not bound to accept the reply unless it appeals to their sound judgment. In the instruction which followed this remark, the court merely said that the opinions of experts were not to be substituted for common sense and sound judgment, and that their opinions were not necessarily conclusive. This instruction was coupled with the explicit statement that the court had no right or disposition to pass upon either the weight of the evidence or the credibility of the witnesses, but that these matters were within the sole province of the jury. Certainly, under such circumstances, the jury could not have been misled into believing that the court was discrediting the testimony of this expert witness. What was said respecting the evidence of experts would apply with equal force to the testimony of any other witness. Since the jury is the sole judge of the weight of evidence and the credibility of witnesses, it follows that ordinarily the jury is not bound to accept statements which are not in accord with common sense or sound judgment. And it is equally true that the testimony of a witness is not necessarily conclusive.

[10-12] The giving of instructions upon commonplace matters of which the jurors are presumed to be cognizant, or even reasonably cautionary instructions, is not ground for reversal, in the absence of a showing of prejudice. 2 Cal. Jur. 1027, § 611, and authorities there cited. It is true that expert testimony, when competent and admissible, like the evidence of any other witness, should be permitted to go to the jury without disparagement, leaving them to pass upon its weight and sufficiency. Estate of Hess, 183 Cal. 589, 593, 192 P. 35; Abbott's Trials (4th Ed.) 765, § 47. Under the circumstances of the present case, however, we are of the opinion that the province of the jury was not invaded by the declarations of the court and that its remarks were not prejudicial.

[13] Nor was there error in the court's sustaining respondents' objection to a question propounded to Mr. Kerr on cross-examination regarding the effect of the wooden ramp which covered the sidewalk, upon the movements of the trailer in crossing it upon former occasions. No special reason for eliciting this evidence is suggested. It does not appear how his answer would have affected the result in the present case, or that it would throw any light on the circumstances surrounding the accident.

[14] In their brief, the appellants complain of the court's refusal to give, or its modification of, some forty-two instructions offered by them. The bill of exceptions sets out eighty-nine instructions in consecutive order, but fails to indicate which of them, if any, were refused or modified, how they were modified, or by whom they were offered. All that the bill of exceptions contains in this regard is the following:

> "The defendants thereupon tendered to the court the following written instructions, and requested that (they) be given. The court then refused to give the following (one) instruction (to wit): 'You are instructed to return a verdict in favor of the defendants.' The court then and there refused to give the remaining instructions, except as otherwise given in the instructions by the court."

If the record fails to disclose the party at whose request the instructions were given, it will be presumed they were offered by the appellant, in which event he may not complain of any errors therein contained. Sutter Butte C. Co. v. American R. & A. Co., 182 Cal. 549, 554, 189 P. 277; Gray v. Eschen, 125 Cal. 1, 5, 57 P. 664; Bognuda v. Pearson, 71 Cal. App. 105, 110, 234 P. 857; 2 Cal. Jur. 870, § 509. The last paragraph of the bill of exceptions preceding the instructions which appear therein, is ambiguous and unintelligible; but from the first paragraph above quoted, to wit, that "the defendants thereupon tendered to the court the following written instructions, and requested that they be given," leaves the inevitable conclusion that the defendants offered all the instructions which appear in the bill of exceptions. With the exception of the first instruction above quoted, the authenticated record does not show that any of these instructions were either modified or refused. Since it is utterly impossible for this court to ascertain what instructions, if any, were modified or refused, or which ones were offered by the respondents, it must be assumed that they were all given at the request of the appellants, who may therefore not complain of any errors which they may contain.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

SPINAK v. PRIDHAM. (Civ. 5152.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 16, 1928.

Appeal and error ⚷1039(13)—Evidence and finding as to reasonable market value of services under contract, though outside of issues, held not ground for complaint, where amount awarded was less than provided in contract.

In suit on contract whereby plaintiff agreed to furnish certain drawings and designs for use in construction of house by defendant, though evidence and finding as to reasonable value of designs furnished by plaintiff was outside the issues, defendant cannot be heard to complain, where there was a finding that plaintiff fulfilled his contract, and amount awarded was less than that provided for in contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by Leon Spinak, doing business under the fictitious name of Leon Spinak & Co., against R. W. Pridham, for services under contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hill & Morgan and Kenneth K. Wright, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank F. Oster, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. It is alleged in the complaint in this action that in May, 1923, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby plaintiff agreed to "prepare and furnish for defendant's use and benefit certain sketches and working details for the construction of certain fixtures and embellishments of a residence then being constructed by defendant in said city and, whenever by defendant required so to do, to exercise an advisory supervision over the construction and incorporation of such fixtures and embellishments in said residence; and, in consideration of plaintiff's said promise and agreement, defendant promised and agreed in said contract to pay to plaintiff the sum of $600." The complaint further alleges that the plaintiff has duly performed all of the conditions of said contract to be by him performed, and that defendant has repudiated said contract, and refused to pay him said sum or any part thereof.

The answer denies each and all of the allegations of the complaint except that of nonpayment of the alleged claim. Judgment went for plaintiff in the sum of $400, from which defendant appeals.

Appellant presents his grounds for a reversal of the judgment under three heads: First, the evidence is insufficient to support the findings; second, the findings do not support the judgment, and the judgment is contrary to law; third, the court committed error in its admission and rejection of evidence.

The findings complained of may be briefly summarized as follows:

First. That plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby plaintiff agreed to prepare and furnish for defendant "certain designs" for defendant's house, "and to supervise the incorporation of these designs in said house," for which defendant agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $600.

Second. That the plaintiff did not agree, nor did the parties to the contract understand, that plaintiff was to furnish complete working details such as might be required by a planing mill incident to its work, but only such working details as would enable a competent mechanic to execute the designs furnished.

Third. That plaintiff furnished the designs for the fixtures and embellishments in accordance with said contract and as therein required of the plaintiff, and that the defendant used said designs and had the benefit of them.

Fourth. That the designs furnished were of the reasonable value of $400.

Fifth. That the plaintiff did not supervise the incorporation of the fixtures and embellishments, and defendant never requested plaintiff so to do.

Appellant urges that the contract found by the court to have been entered into between the parties required of the plaintiff only that he furnish the "designs," while the contract pleaded and testified to by the plaintiff provided that plaintiff was to furnish "sketches" and "working details." Furthermore, that the court found that the contract required plaintiff to "supervise" the work, while the contract pleaded and testified to by plaintiff provided that plaintiff was "to exercise an advisory supervision" only when requested so to do by defendant.

It must be conceded that the findings are inaccurately drawn and lacking in concise adherence to the issues as set forth in the pleadings. However, when read together and analyzed, it cannot be said that they do not declare upon the material issues as determined by the court. There is sufficient evidence in the record to support the view evidently taken by the court that what the plaintiff agreed to furnish, and which in the complaint was designated as "sketches and working details," was in fact included in the term "designs." Apparently, during the trial, the chief controversy on the question of what plaintiff was to furnish, aside from the question as to whether or not a contract was entered into, seemed to center around the detailed drawings which were required by the planing mill in getting out the staircase that was to be erected in the house.

Plaintiff testified that the designs he furnished included a number of detailed drawings which were sufficient to enable any mechanic to construct the work as delineated, and that was all the contract required of him. He admitted that he did not prepare full-sized detailed drawings for the staircase, as desired by the mill, claiming that such drawings were not contemplated by either the defendant or himself, and not included in the agreement. Defendant's testimony on this point conflicts with that of plaintiff.

Smith, the contractor who had charge of the building, testified that the drawings and designs furnished him by plaintiff were sufficient to enable him to do all of the work contemplated by the designs, except that the mill required certain detailed drawings which were not furnished by the plaintiff. The court found that the contract did not require the plaintiff to furnish these detailed drawings for the mill. There being sufficient evidence to support this finding, this court will not disturb it.

The apparent conflict pointed out by appellant between the findings and the complaint as to the matter of supervising the work consists rather in the form of language used than in the substance.

The testimony on this point is somewhat extended, and more or less conflicting as to just what was the intention of the parties. It clearly appears that no request was ever made of the plaintiff to examine or supervise the work. There is sufficient evidence to have justified the trial court in concluding that the supervising, whatever was meant by the term, was to be furnished only at defendant's request, but was not regarded as of any importance by the defendant, and was in fact waived by him.

It is next pointed out that the complaint sounds in contract and not in quantum meruit; hence that the finding that the reasonable market value of the designs furnished by the plaintiff is the sum of $400, is outside of the issues raised in the pleadings; also that the judgment has no support in the proper findings, and therefore the judgment is contrary to law.

It must be conceded, and in fact is so conceded by respondent, that the finding as to the reasonable value of the designs furnished is outside of the issues raised by the pleadings. Respondent frankly concedes that he does not urge the sustaining of the judgment on the court's theory that he was entitled recover for the reasonable value of the designs, but that his recovery must rest upon his contract pleaded and the evidence in support thereof. Respondent's answer to appellant's attack upon this finding is that it may be treated as surplusage, as there are sufficient other findings to sustain the judgment in his favor. Moreover, he urges that appellant cannot be heard to complain, because the court awarded respondent only $400 on the theory of the reasonable value of the designs, when upon the evidence and the findings, he should have been awarded the sum of $600. In other words, conceding that the court erred in the matter of taking evidence on the question of the reasonable value of the designs, and in making a finding upon that question, there is a finding that plaintiff fulfilled his contract, and, there being evidence sufficient to sustain that finding, a judgment not to exceed $600 should be sustained. We think respondent's contention answers appellant's criticism.

The last point urged by appellant is in criticism of a ruling of the court sustaining respondent's objection to a question asked of a witness by appellant. We have examined the record on this point, as well as the citations presented, and are of the opinion that the error, if any, committed was wholly immaterial.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF PETALUMA v. HICKEY.
(Civ. 6079.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 4, 1928.

1. Payment ⚷84(2)—City's payment of penalty to purchaser at sale for assessment held not recoverable as made under mistake of law (Pol. Code, § 3779 [1889]).

Fact that city, during litigation on owners' tender of street assessment and penalty, paid purchaser at sale to enforce assessment what he had paid for land, plus penalty, under Pol. Code, § 3779 (1889), did not make payment of such penalty one under mistake of law, justifying city's recovery thereof in equity, although city paid money through one of its officers acting on legal advice.

2. Municipal corporations ⚷894—City may recover as involuntary trust illegal payment of penalty on street assessment to purchaser at sale to enforce assessment.

Where owners of property were adjudged liable only for street improvement assessment, and not for penalty thereon, and city, pending such litigation, paid purchaser at sale to enforce assessment, amount of assessment and penalty, in view of charter, such city was entitled to recover as involuntary trust money illegally paid by city treasurer for penalty.

3. Limitation of actions ⚷39(11)—City's action to recover illegal payment nearly six years thereafter held barred (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337–340, 343).

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337–340, 343, city's action to recover illegal payment by city treasurer nearly six years after such payment was barred.

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

4. Limitation of actions 🔑39(11)—Action to recover payment from involuntary trustee must be commenced within four years (Code Civ. Proc. § 343).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 343, action against involuntary trustee to recover money paid must be commenced within four years.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑894—City's right as to recovery of illegal payment to city official held same whether he was or was not municipal officer.

City's right to recover illegal payment to city official purchasing land on sale to enforce street improvement assessment was same whether he was or was not municipal officer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by the City of Petaluma against W. J. Hickey. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fred S. Howell, of Petaluma, Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco (Chas. V. Barfield, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.
E. J. Dole, of Petaluma, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover a judgment for money. The defendant appeared and answered. The trial was had before the lower court, sitting without a jury. That court made findings of fact in favor of the defendant, and from a judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed and has brought up a bill of exceptions.

The controversy is an outgrowth of a street improvement proceeding. J. E. Cavanagh et al. owned two tracts in the city of Petaluma. The city commenced a proceeding for the opening, extending, and widening of Douglas street. Thereafter such proceedings were had that both tracts were sold to W. J. Hickey for the nonpayment of the assessment. He paid the total sum of $6,015.02. Later the owners tendered and deposited for plaintiff's account the amount claimed as payable on redemption, and at the same time served and filed a protest. Later litigation followed. The result of one proceeding was that the owners obtained a final judgment to the effect that they were mistaken in their contention that the proceeding as a whole was invalid, but that they were correct in contending that they were not liable for $3,337.85, claimed to be due as a penalty. Cavanagh v. Shaver, 56 Cal. App. 758, 207 P. 275. While that litigation was pending, the officers of the plaintiff caused to be paid, and did pay, to W. J. Hickey, this defendant, $10,047, whereas he had paid $6,015.02. In other words, there was paid to W. J. Hickey the total sum tendered under protest by the owners, with interest thereon, instead of the actual amount which the defendant had paid in, together with interest thereon—both payor and payee assuming that the aforesaid penalty, $3,337.85, was a legal charge against the redemptioners and in favor of the purchaser at the sale. Pol. Code, § 3779 (1889).

The defendant contends that the plaintiff's complaint does not state a cause of action, and that plaintiff's cause of action, in any event, is barred by the statute of limitations. On the other hand, the plaintiff contends that its complaint states a cause of action on any one of the following theories: (1) That the money was paid under a mistake of fact; (2) that the money was paid under a mistake of law; (3) that the money was impressed with a trust; and (4) that the money was illegally paid out.

In presenting the first contention, the plaintiff cites some of the evidence as showing that there was a mistake of fact. The evidence does not support the contention. A reading of the entire record shows that there was no mistake of fact. Furthermore, the trial court in its findings, among others, found that there was no mistake of fact. The most that can be said in behalf of this theory is that there may be a little conflict in the evidence. This we do not concede, but, even though there were a conflict, under well-established rules this court would have no power to interfere with the finding.

[1] Turning to the contention that the plaintiff's complaint pleads a mistake of law, it is perfectly clear that the facts of this case are not such that a court of equity will take jurisdiction and grant a decree. In the case of Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 461, at page 471 (76 Am. Dec. 540.), the court said:

> "Indeed, the weight of authority in the United States is that the mistake, unless accompanied with special circumstances, such as misrepresentation, undue influence, or misplaced confidence, constitutes no ground for relief." (Italics ours.)

That decision has been cited and followed. Boggs v. Fowler & Hargrave, 16 Cal. 560, 565, 76 Am. Dec. 561; Burt v. Wilson, 28 Cal. 632, 87 Am. Dec. 142; Kopp v. Gunther, 95 Cal. 63, 74, 30 P. 301; Brackett v. Banegas, 116 Cal. 278, 284, 48 P. 90, 58 Am. St. Rep. 164; Rued v. Cooper, 119 Cal. 463, 467, 51 P. 704; Cooley v. County of Calaveras, 121 Cal. 482, 485, 53 P. 1075; Wingerter v. San Francisco, 134 Cal. 547, 66 P. 730, 86 Am. St. Rep. 294; Lewis v. San Francisco, 2 Cal. App. 112, 117, 82 P. 1106; Bowman v. Payne, 55 Cal. App. 789, 796, 204 P. 406. In the case under consideration the mistake of law, if any, was not "accompanied with special circumstances," such as will confer jurisdiction on a court of equity to grant relief as for a mistake of law. The fact that the money was paid out by one of the officers of the plaintiff, acting under legal advice, does not alter the rights of the plaintiff. The plaintiff contends otherwise, and it cites 2 Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence, § 849. That section is not applicable to the facts of this case. Section 851 is applicable, and supports what we have said. Douglass v. Todd, 96 Cal. 655, 31 P. 623, 31 Am. St. Rep. 247, was a motion to be relieved of a default. It contains nothing tending to support the contention of the plaintiff. Benson v. Bunting, 127 Cal. 532, 59 P. 991, 78 Am. St. Rep. 81, involved constructive, if not actual, fraud consisting in the plaintiff's attorney entering into a contract purporting to serve the defendant also. Gregory v. Clabrough's Executors, 129 Cal. 475, 62 P. 72, rested on the special circumstances that the plaintiff made a mistake of law by reason of the fact that he was led to consult the defendant's attorney, who gave the incorrect advice. It is patent that not one of these cases supports the points to which the plaintiff cites it.

[2] The contentions that the money was impressed with a trust and that the money was illegally paid out are so interwoven that they need not be discussed separately. In support of its contention, the plaintiff cites and relies on 21 Ruling Case Law, 174. Turning to the authority cited, it appears that the text purports to be based on several cases, among which is Lamar Township v. City of Lamar, 261 Mo. 171, 169 S. W. 12, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 740. On page 744 (261 Mo. 189, 169 S. W. 15) the Supreme Court of Missouri states:

> "Officers are creatures of the law, whose duties are usually fully provided for by statute. In a way they are agents, but they are never general agents, in the sense that they are hampered by neither custom nor law and in the sense that they are absolutely free to follow their own volition. Persons dealing with them do so always with full knowledge of the limitations of their agency and of the laws which, prescribing their duties, hedge them about. They are trustees as to the public money which comes to their hands. The rules which govern this trust are the law pursuant to which the money is paid to them and the law by which they in turn pay it out. Manifestly, none of the reasons which operate to render recovery of money voluntarily paid under a mistake of law by a private person, applies to an officer. The law which fixes his duties is his power of attorney; if he neglect to follow it, his cestui que trust ought not to suffer. In fact, public policy requires that all officers be required to perform their duties within the strict limits of their legal authority."

And see People v. Fields, 58 N. Y. 491, 505.

We have no quarrel with that rule. In this state the rule is statutory so far as one of the counties is concerned. Pol. Code, § 4005b; Riverside v. Yawman & Erbe Mfg. Co., 3 Cal. App. 691, 86 P. 900. Section 4, article III, of Freeholder Charter of the city of Petaluma, is not so specific, but it is broad enough to make the same rule applicable to the plaintiff. People v. Ingersoll, 58 N. Y. 1, 35, 17 Am. Rep. 178. The doctrine of the Lamar Case was decided in New York in the Tweed Cases. People of the State of New York v. Ingersoll, 58 N. Y. 1; People of the State of New York v. Fields, 58 N. Y. 491. Those cases were commenced by the Attorney General. It was contended that the Attorney General had no authority to maintain the actions. Before the court could decide that contention, it became necessary to ascertain exactly what was the nature of the action which the Attorney General was attempting to maintain. Both opinions are very long. They consider all of the factors in great detail, and decide that the moneys involved in those actions were obtained by the defendants unlawfully, and through acts of fraud from the city treasury, and that defendants were liable as for moneys had and received. In the case entitled Board of Supervisors v. Ellis, 59 N. Y. 620, fraud was not involved. Ellis, a supervisor, had put in claims, and had been paid by the county treasurer certain moneys as per diem and mileage which the statute did not authorize. The court cited and followed the Tweed Cases on the rule to which we have cited them. It is clear, therefore, that, when the moneys were in the hands of the city treasurer of Petaluma, the treasurer held them as trustee for the municipality. Afterwards when he, without authority of law, paid the moneys to the defendant, an involuntary trust was created. Civ. Code, § 2224.

[3, 4] Excepting the contention that the action was not commenced in time, we think the complaint pleaded facts showing a cause of action against the defendant on the theory that he held the moneys as an involuntary trustee. This conclusion brings us to a consideration of the statute of limitations. The defendant pleaded, and the trial court found, that the action was barred by the provisions of sections 337, 338, 339, 340, and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The undisputed facts are that the money was paid to the defendant on July 6, 1918; and that this action was commenced by the filing of the complaint on the 3d day of May, 1924, nearly six years thereafter. As we have shown above, the liability of the defendant, if any, was that of an involuntary trustee, but it has been frequently adjudged that an action against an involuntary trustee must be commenced within four years, and that the statute applicable is section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Nougues v. Newlands, 118 Cal. 102, 106, 50 P. 386; Broder v. Conklin, 121 Cal. 282, 288, 53 P. 699. The statute of limitations had run.

[5] At all times prior to the 1st day of January, 1919, and during the pendency of the street opening proceeding, C. R. Wingfield, F. H. Snow, and W. J. Hickey were commissioners in the street opening proceeding. C. R. Wingfield and F. H. Snow, as such commissioners, made an order directing the payment of the moneys in suit to W. J. Hickey. From time to time the plaintiff adverts to the official capacity of the defendant. It does not contend that the defendant, as a trustee, dealt with himself, and therefore violated a well-established rule of law (Shakespear v. Smith, 77 Cal. 638, 20 P. 294, 11 Am. St. Rep. 327); therefore we see no pertinency in the foregoing facts, and have not confused the record by constantly adverting thereto. If there was no authority in law to pay the moneys to the defendant, the plaintiff's rights are the same whether defendant was or was not a municipal officer.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

LANG v. McKINNEY BLUEPRINT PAPER CO. et al. (Civ. 6180.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 17, 1928.

1. Automobiles ⚿217(4)—Pedestrian injured by motorcycle held not guilty of contributory negligence for continuing to cross intersection after first bell for traffic change sounded.

Pedestrian, suing for injuries on being struck by motorcycle while crossing intersection, and while standing between moving street car and automobile traffic, was not guilty of contributory negligence in continuing to cross after hearing first bell for traffic change sounded.

2. Automobiles ⚿244(6)—Evidence held to sustain finding of negligence of motorcyclist suddenly darting from behind street car and striking pedestrian.

In action for injuries to pedestrian struck by motorcycle, evidence that motorcyclist suddenly darted from behind street car and struck pedestrian standing between street car and automobile traffic, and as to speed of motorcycle, held to sustain finding that motorcyclist was negligent.

3. Appeal and error ⚿999(1)—Jury's verdict is controlling on appeal, where only questions involved were issues of fact.

Where only questions involved constituted issues of fact to be determined by jury from all the circumstances present, verdict of jury is controlling on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Robert Lang against the McKinney Blueprint Paper Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Rosecrans & Emme, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. C. Craig, Elmer P. Bromley, and V. L. Ferguson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff as a result of being struck by a motorcycle driven by defendant Jorgensen, who at the time was performing a service for his codefendant and employer, McKinney Blueprint Paper Company. The action was tried before a jury and plaintiff was awarded a verdict of $2,750. Defendants appeal, urging as grounds for reversal that the evidence shows that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and is insufficient to prove negligence on the part of defendants.

The facts are not disputed, and in substance are as follows: The accident happened at the intersection of Third and Hill streets, Los Angeles, which streets cross each other at right angles, Hill street running north and south, and along its center are laid the double tracks of the electric street cars. There was a safety station on the west side of Hill street just north of its intersecting line with Third, provided for persons desiring to board the south-bound street cars on Hill street, and traffic signals were maintained at this intersection. Respondent started to walk easterly, with the traffic, across Hill street from the northwest corner to the northeast corner of said intersection, and, upon reaching the westerly street car track, the first bell of the traffic signal sounded to clear the traffic going east and west on Third street, preparatory to the sounding of the second bell to open the traffic going north and south on Hill street. Having ample time to reach the curb on the other side of Hill street before the second bell sounded, respondent continued to go forward with the traffic, but, when he got as far as the easterly street car track, he was prevented from going farther on account of automobiles turning northerly into Hill street from Third; and, while thus waiting to proceed, the second bell of the traffic signal sounded, releasing the traffic going north and south on Hill street. Immediately thereupon a north-bound street car, which had been waiting south of the intersection, moved forward on the easterly track behind respondent, and a line of automobiles traveling parallel with the street car proceeded to pass in front of him; consequently respondent was unable to go in either direction, and, while standing as far back toward the car track as was safe, and as far forward as possible toward the line of automobiles passing in front of him, Jorgensen, mounted on his motorcycle, came suddenly from behind the street car which he had been following, and at a rapid rate of speed attempted to pass between the street car on his left and the line of automobile traffic on his right, with the result that he struck respondent, knocking him violently to the pavement, the force of the impact causing a compound comminuted fracture of the right leg, the bone being splintered and protruding through the flesh. Respondent was a farm laborer, and at the time of the accident was 58 years of age. The severe fracture he sustained caused delayed union of the bones, and, besides enduring much pain, he was compelled to lie in bed on his back 3 months; and at the time of the trial, in May, 1925, which was approximately a year after the accident, he was still on crutches, and the medical testimony shows that the injured limb will never reach its normal strength.

[1] Appellants contend that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence because he continued to go forward after hearing the first bell sounded. There is no good reason to hold that he should not have done so. Clearly, he had the right to cross the street at this particular point, and he was proceeding in a lawful and careful manner with the traffic, and doubtless would have been able to reach the other side before the second bell sounded but for the automobiles turning the corner from Third street into Hill, and preventing him, a situation which he could not foresee at the time the first bell sounded; and, when the second bell sounded, he was held between the street car and the automobile traffic, with no choice in the matter except to stand still in the only available place left for him to stand.

[2] As to the question of Jorgensen's negligence, it is plain that, if he had continued to follow the course behind the street car, or, desiring to pass the car, had swung to the right behind the line of the automobile traffic, the accident would not have happened; but, as he admitted immediately after the accident, he was in a hurry, and, consequently, as other evidence shows, he was traveling at a speed of at least 20 miles an hour, as one witness testified, in a section where the traffic "was about the heaviest in the city," in an attempt to pass the street car by darting between it and the line of automobiles traveling parallel with him, and in doing so struck the respondent. Furthermore, according to Jorgensen's testimony, when he reached the center of the intersection he saw respondent standing between the street car track and the automobile traffic; and it may be reasonably inferred therefrom that, if he had been traveling at a careful rate of speed, considering the conjested condition of the intersection, he would have been able to stop before striking respondent.

[3] In our opinion, the foregoing evidence is ample to sustain the verdict and the judgment; and, in any event, there is no express statute here involved regulating the conduct of the parties, and therefore the only two questions involved in this appeal, as to whether respondent used ordinary care in crossing said street, and whether Jorgensen exercised the same measure of prudence in operating his motorcycle, constituted issues of fact to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances present, including the condition of the traffic at the particular time and place in question, and, the jury having resolved these issues in respondent's favor, its verdict is controlling on appeal. Burgesser v. Bullocks, 190 Cal. 673, 214 P. 649.

LORENZ v. HUNT et al. (Civ. 3461.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 16, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 14, 1928.

Homestead ⟹70—Lot on which owner conducted dance hall adjoining residence held not to constitute "homestead" (Civ. Code, § 1237).

Lot on which owner maintained a public dance hall adjoining residence held not to constitute a homestead within Civ. Code, § 1237, in that character of business maintained thereon was one entirely foreign to the conception of a home.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Homestead.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Carrie M. Lorenz against A. D. Hunt, also known as Arthur D. Hunt, and another. From the portion of the judgment holding a homestead declaration of defendants invalid as to certain lot, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 264 P. 336.

W. H. Carlin and W. E. Davies, all of Marysville, for appellants.

Erling S. Norby, of Marysville, for respondent.

BARTLETT, Justice pro tem. This is an action asking that a homestead declaration be set aside and declared invalid, and the lands described in the declaration adjudged subject to the lien of a judgment which plaintiff obtained against the defendant A. D. Hunt subsequent to the filing and recording of the homestead declaration by his wife, Luella Mae Hunt. The trial court set aside the declaration in so far as it affected one of the lots described, declared valid the homestead as to two adjoining lots, and also declared certain insurance moneys due defendants on account of the destruction of a dance hall that was on the lot held not within the homestead, subject to the lien of the writ of execution issued on plaintiff's judgment. Defendants appeal from that portion of the judgment declaring the homestead declaration invalid as to lot No. 28 of the subdivision of tract No. 11 of the Yuba Gardens, situated about one mile south of Marysville in Yuba county, Cal.

As the facts in the case, the trial court found that on May 8, 1925, judgment was entered in the superior court of Yuba county, Cal., in favor of plaintiff and against defendant A. D. Hunt for the sum of $2,500 and costs; that no part of this judgment has been paid; that a writ of execution thereon was duly issued and levied on July 17, 1925, on all the interest of defendant A. D. Hunt in and to two parcels of real property in Marysville, Yuba county, Cal., parcel No. 1 being lots 27 and 28 of tract 11 of Yuba Gardens, and tract No. 2 being commonly known as the "Shoemate place," this parcel containing 87/100 of an acre of land; that defendant Luella Mae Hunt is and was at all times mentioned in the proceedings the wife of defendant A. D. Hunt; that, after the levy of the writ of execution, a large dance hall on lot 28 of subdivision of tract 11 was destroyed by fire; that certain insurance money payable to defendants on account of this fire damage has also been levied upon by plaintiff; that on April 25, 1925, defendant Luella Mae Hunt, as the wife of A. D. Hunt, filed and recorded a declaration of homestead on the properties above mentioned; that the parcels of land are contiguous, but were bought by defendants from different parties under different conveyances; that, when the declaration was filed, defendants were actually residing on the parcel of land known as the "Shoemate place," their dwelling house being thereon; that a portion of this dwelling house was used as a merchandising store, having in front of it a gasoline and oil station; that the only use made of lot 27 by defendants was for pasturing one cow and some Shetland ponies; that lot 28 was never at any time used for residence purposes or for the use of the home; that on lot 28 a large dance hall was situated where defendants held Saturday night public dances for several years prior to the trial of this action, and until this dance hall was destroyed by a fire occurring some time after the levy of plaintiff's writ of execution. As conclusions of law on the findings, the court declared defendants entitled to a judgment validating the homestead on lot 27 of tract No. 11 of Yuba Gardens and the diagonal plot of land adjoining lot 28 of tract 11 of Yuba Gardens, and declaring plaintiff entitled to judgment declaring invalid the homestead as to lot 28 of the subdivision of tract No. 11 of Yuba Gardens, and adjudging this last lot subject to the lien of plaintiff's judgment and writ of execution, and also adjudging the insurance moneys due defendants on account of the destruction by fire of the dance hall on lot 28 subject to plaintiff's writ of execution levied thereon.

Whether or not the determination of the trial court that the homestead was invalid as to lot 28 of the subdivision of tract 11 and the improvements thereon is the proper adjudication of that question under the evidence in the case is the only matter presented for decision on this appeal.

Section 1237 of the Civil Code specifies as the property of which a homestead consists:

> "The dwelling house in which the claimant resides and the land on which the same is situated, selected as in this title provided."

The trial court in this case awarded defendants the land on which their dwelling house was situated and said house. The facts in this case are very similar to those in the leading case in California relative to property that can be impressed with the privileges of homesteads. Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 220, 91 Am. Dec. 637. There a homestead declaration was filed covering four town lots in Napa City. The family lived on one lot, and on the other lots were a bank or gymnasium building, a storehouse, and several dwellings, all used by tenants of the homesteader. The action was one in equity to restrain the collection of a judgment against the homesteaders. As in this case, the trial court declared valid the homestead in so far as it covered the lot on which the residence of the family was situated, and declared that the residue of the properties was subject to sale under the execution issued on the judgment. In its opinion the court says:

> "The primary object of all legislation upon the subject of homestead exemption is not, as claimed by counsel for the appellants, to exempt from forced sale a certain amount of the real estate of the head of a family, including the homestead, whether estimated by quantity or value, but to exempt the homestead, including quantity or value, within the limits specified. * * * In all cases like the present, two questions only are presented: First—what is the debtor's homestead as a matter of fact? or, in other words, how much of the land in question has he actually occupied and used as a homestead? and, second—what is its value? Whatever, in fact, constitutes his homestead at the time of making the declaration and does not exceed five thousand dollars in value, must be declared exempt. Both are questions of fact, except so far as the first may rest on legal definition.
> "Both in the Constitution and in the statute the word 'homestead' is used in its ordinary or popular sense—or, in other words, its legal sense is also its popular sense. It represents the dwelling house, at which the family resides, with the usual and customary appurtenances, including outbuildings of every kind necessary or convenient for family use and lands used for the purposes thereof. * * * Whatever is used—being either necessary or convenient—as a place of residence for the family as contradistinguished from a place of business, consti> tutes the homestead, subject to the statutory limit as to value. If, however, it is also used as a place of business by the family, which frequently happens, it may not therefore cease to be a homestead, if it would be necessary or convenient for family use independent of the business."

A similar question was presented in the case of In re Allen, 78 Cal. 293, 20 P. 679, where a homestead was set apart in an insolvency proceeding. The homestead declaration covered lots 4 and 5 of block 39 of the town of Chico. The lots adjoined each other, and were worth together under $5,000. The family dwelling was on lot 5, and outhouses and chicken yard covered the rear portion of lot 4. The front portion of lot 4, 89 feet in depth, was used for business purposes. Upon this part of lot 4 was a two-story building which the court found had since its erection been used principally for business purposes, to wit, general blacksmithing, wagon building, and repairing, painting, and varnishing wagons, the balance of the 89 feet being used in connection with the business. The judgment setting aside the two lots as a homestead was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, the court basing its action on the decision in the case of Maloney v. Hefer, 75 Cal. 422, 17 P. 539, 7 Am. St. Rep. 180, wherein it is said:

> "It is the principal use to which property is put, and not quantity, which furnishes the test in determining the question whether or not property is subject to dedication as a homestead."

In the case last cited, the homestead was filed by a wife on a lot which had two houses thereon, declarant residing in the rear house, and the front one being occupied by tenants when the homestead was filed. The action was to quiet title to the portion of the lot occupied by the front house, which had been sold and a sheriff's deed executed therefor. The court found the front house and premises were not the homestead, and awarded the title to the purchaser at the sheriff's sale and the judgment was affirmed.

The facts in the case of Guernsey v. Douglas, 171 Cal. 329, 153 P. 227, are quite similar to the case at bar. This was an action brought to set aside a homestead declaration which covered adjoining uninclosed lots on one of which the family residence was situated. No use was made of the other lots, except that the owner occasionally stored his painter's tools on them, sometimes pasturing a horse thereon, and cut wild grass from them for horse feed. The trial court declared the homestead invalid as to the lots other than the one the dwelling house was situated upon, and, on appeal, the judgment was affirmed.

An analysis of the cases cited by counsel for appellant wherein homesteads upon property on which were structures used for business purposes as well as the dwelling house occupied by the declarant and family will show facts different from those concerning the lot and improvements in question here. The properties in Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Cal. 181, 76 Am. Dec. 516, constituted a farm of 160 acres, upon which there was originally erected a dwelling house, which subsequently was enlarged and used for both residence and hotel purposes. The court says:

> "A homestead is the residence of the family—is the place where the home is—and it would seem unreasonable, upon first impressions, that premises should be regarded as a homestead, unless devoted principally to such residence and home. It would seem unreasonable, for example, that a gas factory should be impressed with the character of a homestead, because the owner resided with his family in the upper story of the building, or that a storehouse should become exempt from execution, because the owner occupied the basement in the same way. The question whether property devoted chiefly to business purposes can be subject to a homestead claim is full of embarrassment, and we are not required to lay down any positive rule on the subject in the present case. In this case the building was intended for a dwelling house, as well as a hotel. It was the intention of the owner in its construction to make it his residence. It was occupied by him and his family as such residence before it was ever used as a hotel. The nature and extent of the business did not interfere with its general character as a dwelling house. The keeping of boarders and accommodation of lodgers and travelers were not inconsistent with the main purpose of taking up the one hundred and sixty acres, and the erection of the building."

The case of Heathman v. Holmes, 94 Cal. 291, 29 P. 404, differs widely in its facts from those in the proceeding under discussion. There the homestead declarant purchased the lot in question for the purpose of making a home thereon for himself and family, and did erect such home, and lived therein for some three years before erecting a large addition thereto and leasing the greater portion of the house for business purposes. He reserved for living purposes a portion of the building, and continued to actually reside therein with his family. The fact that the building continued to be the bona fide residence of the claimant was made the test upon which the homestead character of the properties was upheld. The case of Laughlin v. Wright, 63 Cal. 113, announces the same conclusion that the bona fide use for residence purposes will overcome the objection that the properties are also used for business purposes.

In Hohn v. Pauly, 11 Cal. App. 724, 106 P. 266, the original purpose of the building was to provide both a home and a place for boarders and lodgers. There is no question as to the premises homesteaded being the bona fide home of the declarant when the homestead was filed.

The use made of the lot in question here, adjudged subject to plaintiff's judgment, is shown by the evidence to have been the maintaining thereon of a dance hall by defendants where public dances for monetary remuneration were conducted. The character of the business maintained is one entirely foreign to the conception of a home. The judgment in this case does not affect the homestead declared other than to limit its extent to the property occupied for residence purposes and the business of store keeping and oil station and supplies which was being conducted on the Shoemate lot, when the declaration was made. In adjudging the Shoemate lot and lot 27 of the subdivision of tract 11 a homestead, and not subject to the plaintiff's judgment, the trial court gave as liberal a construction to the homestead law as should be given under the facts in this case, and no sufficient reason appears for changing the adjudication made in this instance by that court.

The judgment is affirmed.

W. P. HERBERT CO. v. POWELL et al.
(Civ. 5074.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 11, 1928.

1. Automobiles 🔑19—Seller's indorsement of certificate of registration in manner in which it was issued him passes title to innocent purchaser.

For purpose of passing title to automobile to an innocent purchaser for value, seller may indorse certificate of registration in the manner in which it was issued to him, such indorsement being sufficient.

2. Automobiles 🔑19—Buyer's transfer of automobile purchased and delivery of registration certificate constituted some evidence of authorization to transferee to indorse certificate (Civ. Code, § 1052).

Transaction by which buyer of automobile to whom certificate of registration was issued turned it over to third party, contemplating payment at some future time, and delivered registration certificate, constituted some evidence of authorization to the third party to indorse the certificate of registration in case of reregistration of the automobile under Civ. Code, § 1052.

3. Criminal law 🔑323—Commission of crime is not presumed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1).

It is well settled that commission of crime cannot be presumed, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1.

4. Automobiles 🔑19—It was not presumed that person to whom automobile and registration certificate were delivered indorsed transferor's name to certificate on resale of car without authority (Civ. Code, § 1052; Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1).

Where buyer of automobile delivered car and registration certificate to another to help him out, contemplating future payment for the car, it was not presumed that the third person acted without authority in indorsing transferor's name on certificate on resale of automobile and reregistration, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1, and in view of Civ. Code, § 1052, permitting transfer without writing unless writing is expressly required since commission of crime will not be presumed.

5. Automobiles 🔑19—Discrepancy between initials given by person selling car and those shown by certificate of registration held not to preclude buyer's status as bona fide purchaser, where inquiry would not have disclosed claim of original conditional seller (Civ. Code, § 19).

Fact that person from whom plaintiff purchased automobile represented himself as N. E. Whittemore and produced certificate of registration showing that W. E. Whittemore was registered owner did not prevent purchaser's occupying position of bona fide purchaser as against original conditional seller of car under Civ. Code, § 19, where diligent inquiry would not have disclosed any claim of the conditional seller, but would have merely shown that the owner's name was incorrectly stated in the certificate.

6. Estoppel 🔑75—Conditional seller of automobile, permitting buyer to have new certificate issued showing buyer's legal and equitable title, is estopped as against bona fide purchaser from buyer (Motor Vehicle Act 1913).

Conditional seller of car by indorsing certificate of registration and delivering it to buyer and permitting him to have a new certificate of registration issued in his own name in which he appeared to be the legal and equitable owner of the automobile is estopped to claim title under Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1913, p. 641) as against any bona fide purchaser from buyer.

7. Automobiles 🔑19—Conditional seller of automobile was not relieved from negligence in permitting buyer to take out certificate showing legal and equitable title by fact that certificate incorrectly stated buyer's initials.

Fact that mistake was made in one of initials of buyer's name in reissuing certificate of registration to him did not relieve conditional seller from result of its negligence in permitting buyer to take out new certificate in which he appeared to have both legal and equitable title.

8. Automobiles 🔑19—Delivery of automobile and registration certificate without written statement of transfer held not to effect sale (Civ. Code, § 1052; Motor Vehicle Act 1919).

Transaction by which buyer in whose name automobile was registered delivered the registration certificate and the automobile to another, contemplating future payment, held not to constitute legal transfer of ownership of automobile under Civ. Code, § 1052, since Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 191) requires signing of statement of the transfer as condition to reregistering car in transferee's name and makes intended transfer incomplete before transferee's receipt of certificate.

9. Automobiles 🔑19—Requirement of written contract on transfer of automobile impliedly becomes part of agreement for sale (Motor Vehicle Act 1919).

Provision of Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 191), relative to requirement of written contract for transfer of car, impliedly becomes part and parcel of agreement for sale, since without compliance with statutory requirement no delivery of automobile could legally be made.

10. Automobiles 🔑19—Alleged oral authorization by delivery of car and registration certificate to agent held insufficient to permit agent's execution of statement of transfer in principal's name (Civ. Code, §§ 1052, 2309; Motor Vehicle Act 1919).

Alleged oral or implied authorization to agent to whom automobile and registration certificate were delivered held insufficient to permit agent's use of principal's name in selling car and executing statement of transfer under Civ. Code, § 1052, and Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 191), since contract for transfer of title to automobile is required by law to be in writing, and authority to enter into it must therefore be given by instrument in writing under Civ. Code, § 2309.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the W. P. Herbert Company against John W. Powell and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Salisbury & McNeil, Verne E. Robinson, and Wiley J. Shannon, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Carroll Allen, of Los Angeles, for respondent Anglo-California Trust Co.

HOUSER, J. The action upon which this appeal is based was for alleged damages which resulted to plaintiff from an alleged conversion by defendants of an automobile of which plaintiff claimed to be the owner. The facts necessary to a determination of the controversy are as follows: The defendant H. A. Sellers Company was the owner of an automobile which, on a conditional sale contract, it sold to one N. E. Whittemore. By the terms of the contract between the parties, until the entire purchase price of the automobile should be paid, the legal title to the automobile was to remain in the Sellers Company. However, at the time the automobile was delivered to Whittemore, the Sellers Company indorsed and delivered to Whittemore the certificate of registration of the automobile, in which no mention was made of any claim on the part of the Sellers Company to the legal title to the automobile. On the same day Whittemore made application to have the automobile reregistered in his own name as the legal and equitable owner thereof. Instead of the certificate being issued to the applicant N. E. Whittemore, through some inadvertence it was issued to W. E. Whittemore. Two days later the Sellers Company assigned the conditional sale contract to defendant Anglo-California Trust Company. It further appears: That until shortly before the occurrence of the foregoing transaction Whittemore had been in partnership in business with one Stephens, but which partnership at the time when the purchase of the automobile in question was made had been dissolved. "That after the dissolution of said partnership, said Stephens represented to Whittemore that he was hard up and wanted to get started again, and said Whittemore, in order to help said Stephens along, turned said automobile over to him and told said Stephens to take it and when he got on his feet they would arrange for the payment of the same. That at said time said Whittemore also delivered to said Stephens the registration certificate in the car. Stephens left (Fresno) with said automobile for Los Angeles, and this was the last time that Whittemore ever saw or heard anything about said automobile until after the commencement of this action." On the third day following the purchase of the automobile by Whittemore, "a person representing himself to be N. E. Whittemore sold and delivered said automobile to W. P. Herbert Company, the plaintiff herein, and indorsed the certificate of registration thereon as registered and legal owner and delivered said certificate of registration to said W. P. Herbert Company. * * * That said W. P. Herbert Company purchased said automobile upon reliance on the facts set forth in the said certificate of registration, paid a valuable consideration for said automobile, and acted in good faith in said transaction and without knowledge of the claim of any other persons." Thereafter, on a conditional sale contract, the Herbert Company sold the automobile to one H. D. Coley, and then assigned the conditional sale contract to California Finance Company. Within a few months following the last-mentioned transaction the Sellers Company and the Anglo-California Trust Company took the automobile from Coley against his will and without his permission and then sold the automobile to other persons. Before the commencement of this action Coley and California Finance Company assigned their and each of their rights, etc., in the automobile to the Herbert Company. On such facts judgment was ordered in favor of the defendants, and plaintiff has appealed therefrom.

[1, 2] In principle, the law appears well settled that for the purpose of passing title to an innocent purchaser for value, Whittemore had the right to indorse the certificate of registration in the manner in which it had been issued to him. People v. Ryan, 74 Cal. App. 125, 127, 239 P. 419; Commonwealth v. Costello, 120 Mass. 358, 371; Ray v. American Photo Player Co., 46 Cal. App. 311, 189 P. 130; Emery v. Kipp, 154 Cal. 83, 86, 97 P. 17, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, 129 Am. St. Rep. 141, 16 Ann. Cas. 792; Fallon v. Kehoe, 38 Cal. 44, 49, 99 Am. Dec. 347; Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 239, 242, 24 P. 114. His transaction with Stephens in which "Whittemore, in order to help said Stephens along, turned said automobile over to him and told said Stephens to take it and when he got on his feet they would arrange for the payment of the same," at the same time delivering to Stephens "the registration certificate in the car," is some evidence of an authorization by Whittemore to Stephens, in case of a reregistration of the automobile, to indorse the certificate of registration. By statutory provision, in substance the rule is laid down that a transfer may be made without writing in every case in which a writing is not expressly required by statute. Section 1052, Civ. Code. See, also, Bedig v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. App.) 258 P. 148; Dingley v. McDonald, 124 Cal. 90, 94, 56 P. 790; Copp v. Mulcahy (Cal. App.) 258 P. 141; Straus v. Eaton, 47 Cal. App. 538, 190 P. 1033; Union Mutual L. I. Co. v. Broderick, 196 Cal. 497, 238 P. 1034; McGown v. Dalzell, 72 Cal. App. 197, 236 P. 941; Ralph v. Anderson, 187 Cal. 45, 200 P. 940; Humboldt Milling Co. v. Northwestern Pac. Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 175, 135 P. 503; Bickerdike v. State, 144 Cal. 681, 78 P. 270; Smith v. Peck, 128 Cal. 527, 61 P. 77; Edwards v. Wagner, 121 Cal. 376, 53 P. 821; Hellman v. McWilliams, 70 Cal. 449, 11 P. 659; Doran v. Doran, 99 Cal. 311, 315, 33 P. 929.

[3, 4] Although it appears that the Herbert Company purchased the automobile from "a person representing himself to be N. E. Whittemore," it may be inferred that the seller was none other than Stephens. The certificate of registration showed that the owner of the automobile was not N. E. Whittemore, but was W. E. Whittemore. Up to a time very shortly before the acquisition of the automobile by Whittemore, he and Stephens had been in partnership, and Stephens was presumably familiar with Whittemore's correct initials. Three days only had elapsed between the time of Whittemore's purchase of the automobile and its sale to the Herbert Company by some one who represented himself as N. E. Whittemore. A stranger to Whittemore probably would not have known Whittemore's correct initials, or noticed that the initials of Whittemore's name as they appeared in the certificate of registration were correct. Had the certificate of registration been indorsed by a person not authorized by Whittemore to do so, a criminal offense would have been committed; and the rule of law is well settled that commission of a crime cannot be presumed.

In the case of Bickerdike v. State, 144 Cal. 698, 701, 78 P. 277, 278, it is said:

> "The law presumes that a person is innocent of crime or wrong (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1) in civil as well as in criminal cases (Hunter v. Hunter, 111 Cal. 261, 267 [43 P. 756, 31 L. R. A. 411, 52 Am. St. Rep. 180]), and it will be presumed that the persons making the transfers and executing the powers of attorney did not attempt to personate others, and by so doing fraudulently procure property to which they were not entitled, but rather that they were the persons whom they represented themselves to be, the persons designated in the certificates of which they had possession, and the owners of the claims which they purported to sell."

See, also, Guidera v. Lapiana, 52 Cal. App. 460, 467, 199 P. 557; Cooper v. Spring Valley Water Co., 16 Cal. App. 17, 23, 116 P. 298.

[5] Section 19 of the Civil Code provides that:

> "Every person who has actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact, has constructive notice of the fact itself in all cases in which, by prosecuting such inquiry, he might have learned such fact."

Applying such statement of the law, it would seem that when the person from whom the plaintiff purchased the automobile represented himself as N. E. Whittemore and produced a certificate of registration showing that W. E. Whittemore was the registered owner, the plaintiff had "actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry" regarding the fact whether N. E. Whittemore or W. E. Whittemore was the owner of the automobile. But had the plaintiff made diligent inquiry concerning such matter, all it could reasonably have discovered would have been the fact that while N. E. Whittemore was the correct name of the owner of the automobile, the certificate of registration had been incorrectly issued to him in the name of W. E. Whittemore. So far as any claim to or equity in the automobile by other persons was concerned, no reasonable inquiry on the part of the plaintiff would have disclosed the fact that either the H. A. Sellers Co. or the Anglo-California Company had or claimed to have any legal or beneficial interest in the automobile.

[6, 7] In the case of Hammond v. Hazard, 40 Cal. App. 45, 49, 180 P. 46, where the authorities are cited, it is held that by the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1913, p. 641), the owner of an automobile is required to have it registered in his name, and that such requirement warrants a finding by the trial court that the person in whose name an automobile is registered is in fact the rightful owner thereof. See, also, 22 Cal. Jur. 667. It is clear that by indorsing the certificate of registration of the automobile and delivering it to Whittemore and permitting him to have a new certificate of registration issued to him in which he appeared to be the legal and equitable owner of the automobile, the Sellers Company and its assignee were estopped to claim title to the automobile, so far as any bona fide purchaser from Whittemore was concerned. Parke v. Franciscus, 194 Cal. 284, 228 P. 435. The fact that in issuing the certificate of registration a mistake was made in one of the initials of Whittemore's name would not have the effect of relieving the Sellers Company from the result of its negligence. It is apparent that because of such negligence on the part of the Sellers Company in permitting Whittemore to procure the issuance of the certificate of registration in his name, it thereafter became possible for him to convey a good title to the automobile to an innocent purchaser thereof for value. As is hereinbefore stated, no question is raised as to either the "innocence" or the "value" features of the transaction between the parties. But while Whittemore personally might have given a good title to the Herbert Company, the questions, first, as to whether orally, or by implication, Stephens was authorized to perform that act for Whittemore, and, secondly, as to whether in the absence of written authority so to do Stephens could be orally authorized to legally effect a reregistration of the automobile from Whittemore to the Herbert Company, require consideration. From the conduct of Whittemore and Stephens it may not be doubted that at least impliedly Stephens was authorized to cause the reregistration of the automobile in his own name. Had he done that and thereafter sold the automobile to the Herbert Company, in the absence of question of legality of such oral or implied authorization, it would seem incontrovertible that the Herbert Company would have received a valid title to the automobile. It may be argued that, while it may not be said that Stephens was expressly authorized to sell the automobile, nevertheless its transfer to him carried with it such a right, and that if he chose to exercise that right, the means necessary to its accomplishment were also carried with it. Manifestly, it would be a useless if not an idle act for Stephens perfunctorily to go through the form of causing a registration of the automobile to himself to be contemporaneously or immediately thereafter followed by a registration thereof to the Herbert Company, when, so far as the transaction among the interested parties was concerned, it might be consummated by the single act of reregistration as between Whittemore and the Herbert Company. But, if, without deciding that point, it be assumed that, equitably, so far as the immediate parties to the transaction were concerned, the sale was complete and had the effect of investing the Herbert Company with the ownership of the automobile, the question of its legality, so far as the Sellers Company and its assignee are interested, remains for consideration.

[8] At the time when the transaction herein involved occurred on the transfer of ownership of an automobile operated or driven on the public highways of this state, the Motor Vehicle Law (Stats. 1919, p. 191), among other things, in effect contained the provisions that for the purpose of reregistering the automobile a "statement of the transfer" should be signed by each of the parties to the transaction and the transferee make application for registration of the automobile in his name. Thereupon, "if satisfied of the genuineness and regularity of such transfer," the "department" * * * "shall register said motor vehicle in the name of said transferee" and issue a new registration certificate. The act then provides that:

> "Until said transferee has received said certificate of registration and has written his name upon the face thereof in the blank space provided for said purpose by the department, delivery of said motor vehicle shall be deemed not to have been made and title thereto shall be deemed not to have passed and said intended transfer shall be deemed to be incomplete and not to be valid or effective for any purpose. * * *" Section 7.

The case of Parke v. Franciscus, 194 Cal. 284, 228 P. 435, is authority for the rule "that the certificate of registration, which serves the purpose of the certificate of ownership and the certificate of registration provided for in the act of 1923, must have been properly indorsed upon the reverse side thereof by the transferees of the 'ownership' or title or interest in the car, filed with the motor vehicle department and a new certificate of registration issued in the name of appellants before title was completely vested in them and before the transfer could be effective or valid for any purpose." It therefore appears that the transfer of an automobile involves "a writing" and that it may not be legally made otherwise. Section 1052, Civ. Code. As between Whittemore and Stephens, no attempt at compliance with the provisions of the statute having made by them, it follows that no legal transfer of the ownership of the automobile to Stephens ever took place.

[9, 10] If, for the purposes of the argument on the sale to the Herbert Company, it be assumed that the conduct of Whittemore and Stephens amounted to an oral or an implied authorization for Stephens to make and sign the "statement of the transfer" in behalf of Whittemore, the question of the validity of such an authorization becomes of importance. Section 2309 of the Civil Code provides:

> "An oral authorization is sufficient for any purpose, except that an authority to enter into a contract required by law to be in writing can only be given by an instrument in writing."

From a consideration of the language of the statute it is apparent that, unless the various steps connected with the transfer of ownership of the automobile from Whittemore to the Herbert Company amounted to "a contract required by law to be in writing," the oral authorization by Whittemore to Stephens was sufficient. So far as the present inquiry is concerned, the statutory requirement contains two principal elements: First, the aggregate of the things necessary to be done leading to the issuance of a new certificate of registration must amount to a "contract"; and, secondly, it must be such a contract as is "required by law to be in writing"—which latter element has already received consideration. It is clear that the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (which, as hereinbefore set forth, in order that a new certificate of registration be issued to the purchaser of the automobile, required that a "statement of the transfer" should be signed by each of the parties to the transaction, and that not until after the new certificate of registration had been received by the purchaser and he had written his name upon the face thereof would the intended transfer of the automobile be deemed complete or valid or effective for any purpose—) by operation of law, or impliedly, become a part and parcel of the agreement of sale of the automobile—for without full compliance with the statutory requirements no "delivery" of the automobile could be legally made, nor would the intended transfer "be valid or effective for any purpose." In other words, whatever arrangement as to price, terms of sale, or otherwise, might be agreed upon by the seller and the buyer, the indispensable statutory prerequisite to a complete transfer of the ownership of the automobile presumably was as thoroughly understood and agreed to by each of the parties thereto as was any other covenant or condition therein; and while it was perhaps unnecessary that all the terms of the contract be written, the language of the statute directs and compels a designated portion thereof to be reduced to writing. So construed, it becomes manifest that within the meaning and intent of the provisions of section 2309 of the Civil Code—the contract being one "required by law to be in writing" —assuming the existence of an oral or an implied authorization to Stephens by Whittemore to enter into the contract in his behalf —such authorization was insufficient and could not be used as a basis for making the transfer of ownership of the automobile from Whittemore to the Herbert Company notwithstanding the good faith of the latter throughout the transaction. It follows that the judgment should be affirmed. So ordered.

BLANCO v. MARIAN REALTY CO. et al.

Supreme Court of California. May 2, 1928.

Landlord and tenant ⚷165(6)—Instruction that landlord owed highest degree of care to employee of tenant using freight elevator held error, ordinary care only being required.

Landlord, providing freight elevator without operator for use of tenants, held, as respected employee of tenant riding on elevator while moving freight thereon, under duty of exercising only ordinary care, and instruction in such employee's action for injuries to effect that landlord owed him the highest degree of care was prejudicial error.

John Ralph Wilson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by him while riding upon a certain freight elevator or sidewalk hoist connected with certain premises owned by the defendant Marian Realty Company in the city and county of San Francisco, and within which there has been conducted and operated for the past several years a market bearing the name of "Crystal Palace Public Market," but which name is only a tradename which the said Marian Realty Company employed in defining the market establishment upon their said premises. Stalls or spaces upon the main floor of said premises are leased or rented to numerous persons for the conduct by each of his particular line of trade thereon, and by the terms of their respective leases each of said persons is entitled to a certain space in the basement of said structure for the keeping of the goods, wares, or supplies which are sold upon the main floor in their, and each of their, respective stalls. In connection with the aforesaid uses of said market the said defendant installed a sidewalk elevator or hoist, to be operated between the basement and the main floor of said market, for the benefit and convenience of these, its several tenants, in transporting their goods and supplies from their place of deposit in the basement to the main floor as needed in their several lines of trade. This elevator or hoist when thus installed was and has ever since been used for freight purposes only and was not a passenger elevator in any sense of the term. It was operated by mechanical contrivances with which it was connected by a rope passing through the elevator and by means of which whoever was engaged in bringing goods or supplies from the basement to the main floor started and stopped the said hoist. This operation of the contrivance was conducted by the tenants themselves or their employees in connection with its aforesaid uses, and the only connection which the said defendant had with its actual operation consisted in providing and keeping in condition the machinery by which, through the use of said rope, it was made to rise and descend.

The plaintiff herein was and for about two years prior to the accident which caused his injuries had been an employee of a tenant named Van Erp, who conducted a stall upon the main floor of said market, with its corresponding space in the basement, and during the time of his said employment plaintiff had used and operated said elevator or hoist almost daily, and was therefore fully acquainted with the construction and condition of said elevator or hoist and with its operation. There was no cage surrounding said appliance, but it was inclosed by the walls of the building upon three sides and had a gate upon the fourth side which opened into the basement of the building and also out upon the sidewalk upon its level with the main floor. The platform of the elevator did not fit this shaft very closely and there was a space of about eight inches between the edge of its platform and the rear wall of its inclosure. It was, however, in other respects the usual type of a sidewalk elevator, for the operation of which the defendant held a license and which was subject to periodical inspection. On the day of the plaintiff's injury he had gone down with another employee of his employer to procure supplies from the basement for use in the latter's stall upon the main floor, and, having loaded the elevator with such supplies, proceeded to raise the same to the sidewalk level, both occupying the elevator, but the other employee operating the rope by which it was made to rise to its sidewalk level. While thus engaged, and while said hoist was being raised, the plaintiff's foot in some manner became caught in the space between the platform and the rear wall, from which he received certain serious injuries which form the basis of the present action. The cause was brought to trial before a jury, which returned a verdict in the plaintiff's favor for the sum of six thousand dollars. The present appeal is from the judgment rendered upon such verdict.

The main contentions of the appellant relate to alleged errors of the trial court in instructing the jury as to the measure of the defendant's duty to the plaintiff under the foregoing state of facts. The trial court gave to the jury the following instruction:

> "The owners of a building maintaining a freight elevator, owe to persons rightfully riding upon the same, the highest degree of care and are responsible for the slightest negligence; in determining whether or not the plaintiff was rightfully riding upon the elevator herein, you may take into consideration the custom prevailing with regard to this particular elevator as to persons in charge of freight accompanying the same upon the elevator and being permitted to do so; if you believe that it was the custom for persons transporting freight upon this elevator to accompany the same and that such custom was permitted or acquiesced in by the owners of the building, or rendered necessary by the conditions attending the transportation of such freight on this elevator, then the plaintiff was rightfully upon the elevator and was entitled to the highest degree of care on the part of the owners of the building to protect him from injury."

The foregoing instruction was apparently based upon the case of Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 575, 22 P. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175, wherein it was held that the owners of a building maintaining a freight elevator owed to persons rightfully riding upon the same the highest degree of care and are responsible for the slightest negligence. The case of Treadwell v. Whittier, however, was a case wherein the elevator in question was one operated by the owners of a building several stories in height and which was used by them for the purpose of transporting that portion of the general public which might become their customers to the several floors of their building, and also for the purpose of transporting their merchandise. The plaintiff in said case was one of said customers, and the elevator was one entirely and exclusively operated by the owners of the building, and it was therefore properly held therein that the owners of such building were bound to exercise the highest degree of care with respect to the passengers upon such an elevator. But that is not this case. The elevator or hoist in this case was not a passenger elevator, nor was the plaintiff, who was engaged in using the same at the time of his injury, in any proper sense of the term a passenger thereon. He was in fact as much the operator of said hoist as was his fellow employee by whose manipulation of its rope it was rising to the level of the main floor, or as his immediate employer would have been if it, and not the owners of the building, had maintained in place a person who would operate the same for the convenience of its other employees. This elevator or hoist was in fact nothing more than one of the appliances which the owner or owners of the building had supplied to the tenants thereof for their convenience, just as said owners might have supplied swinging or revolving doors at the entrances of their building, or stairways therein, and over the occupation or use of which said owners exercised no control, and with relation to which they owed no other or higher duty to their tenants or invitees than that of ordinary care.

The cases upon which the respondent relies to sustain the foregoing instruction, in addition to the case above cited, are in every instance cases of accidents arising out of the defective construction and operation of both passenger and freight elevators, and over the operation of which the defendant in each instance exercised full control. Such cases and the rules of law correctly announced therein have no application to the instant case and do not correctly define the duty which the owners of a building supplying such an appliance as a sidewalk elevator owe to their tenants, to whom or to the employees of whom the operation of said appliance is exclusively committed, and over which the owners of the building exercise no other control than that of providing the adequate machinery for its use, and with relation to which only freight is carried, and only the owner's tenants or their employees, when in charge of said freight and in the necessary manipulation of said hoist, are permitted to ride thereon.

The case of Employers' Liability, etc., Corp. v. Wagner, 215 App. Div. 566, 214 N. Y. S. 313, correctly states the rule with regard to such appliances, and the language of the court in so doing aptly applies to the instant case:

> "It is clear from the evidence in this case that the landlord supplied to the tenants of this building for their use the elevator in question. The landlord did not supply an operator. The tenants operated it and used it as they needed its use. Instead of carrying the materials they needed in their business up or down the stairs, the landlord supplied the elevator so that they could thereby carry up or bring down such materials. It was his duty to use reasonable care in the construction and maintenance of this elevator, to see that it was reasonably safe for the purpose for which it was used, and that the elevator shaft was protected by substantial and sufficient guard, door or gate, to prevent any one from falling into the shaft."

The cases of Kappes v. Brown Shoe Co., 116 Mo. App. 154, 90 S. W. 1158, and Burner v. Higman, 127 Iowa, 580, 103 N. W. 802, are also in point, and in each of said cases the rule was correctly laid down that the owners of a building providing a freight elevator for the use and convenience of their tenants to whom or to the employees of whom the actual operation of such an elevator was committed were bound to no more than ordinary care in the provision of such elevator and of the appliances by means of which it was to be operated, and that the rule with relation to the highest degree of care to be employed by the owners of buildings in the maintenance and operation by themselves of passenger elevators had no application to this class of cases.

It thus appears that the trial court was in error in giving the foregoing instruction to the jury and that the appellants were prejudicially injured thereby.

The appellant urges several other grounds of error, but in view of our foregoing conclusion we do not deem it necessary to engage in their discussion, since the questions involved therein may be avoided upon a retrial of the cause.

The judgment is reversed.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Julia Powers against the Pacific Diesel Engine Company and others for the return and delivery of certain stock certificates. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants A. E. White Company, C. J. Blumenthal, and B. Poust appeal. Affirmed.

William Klein and Arthur H. Barendt, both of San Francisco (Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

Boswell F. King and H. M. Anthony, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action for the return and delivery to her of certain stock certificates of Pacific Diesel Engine Company, a corporation. The facts, which are virtually undisputed, as established by the evidence and found by the court follow:

Plaintiff, a resident of Benecia and a lady of about 70 years of age, was the owner of two certificates representing 328 shares of stock, par value $10 per share, of said Pacific Diesel Engine Company. About May 8 or 9, 1925, two men called at her home, falsely representing to her that they had been sent by said company to take up its stock certificates for the purpose of correcting errors on its books prior to paying dividends. They told her that she would have her stock back in two weeks, and that they would also arrange for her to acquire additional shares, the rights to which she had relinquished under a prior subscription. By these false representations she was induced to and did indorse said certificates in blank and delivered them, without consideration of any kind, to said men, taking therefor a receipt signed "M. Klein." She was told that M. Klein was a man in the office; hence the signature of his name to the receipt.

About May 22, 1925, a licensed broker, Max Klein, but not identified as the fictitious "M. Klein," offered for sale and sold to appellant C. J. Blumenthal, a licensed broker operating under the name of A. E. White Company, said two certificates of stock at the current price on the open market, to wit, $1,049.96. The depreciation in value of the stock was due to the fact that the company had closed its plant and was in the hands of a receiver. Mr. Blumenthal then sent the certificates to the Diesel Company for transfer on its books to the name of his secretary, B. Poust. In the meantime plaintiff had suspected fraud and had communicated with the company. The company therefore held the certificates, and upon issuance of a temporary restraining order herein delivered them into the custody of the court. Subsequently findings and judgment were rendered in favor of plaintiff, ordering the return of said certificates to her. Defendants White Company, Blumenthal, and Poust have appealed.

[1, 2] If appellants have any claim to the stock it is because they obtained it under such circumstances as to estop the true owner from asserting her ownership as against them. It is true that, "where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer" (section 3543, Civ. Code), and that where the true owner clothes another with apparent authority over and all the indicia of ownership of property, and innocent third parties are thus led into dealing with such apparent owner, they will be protected (section 1962, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc.; Woodsum v. Cole, 69 Cal. 142, 144, 10 P. 331; Wendling Lbr. Co. v. Glenwood Lbr. Co., 54 Cal. App. 691, 695, 202 P. 929, and cases there cited).

But appellants are in no position to invoke the aid of these equitable principles. There was no intent on the part of plaintiff to invest any person with apparent ownership or control over said stock. She believed that she was dealing directly with the corporation, and possession of the certificates was obtained from her by fraud amounting to larceny by trick and device. The fact of indorsement of the certificates under such circumstances is immaterial. Thus, also, cases cited by appellants, such as Rapp v. Hauger Motors Co., 77 Cal. App. 417, 246 P. 1067, wherein the intent and act of the true owner was to vest in another on his behalf power over property, are not applicable to the facts here.

[3, 4] Certificates of corporate stock are not negotiable instruments, and the transferee takes such certificates subject to all legal and equitable defenses. Barstow v. Savage M. Co., 64 Cal. 388, 1 P. 349, 49 Am. Rep. 705; Graves v. Mono Lake M. Co., 81 Cal. 304, 22 P. 665; Craig v. Hesperia Land Co., 113 Cal. 7, 13, 45 P. 10, 35 L. R. A. 306, 54 Am. St. Rep. 316; O'Dea v. Hollywood Cemetery Ass'n, 154 Cal. 53, 72, 97 P. 1; Kohn v. Sac. Elec. G. & R. Co., 168 Cal. 1, 8, 141 P. 626. "The mere possession of chattels, by whatever means acquired, if there be no other evidence of property or authority to sell from the true owner, will not enable the possessor to give a good title." Barstow v. Savage M. Co., supra, at p. 391, 1 P. 350. See, also, Coolidge v. Austin, 22 Cal. App. 337, 134 P. 357, and Woodsum v. Cole, supra. The burden was upon appellants to show acts by the true owner amounting to negligence of a sufficient degree to invoke the doctrine of estoppel, and appellants in no way attempted to meet this burden. "But if the purchaser from one who has not the title, and has no real authority to sell, relies for his protection on the negligence of the true owner, he must show that such negligence was the proximate cause of the deceit. Barstow v. Savage Mining Co., 64 Cal. 388, 393, 1 P. 349 [352], 49 Am. Rep. 705. The burden is upon the one seeking to invoke the exception to the general rule. Woodsum v. Cole, 69 Cal. 142, 145, 10 P. 331; Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 34, 45, 73 P. 803." Stoner v. Security Trust Co., 47 Cal. App. 216, 223, 190 P. 500, 503.

No effort was made to produce the broker, Max Klein, although apparently there was no reason for failure to do so; his identity was neither connected with nor severed from that of the fictitious "M. Klein" and his alleged associates. The fact that the person who was alleged to have sold the goods was not present to testify in appellants' behalf was a circumstance properly considered in determining the probable truth or falsity of appellants' claim. Peo. v. Cline, 83 Cal. 374, 378, 23 P. 391. The cases of Swim v. Wilson, 90 Cal. 126, 27 P. 33, 13 L. R. A. 605, 25 Am. St. Rep. 110, and Barstow v. Savage Mining Co., supra, and other authorities, review thoroughly the principles governing the situation before us and compel a resolution of all points in favor of plaintiff. Prolonged discussion is unnecessary. The thieves could pass no title to appellants, and plaintiff had the right to pursue her property. No error was committed by the trial court in failing to find upon the cross-complaint of defendant Blumenthal, which alleged refusal of the Diesel Company to transfer the stock on its books and prayed judgment against plaintiff for conversion thereof. Such finding, if made, would have been adverse to appellants and its absence is immaterial.

In this cause the appellants did not controvert by evidence any of the allegations of the complaint or any of the testimony of plaintiff. The rules of law controlling the cause are well settled. The appeal clearly appears to have been taken for delay. Judgment affirmed, with $100 damages to plaintiff for a frivolous appeal.

BENNETT v. CHANSLOR & LYON CO. et al.

Supreme Court of California. April 21, 1928.

1. Automobiles ⚷244(11)—Negligence ⚷135—Evidence held to support judgment for plaintiff for injuries in automobile collision at street intersection, as against contention that negligence of plaintiff's husband, and not defendants, caused injury.

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision at street intersection, evidence held to support judgment for plaintiff who was riding with husband, as against contention that no negligence of defendants was shown, and that proximate cause of accident was negligence of plaintiff's husband, in view of conflicting evidence as to whether car in which plaintiff rode had lights, and speed at which cars were traveling, and instruction that husband's contributory negligence would bar recovery.

2. Appeal and error ⚷994(2), 1002—Appellate court cannot determine credibility of witnesses and conflicts in proof.

Appellate court cannot usurp function of jury and trial court by determining, in place of those arbitrators of fact, credibility of witnesses and conflicts in proof.

3. Negligence ⚷113(6)—Complaint, in action for injuries in automobile collision at street intersection, held not demurrable as ambiguous, and not stating cause of action, for failure to allege with whom plaintiff was riding as guest.

In action for personal injuries sustained in automobile collision at street intersection, demurrer urging that complaint was ambiguous, unintelligible, and failed to state cause of action in not showing with whom plaintiff was riding as guest, nor who owned automobile in which she rode, held properly overruled, since imputed negligence is matter of defense.

4. Negligence ⚷122(1)—In action for injuries in automobile collision, defendant must show relationship under which driver's negligence would be imputable to plaintiff and bar recovery.

Where, in action for injuries sustained in automobile collision, relationship between driver of vehicle and injured passenger was such that his negligence would be imputable to her and bar recovery, burden is on defendants to prove such relationship; plaintiff not being required to anticipate defenses.

5. Trial ⚷296(4, 5)—Modification of instruction by striking words therefrom held not reversible error, where another instruction covered words stricken.

In action for injuries in automobile collision at street intersection, modification of instruction that contributory negligence of driver of car in which plaintiff rode was imputable to plaintiff, by striking therefrom words "and she cannot recover," held not reversible error, where another instruction clearly stated that husband's contributory negligence would require finding for defendants.

6. Appeal and error ⚷1078(1)—Reviewing court will not discuss question not argued in brief.

On appeal in personal injury action, reviewing court will not discuss question which appellant has not argued in briefs.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Emeline A. Bennett, also known as Emeline A. Spafford, against the Chanslor & Lyon Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ray W. Hays, of Fresno, for appellants.
Butler, Van Dyke & Desmond, of Sacramento, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment rendered for plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries received when an automobile in which she was riding, and which was being driven by her husband, was struck by an automobile operated by defendant E. C. Kellogg. Defendant Chanslor & Lyon Company, a corporation, was the owner of the automobile operated by defendant E. C. Kellogg, whom it employed in the capacity of credit manager in the San Joaquin valley district. The jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff against both defendants in the sum of $9,041. Defendants' motion for a new trial was thereafter denied on condition that plaintiff file a remission consenting to the reduction of the damages to $5,000. Plaintiff filed the required remission.

[1] Appellants contend that there is an absence of evidence of any negligence whatsoever on their part, and that the proof shows as a matter of law that the proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of plaintiff's husband, with whom she was riding, which negligence was imputable to her, and bars her right of recovery upon the authority of Basler v. Sacramento Ry., 158 Cal. 514, 111 P. 530, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 642, and decisions following that case. It was there held that the negligence of the husband precluded recovery by the wife, for the reason that any damages recovered would be community property, over which the husband would have the right of management, and to permit recovery for injuries of the wife would be to allow the husband to profit by his own wrong. We are of the opinion that the Basler Case does not rule the instant case, for the reason that the jury presumably obeyed the court's instructions which were to the effect that, if the husband was guilty of contributory negligence, the wife was not entitled to recover. The jury, therefore, impliedly found that the husband was not guilty of negligence proximately contributing to the accident.

The accident occurred between 6:30 and 6:40 p. m. on October 4, 1924, at the intersection of Van Ness avenue and Stanislaus street in the city of Fresno. The sun set at 5:38 on said date. Both streets are busy thoroughfares. The car in which plaintiff was riding, a National touring car, was proceeding westerly on Stanislaus street. Defendant Kellogg was moving in a northerly direction on Van Ness avenue in the automobile owned by defendant Chanslor & Lyon Company, which was a Nash roadster.

Plaintiff's husband stated in his deposition introduced in evidence that he and plaintiff had been visiting friends on Stanislaus street several blocks east of the intersection where the accident occurred; that upon leaving their friends' home he turned on the lights on his car, and proceeded westerly on Stanislaus street to Van Ness avenue at a speed of 10–12 miles an hour. He further stated that when he reached the intersection he looked south, and observed the Nash roadster "about half a block away," or at least 100 yards south of the intersection, and, thinking there was no question of his ability to safely cross, proceeded ahead, and knew nothing further of defendants' car until it violently struck his car at a point west of the center line of Van Ness avenue with such force that the doors of his car flew open, and plaintiff was thrown into the street a distance of 15 to 20 feet. The Nash roadster was not brought to a stop by the impact of the collision, but continued to move in a northwesterly direction, and in its course struck the automobile of Dr. and Mrs. Anderson, witnesses on defendants' behalf, who were driving south on Van Ness avenue, and reached the intersection at approximately the same time as the other two cars.

The plaintiff, as well as her husband, testified that the lights on the car in which she was riding were turned on when she and her husband left their friends' home, and that it was not "real dark" at the time, but "dusk."

Defendants' version of the collision, as given by defendant Kellogg and by Dr. and Mrs. Anderson, differs from the account of plaintiff and her husband. According to Kellogg, he failed to observe the car until it was directly in front of him at a distance of only several feet, because it was dark, and the car was not lighted; it was traveling at a speed of not less than 20 miles an hour, and the speed of his car did not exceed 15 miles an hour. Both Dr. and Mrs. Anderson estimated the speed of the car in which plaintiff was riding as between 25 and 30 miles an hour, and both united in testifying that it was without lights. Kellogg also stated that the collision took place on the easterly side of the street, and not on the westerly, or his left side of the street, as claimed by plaintiff's husband. The testimony of plaintiff's husband was that he turned the lights of his car off immediately after the impact.

[2] The record presents a sharp conflict on material points. As an appellate court, we cannot usurp the function of the jury and the trial court, who finally passed upon the weight, effect, and sufficiency of the evidence and the credibility of witnesses, and determine in place of these arbiters of fact the credibility of witnesses and resolve conflicts in proof. From a consideration of plaintiff's evidence, which is sufficient as a matter of law to sustain the judgment, the jury must have inferred that defendant Kellogg negligently failed to observe the approaching car in time to avoid a collision, or, being aware of the presence of said car, negligently failed to so operate his own car as to avoid striking the car in which plaintiff was riding. The jury was further warranted in concluding that the plaintiff's husband was free from negligence in going forward across the intersection and acted as a person of reasonable prudence in not apprehending a collision with the Nash roadster, which he observed a half a block south, or 100 yards from the intersection.

[3, 4] The defendants' demurrer, urging that the complaint was ambiguous and unintelligible, and failed to state a cause of action, in that it could not be determined therefrom with whom plaintiff was riding as a guest, nor who owned the automobile in which she was riding, was properly overruled. Defendants suffered no injury whatsoever from the omission of said allegations, as the facts were alleged in the answer and fully brought out at the trial. The complaint merely alleged that plaintiff was riding as a guest in a certain National automobile. Imputed negligence, like contributory negligence, is a matter of defense. If the relationship between the driver of the vehicle and the plaintiff was such that his negligence would be imputable to her and bar her recovery, the burden was upon defendants to allege and prove such relationship. Plaintiff was not required to anticipate defenses.

[5] Appellants' contention that the trial court committed reversible error in modifying certain instructions offered by them is without merit. Although the court modified an instruction in which the jury was told that, if plaintiff's husband negligently and carelessly operated his automobile, and his negligence contributed proximately to plaintiff's injury, they should find that his negligence was imputable to her, by striking therefrom the words "and she cannot recover," the jury was clearly told in another instruction that, if negligence of the husband contributed proximately to the injury, they should find for the defendants.

[6] Defendant Chanslor & Lyon Company, in its answer to the complaint, denied that defendant Kellogg was acting as its agent or in the course of his employment when the accident occurred. The jury, in rendering the verdict against said company under instructions from the court as to the liability of an employer for torts of an employee, impliedly found against said company on the facts and circumstances of the case. We do not discuss said issue herein, for the reason that we find no reversible error, and for the further reason that appellant company has not argued the question in the briefs filed.

This case, like many others of its class, presents a question of conflicting evidence passed upon in the first instance by the jury and finally by the trial court. The verdict of the jury and judgment entered thereon is sufficienctly supported by evidence to be found in the record.

The foregoing disposes of all questions raised by appellants in their opening brief. Judgment affirmed.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 12705.)

Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1928.

1. Master and servant ⚷419—Claim for adjustment, filed more than 6 months after commutation but within 6 months after compensation period, held not barred (Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 28, 11[c]).

Commutation of weekly payments under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 28 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749), fixing present value of final 38 weekly payments for permanent partial disability, held not to bar application for adjustment of compensation, filed more than 6 months after date to which payments were commuted but within 6 months from end of period over which compensation would have otherwise extended, under section 11(c).

2. Master and servant ⚷419—Commission's approval of commutation agreement for loss of eye held not to prevent subsequent award for total blindness not previously considered (Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 27, 28).

Prior approval by Industrial Accident Commission of commutation agreement allowing compensation for permanent partial disability, under Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 27 and 28 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749), payable in lump sum, even if effective as a judgment, held not to prevent commission's subsequent increase of award on basis of total disability, where commission originally overlooked fact that loss of sight of eye left employee totally blind.

In Bank.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Thomas Frazier, opposed by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. Order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation for injuries, and insurer brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

H. W. B. Smith, R. P. Wisecarver, and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. On November 30, 1923, Thomas Frazier, while engaged as a miner in the employ of Visalia Masonic Mining Company, operating in Mono county, this state, suffered injuries from a blast unintentionally set off, which resulted in the permanent destruction of the sight of his right eye and a 60 per cent. loss of hearing of the right ear. Said Frazier had, about 35 years prior to sustaining the injuries above mentioned, suffered the loss of the sight of his left eye and a slight impairment of the hearing of his left ear. By the accident of November 30, 1923, he was rendered totally blind and his hearing was impaired by the double injuries thus sustained.

Petitioner, insurance carrier of the employer of said Frazier, assumed liability for compensation on the basis of the loss of the sight of one eye and not for total blindness, and for medical attention. Compensation payments were made at the maximum rate for such injuries, to wit, $20.83 per week. The record of the proceedings is meager, due largely to the informality with which such proceedings are conducted. It appears from the record that on February 1, 1924, Dr. Victor d'Ercole, the attending physician of said injured employee, forwarded to the rating department of the commission a report of the injuries which said employee had sustained and a report on his general physical condition. The petitioner alleges that Frazier requested permanent disability rating by the rating department of the commission, and said medical report was filed with his petition or request for said rating. We find no such request in the record, and whether said request was made by him orally or in writing or by his employer is not made certain. Said report was made upon a form blank adopted by the commission. The report filed with the rating department contained the information that said employee had previously suffered the loss of the sight of the left eye, and that the vision of the right eye was probably destroyed.

On December 5, 1924, the injured employee, Frazier, and petitioner, United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, agreed to a commutation of the compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act (section 28 [Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749]), payable in a lump sum, and requested the approval of the commission of said agreement. The injury was stated to consist of:

"Loss of sight of right eye; 60 per cent. loss of hearing of right ear. Rated 122 weeks. The disability is permanent partial. * * * The present value of the final 38 weekly payments commuted at 6 per cent. as of December 5, 1924, is $748."

No mention was made in the commutation agreement that the latest injury left the employee totally sightless. On the day the agreement was signed by said Frazier and petitioner, W. P. Ratliff, secretary of the commission, certified the approval of said agreement by said commission. The petitioner herein alleges that on April 14, 1924, the final rating of said Frazier's disabilities was made by the rating department of said commission for the loss of sight of the right eye and a 60 per cent. loss of hearing of the right ear, amounting to 122 weeks of disability payments at $20.83 per week. This rating by the department, it is alleged, was advisory merely. Respondent commission and Frazier claim that whatever rating was made by the rating department was informal and was made without consideration of all the facts, and especially the fact that Frazier was rendered totally blind by the latest injury, and that the commission was empowered to make an award commensurate with the injuries actually suffered.

The next proceedings had in the matter consisted of an application made on behalf of Frazier for the adjustment of his claim for compensation. This application was heard, all parties appearing, and the award following it was made July 14, 1927. The commission found that the claim was not barred by the provisions of section 11, Workmen's Compensation Act; that the order made by the commission on December 5, 1924, approving the commutation and payment in a lump sum of the present value of the final 38 installments of disability indemnity due under a permanent disability rating as theretofore made had been informally made; that said agreement was not an agreement of compromise and release, and the order of said commission was not an order approving an agreement of compromise and release as defined and provided in section 27 of the Workmen's Compensation Act; that said order and the payment of the commuted lump sum did not deprive the commission of jurisdiction to render an award in the pending matter. The commission then proceeded to find that said Frazier suffered a permanent disability consisting of the loss of the sight of his right eye, resulting from a previous injury, and constituting total disability. The percentage of permanent disability was rated at 100 per cent., entitling said Frazier to $20.83 per week for 240 weeks and thereafter the weekly sum of $12.82 for the remainder of his life. The petitioner was given credit for the payment of 122 installments of indemnity at the rate of $20.83, a total of $2,541.26. An award $20.83 a week was made commencing December 8, 1923, for 240 weeks, less said credit of $2,541.26, and less $50 attorney's fees. At the expiration of said 240 weeks the allowance was to be reduced to $12.82 and continue at that rate during the remainder of said Frazier's life. All payments awarded were charged, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum until paid, beginning with the date of the award, etc.

[1] The award of July 14, 1927, which was the first finding or formal award made by the commission in the entire proceeding, is attacked, first, on the ground that the commission, having acted with full knowledge of the facts, cannot change its formal order of December 5, 1924, without a showing that a change of circumstances has arisen since the order determining the amount of permanent disability to which the employee, Frazier, was entitled was made. It is contended that the rating of 122 weeks, although informally made by the permanent disability department, was officially recognized by the commission by its order approving the agreement of commutation entered into by Frazier and petitioner, and said action amounts to an official issuance of said rating by the commission and is binding upon the parties to said agreement. In short, it is claimed that the action of the commission rendered the questions res judicata. It is next insisted that the claim is barred by section 11 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation Act. This contention is based upon the theory that the 38 future weekly payments, dating from December 5, 1924, and of the aggregate value of $748, being commuted on the date last above mentioned in a sort of retroactive manner, shortened the time in which the injured employee might be granted further relief, as provided by the act, from 122 weeks to 84 weeks. In short, it is contended that by said commutation agreement approval the employee, who received no additional compensation that he would not have received that he elected to accept his compensation in installments rather than in a lump sum, barred himself from all other benefits which the act confers upon injured employees generally. This would be a harsh construction to give to an act which the law declares shall be liberally construed with the view of accomplishing its manifest purpose. The bar of the statute invoked here, which is 6 months after the final payment of compensation, or within 6 months of the period for which compensation has been paid, does not defeat the claim. The application for an adjustment of claim was filed September 13, 1926, less than 6 months before the expiration of the 122 weeks' period. It was within 6 months of the period for which compensation had been paid. It is absolutely necessary to include the full time in order to have a basis for the computation of the amount found to be due as provided by the agreement. The payment, by agreement and with the approval of the commission, may be commuted, but other substantial statutory guaranties will continue during the full period of time for which compensation is provided. The payments of compensation, for the purposes of preserving other rights of the employee, are spread throughout the entire period of payment, and the last payment under the agreement must be held to have terminated early in April, 1926, within 6 months of the day application for adjustment of claim was filed by said employee. This view is supported by the following provisions of section 11 (c) of said act:

> "The payment of compensation, or any part thereof, * * * shall have the effect of extending the period within which proceedings for its collection may be commenced, six months from the date of the agreement or last payment of such compensation, or any part thereof, or the expiration of the period covered by any such payment."

Said agreement entered into by the parties seems to recognize that the general rights of the employee were not bargained away by said agreement by accepting a lump sum before the expiration of said 122 weeks, as it expressly provides that:

> "The Industrial Accident Commission may enter its award upon the foregoing agreed statement of facts, upon the request of either party or upon its own motion at any time, subject to the right of the commission to set aside said statement of facts or to reopen said award at any time under its continuing jurisdiction."

[2] The proceedings in this case were largely taken, except the application by the employee for adjustment of claim, prior to the decision in Liptak v. Industrial Accident Commission, 200 Cal. 39, 251 P. 635. It is very apparent that the rating department did not consider the fact that the injury sustained by the loss of the sight of the right eye left the employee totally blind at the time the rating of 122 weeks was made. Respondent commission claims that, while the surgeon's report did contain a notation of the prior loss of the left eye, the report went to the rating department, which made an informal rating, using a blank upon which was printed a notice that said rating was subject to change and correction. The total loss of sight superimposed by the injury last sustained could not have been taken into consideration either by the rating department or by the commission, inasmuch as the rating belies the contention.

The commission never at any time made findings or a formal award in this cause until July 14, 1927. But if it be conceded that the prior act of the commission approving the commutation of compensation be given all the force and effect claimed for it, to wit, the status of a judgment, sufficient cause appears upon the face of the record to affirm the award of the commission. The recent case of Bartlett Hayward Co. et al. v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 195, fully disposes of the questions of inadvertence on the part of the commission in its permanent disability rating of an employee, by holding that it constitutes good cause for the exercise of the continuing jurisdiction of the commission and its right to increase its award in the absence of any evidence as to change in the physical condition of said employee. We are of the opinion that the case last cited and the Liptak Case, supra, are alone sufficient authority to support the award in the instant case. The major points of the instant case are concluded by those cases.

The award is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DOWELL. (Cr. 3061.)★

Supreme Court of California. April 23, 1928.

Rehearing Denied May 21, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑593—Denial of postponement for absence of counsel after warning to procure other counsel at time of setting case for trial held not abuse of discretion (Pen. Code, § 1050, as added by St. 1927, p. 1036).

Where, on defendant's plea of not guilty, court set case for trial approximately within 30 days, as was his duty under Pen. Code, § 1050, as added by St. 1927, p. 1036, and instructed defendant to procure other counsel when counsel present indicated he might not be able to be present at time set for trial held that on case coming to trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying prayer for postponement because of absence of such counsel.

2. Criminal law 🔑622(1)—Jury 🔑31(11)—Joint trial of defendants held not to deny them proper quota of peremptory challenges or violate their constitutional rights (Pen. Code, §§ 1070, 1098; Const. Cal. art. 1, §§ 7, 13; Const. U. S. Amend. 5, 6).

Joint trial of defendants does not deny either defendant his proper quota of peremptory challenges under Pen. Code, §§ 1070, 1098, nor does it violate defendants' constitutional rights under Const. Cal. art. 1, §§ 7 and 13, or under Const. U. S. Amends. 5 and 6; there being no federal question, constitutional or otherwise, involved.

3. Criminal law 🔑426—Testimony offered by one defendant as to declarations made by him involving codefendant held inadmissible.

On joint trial of defendants, admission of testimony, offered by one of defendants, as to certain declarations made by him involving codefendant, held error.

★Rehearing denied.

4. Criminal law ⚷1169(7)—Erroneous admission of declarations of one defendant, involving codefendant, held not prejudicial, where similar testimony was admitted without objection.

Admission of testimony as to declarations of one of defendants, involving codefendant, offered by such other defendant, though error, held not prejudicial, where confession of such defendant and his testimony, covering same subject-matter, were admitted without objection by codefendant and jury were admonished that it was not binding on codefendant.

5. Witnesses ⚷395—Testimony as to statement of defendant's witness, offered to rebut inference of fabrication, held properly excluded.

Testimony as to statement made by defendant's witness that she was present at time of shooting of deceased and that defendant was not present, made some 20 days following the crime and offered to rebut inference that testimony of defendant's witness was recent fabrication, held properly excluded.

6. Criminal law ⚷814(18)—Where defendant admitted conviction of crime in Washington, instruction that sentence in reform school would not impeach him held without supporting evidence.

Where defendant stated that he had been convicted of a felony, to wit, robbing a person, in Washington, duty shifted from district attorney to defendant to show nature of conviction and law of Washington with respect thereto, and where such showing was not made, instruction that if defendant had merely been sentenced to reform school such fact was not sufficient to impeach him was properly refused.

7. Homicide ⚷18(5)—One killing policeman while fleeing from robbery and retaining object of crime committed murder in perpetration of robbery.

Defendant, who while fleeing from scene of robbery, carrying supposed bag of money of victim, killed policeman who was pursuing him, in order to effect his escape, committed murder in the perpetration of a robbery, the crime of robbery not having been completed at such time.

8. Criminal law ⚷775(3)—Instruction that evidence as to alibi should be considered with other evidence and if sufficient to raise reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt he should be acquitted held proper.

Instruction on defense of alibi that "all the evidence should be carefully considered by you, and if the evidence on this subject, considered with all the other evidence, is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendants, you should acquit them," held proper.

Nathan C. Coghlan, Austin W. Arnold, and Roland Becsey, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Isidore M. Golden, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for the People.

PRESTON, J. Defendant and one Eugene Gentile were jointly charged by information with the murder of John J. Driscoll, a police officer of the city and county of San Francisco. A joint trial was had, which resulted in a verdict convicting defendant of murder in the first degree without recommendation. A motion for new trial and also in arrest of judgment was made and denied, and judgment imposing the extreme penalty was pronounced. This appeal is from the judgment and the orders denying said motions. But a brief review of the evidence will be made in view of the fact that its sufficiency to support the verdict is unquestioned.

Testimony adduced on behalf of the prosecution tended to establish the following facts: Appellant and Gentile, having planned to rob one Dine Costi and armed, respectively with a .45 Colt automatic revolver and bludgeon or "blackjack," stationed themselves about 1 o'clock a. m., on June 26, 1927, in the doorway of the home of said Costi on Natoma street in San Francisco, having theretofore observed his habit of returning about that time each evening with the day's earnings from his business. Costi arrived shortly thereafter. Appellant pointed the revolver at him and commanded him to throw up his hands. Instead Costi called for help. Gentile then hit him twice with the blackjack. Appellant grabbed the bag he was carrying and, with Gentile at his side, started to run down Natoma street to Russ, turning over Russ towards Mission and Howard streets. At the corner of Russ and Howard streets Police Officer Driscoll, in uniform and on duty, stood talking to Mrs. Doris Thomas, a colored woman. At the curb Officer Manning with whom he had just been conversing, was endeavoring to start his automobile. As they saw the two parties running down Russ street towards them, Officer Driscoll commanded them to halt, whereupon the party carrying the revolver fired two shots at the officer, one of which caused his death. They both ran on. Officer Manning gave chase in his machine and overtook and arrested Gentile. Appellant escaped temporarily, but was arrested later in the day.

There is a mass of circumstantial evidence identifying appellant as the party who fired the fatal shot. There is the testimony of Costi, whom they undertook to rob, and the testimony of Officer Manning and of Mrs. Thomas, who witnessed the occurrence, in addition to much corroborating testimony by other persons and police officers, including various statements made by appellant and Gentile, in which each intimates guilt on the part of the other. Both appellant and Gentile testified upon the trial. Appellant, in defense, attempted to establish an alibi through testimony given by his wife, brother-in-law, and his sister, who claimed that in men's clothes she accompanied Gentile on the fatal expedition and shortly after the murder met appellant, who was searching for her in that vicinity. However, so shaken was this testimony by statements of witnesses in rebuttal that apparently little credence was given to it by the jury.

[1] The crime was committed June 26, 1927. On July 20th following the defendants entered their pleas of not guilty, and on the same day the case was set for trial on August 22d. Mr. Nathan C. Coghlan appeared as the attorney for appellant and was present when appellant's plea was entered and the cause set for trial. He said that he "feared" he would be engaged in the trial of another case on the day set, whereupon the court said:

> "The defendant is present, and I notify him to procure other counsel. The prosecution will be prepared and the defendant must be prepared to go to trial on the 22d of August. That is ample time. This is the 20th day of July, and you have more than 30 days in which to prepare for trial."

Mr. Coghlan then made the following statement:

> "I make no complaint as to the shortness of time. I think, so far as the procurement of witnesses is concerned and the preparation of the case, that thirty days is ample time in the ordinary case, even in a murder case."

Whereupon the court replied:

> "The order of the court is that the cause be set for trial Monday, August 22d, at 10 a. m."

Nothing further was done until August 22d, when the case was called, whereupon two attorneys appeared and filed affidavit of appellant setting up the fact that Mr. Coghlan was then engaged in the trial of a criminal case in another department of the court and suggesting that the trial court might consume its time in the trial of other criminal cases, mentioning some known to be on the calendar. The affidavit concluded with a prayer for postponement until September 1st. This motion was promptly denied.

We can discover no merit whatsoever in the contention of appellant that the court in this ruling abused its discretion. A little more than 30 days was allowed appellant for the preparation of his defense, and he had prompt and specific notice that other counsel should be procured if his first choice could not be realized. It is manifest that the courts cannot in every case await the convenience of some attorney before they can function. Reduced to its lowest terms, this would allow a popular attorney to have the courts marking time to serve his convenience. See People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 341, 19 P. 161, and People v. Fredericks, 106 Cal. 554, 556, 39 P. 944. The discretion exercised by the court in setting the cause approximately within thirty days after the plea is now made a duty under the statute. Section 1050, Pen. Code (as added by St. 1927, p. 1036). Trial of the cause was begun on the 22d of August; 2½ days were consumed in the selection of the jury, and Mr. Coghlan appeared as one of appellant's attorneys for the afternoon session of August 26th, and remained as the attorney for appellant throughout the remainder of the trial. No incident injuriously affecting the substantial rights of appellant is noted as having occurred due to the absence of Mr. Coghlan.

[2] After appellant's motion for postponement had been denied one of the said two counsel arose and asked the court to grant a separate trial to appellant, in which motion the attorney for the other defendant also joined. This oral motion was based upon the ground that he understood that a confession had been made by the codefendant to the public authorities; that appellant's defense and that of his codefendant would therefore be antagonistic, and hence appellant would suffer great injury if a separate trial were not had. No affidavit or other evidence was offered in support of this motion and it was denied. The defendants were thereafter tried together and the written statement or confession made by defendant Gentile was introduced in evidence.

Complaint is also made that by reason of the joint trial appellant was denied his proper quota of peremptory challenges under sections 1070 and 1098 of the Penal Code. It is also urged that his constitutional rights under sections 7 and 13 of article 1 of the State Constitution were violated, as were also the rights guaranteed him under the fifth and sixth amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

There is no merit whatsoever in these contentions. Prior to 1921 separate trials were provided for by statute. At said time section 1098 of the Penal Code was amended (St. 1921, p. 90) to provide that two or more defendants when jointly charged with any public offense must be tried jointly unless the court ordered separate trials. This amendment, in effect, adopted the common-law rule upon this subject. There is no federal question, constitutional or otherwise, involved. It has always been the rule in the federal courts that defendants jointly indicted for the same offense must be tried together unless the court for some reason orders a separate trial for one or more of them. All the questions raised by appellant as grounds for a separate trial have been thoroughly considered by this court in the case of People

v. Perry, 195 Cal. 623, 234 P. 890. We have re-examined the question and are satisfied with the ruling made in that case. Several similar rulings have been made. People v. Erno, 195 Cal. 272, 232 P. 710; People v. Wilson, 76 Cal. App. 688, 693, 245 P. 781; People v. Walsh (Cal. App.) 260 P. 303; People v. Anderson, 59 Cal. App. 408, 211 P. 254; People v. Ford (Cal. App.) 253 P. 966.

[3] The attorney for codefendant Gentile placed upon the witness stand one Dullea, a police officer, who testified as to certain declarations involving appellant made by Gentile to him. The court in admitting said testimony gave the jury the following admonition:

> "Members of the jury, you are instructed that any statement made by the defendant Gentile not in the presence and hearing of the defendant Dowell, implicating the defendant Dowell, must not be considered against the defendant Dowell. In other words, certain statements are admissible against the defendant Gentile but must be disregarded, as to the defendant Dowell."

In asking these questions, counsel for Gentile stated to the court:

> "The purpose of this evidence is to show that the defendant Gentile had nothing to hide from the very beginning, and he was telling the truth from the very beginning."

The answers made by the witness were to the effect that the codefendant stated to him that he had aided appellant in the commission of the crime, and that he had had a long acquaintance with appellant. The witness testified that he and other police officers had accompanied the codefendant to Natoma street where the crime was committed, and there said codefendant told him how he had carried the gun awhile and then handed it to appellant, and made other like statements.

We cannot come to any other conclusion than that the introduction of this testimony was error. It was not testimony offered by the opposing party and introduced as an admission made against interest. The people did not put this testimony in the record, but the codefendant himself did it. Under the rule laid down in the following cases we must hold that this evidence was inadmissible. People v. Prather, 120 Cal. 660, 53 P. 259; People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 P. 697, and People v. Hill, 116 Cal. 562, 48 P. 711.

[4] Whether or not it was prejudicial error in this case is quite a different question. In the first place the codefendant Gentile gave a statement, which was written and signed, covering the same subject-matter, and this statement was received in evidence without objection by appellant. Later Gentile became a witness in the case and testified in great detail as to all the occurrences previous to, during and subsequent to the commission of the crime, and covered all ground covered by all said statements made to the police officers. It was also in evidence that said written statement was in his presence and in the presence of Gentile read to them, and to the many incriminating statements therein appellant made no reply. At another period the two defendants questioned each other at length concerning the written statement by Gentile and covered many incriminating recitals found therein. Certainly then, under such circumstances, no prejudicial error could have resulted to the cause of appellant from the admission of this evidence, especially in view of the repeated careful admonitions given the jury by the court to the effect that the testimony of this witness was not to be held binding upon appellant.

[5] It is next contended that the witness Thos. J. Davis was not allowed to testify for the appellant to a statement made to him by the witness Mrs. Francis Edison to the effect that she was present at the time of the shooting of deceased, and that appellant was not present at said time, in order to rebut the inference that her testimony on the trial was a recent fabrication, invoking the rule stated in People v. Billings, 34 Cal. App. 554, 168 P. 396, and other cases. There was no error in this ruling under the facts here shown. This witness had admittedly made declarations inconsistent with her testimony, but the declaration sought to be proved, consistent therewith, was one made on or about July 15, 1927, some 20 days following the crime and at a time when the motive to fabricate might well have existed to the same degree as when the witness gave her testimony on the trial.

[6] The court refused to give the following requested instruction:

> "The court instructs the jury that the only provisions made by the laws of the state of California for the impeachment of a witness are to be found in the Code of Civil Procedure of this state; and it is there provided that a witness may be impeached either by his confession upon the witness stand that he has been previously convicted of a felony or by the production of the record thereof. The defendant and witness, Mark Dowell, in this case has put in issue here by his replies the question of whether in the sense contemplated by law he has been convicted previously of felony. If you believe by the testimony herein that he merely served a sentence in a reform school, then you are instructed that such fact is not sufficient to impeach him."

The question asked appellant was: "Mr. Dowell, have you ever been convicted of a felony?" and he answered, "Yes, sir." An effort was made to have the court strike out the witness' answer on the ground that he had merely been incarcerated in a reformatory in the state of Washington, but not in the penitentiary. Neither the exact nature of the crime committed nor the effect of a conviction in Washington and sentence to the reformatory were in evidence. The court refused to strike out the answer of the witness, whereupon the district attorney asked appellant of what crime he had been convicted to which he replied: "I was convicted of robbing some Japs." The record of conviction was neither offered by appellant nor by the prosecution. It would seem, in view of the witness' answers, that the duty shifted from the district attorney to the defendant to show the nature of the conviction and the law of Washington with respect thereto. In this state of the record there can be no error predicated upon the failure to give this instruction.

[7] Appellant next complained that the court gave an instruction to the jury that all murder perpetrated in the commission of robbery is murder in the first degree, and further instructed said jury as follows:

> "Where the killing is done in the perpetration, or attempt to perpetrate, some one of the felonies enumerated in the statute, here the occasion is made conclusive evidence of premeditation. Where the case comes within either of these classes, the test question, 'Is the killing wilful, deliberate and premeditated?' is answered by the statute itself, and the jury have no option but to find the prisoner guilty in the first degree. Hence, so far as these two cases are concerned, all difficulty as to the question of degree is removed by the statute."

This is only a part of the instruction. The complete instruction has been approved in People v. Nichol, 34 Cal. 211, and perhaps in other cases, and is legally correct. The objection is that the instruction was inappropriate and prejudicial because, it is said, at the time the police officer was shot and killed the robbery had been fully consummated and for that reason the murder was not committed in an attempt to perpetrate said crime. As above noted, appellant was fleeing from the scene of the robbery, carrying what he thought was the bag and money of the victim, when, being pursued by the officer of the law, appellant fired upon him in order to effect his escape while retaining the object of the crime. We are satisfied that the crime of robbery had not been completed in any sense at the time of the unlawful shooting, but on the contrary the murder was committed in the perpetration of such crime.

[8] Fault is also found with the following instruction:

> "All the evidence should be carefully considered by you, and if the evidence on this subject (alibi), considered with all the other evidence, is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, you should acquit him."

This instruction was approved in People v. Lang, 142 Cal. 482, 487, 76 P. 232, 234, and People v. Winters, 125 Cal. 325, 57 P. 1067. There is no other assignment of error requiring notice. The jury was properly instructed as to the forms of verdict applicable to the case, and under the verdict rendered the law imposes the death penalty. Appellant was accurately and expeditiously, but fairly, tried, and we can find no instance where his legal rights were seriously or at all invaded.

CROTTS v. BROWN et al. (Civ. 5112.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 16, 1928.

1. Contracts ⚷355—Court, finding that plaintiff's assignor drew plans and superintended construction for percentage of cost, erred in crediting wages as foreman.

Court, having found that plaintiff's assignor drew plans and specifications for and superintended construction of house for 10 per cent. of cost, erred in crediting money paid him for foreman's work and awarding plaintiff judgment for difference.

2. Assignments ⚷34, 43—Assignment of claim for performing specific service, not for wages or salary, need not be in writing nor signed by assignor's wife (Civ. Code, § 955).

Assignment of claim resting in contract for performance of specified service in drawing plans and specifications for and superintending construction of house, not for wages or salary earned, need not be in writing, nor signed by assignor's wife, under Civ. Code, § 955.

3. Costs ⚷60—Court awarding plaintiff judgment for difference between contract price and wages as foreman erred in ordering each party to pay own costs.

Court, having found that plaintiff's assignor drew plans and specifications for and superintended construction of house for 10 per cent. of cost, as contended by plaintiff, and awarded latter judgment for difference between such amount and amount paid him for work as foreman, erred in ordering each party to pay his own costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by George W. Crotts against Mabel G. Brown and another. From a judgment for plaintiff in less than the amount prayed for, he appeals. Reversed.

Frank G. Tyrrell and C. W. Stahl, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Euler & Subith, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and judgment went in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $76, the prayer of the complaint being for the sum of $865. Plaintiff made a motion for new trial, which was denied, and thereafter appealed.

Evidence was introduced by plaintiff at the trial without objection to the effect that plaintiff's assignor and defendants entered into an oral agreement whereby the former was to prepare plans and superintend the construction of a building for 10 per cent. of the cost thereof. A difference arose between the parties. Appellant contends that this difference was absolved by an agreement that the 10 per cent. arrangement should remain unchanged, but that in addition appellant's assignor was to act as foreman working on the job, for which he was to receive $1 per hour. Respondents contend that the $1 per hour as foreman was to be the sole compensation moving to appellant's assignor. The latter acted as foreman throughout the construction, and actually received the full compensation of $1 per hour, excepting a balance of some $15.

The first paragraph of the court's findings is to the effect that the original contract was that respondents promised to pay plaintiff's assignor, for preparing and furnishing plans and specifications and for superintending the construction of the building, 10 per cent. of the total cost thereof; the fourth paragraph is a finding that the claim was duly assigned to plaintiff. In the third paragraph the court finds:

> "That the total cost of said buildings was the sum of $8,300. It is not true that, at the end of the first week or at any other time or at all, plaintiff's assignor, Robert A. Brown, agreed with the defendants that instead of working on a basis of 10 per cent. of the cost of said buildings, he would work on the basis of $1 per hour or $8 per day, as compensation, in lieu of the commission of 10 per cent. of the cost of said buildings, nor has he been paid in full for all services rendered to defendants, nor do the defendants hold vouchers showing such full payment to plaintiff's assignor, Robert A. Brown, and it is not true that defendants are not indebted to plaintiff's assignor, nor to the plaintiff for any sum whatsoever."

And in the fifth paragraph the court finds that the sum of $754 has been paid on the claim, leaving a balance due of $76.

The court, in substance, found that the services for drawing plans and supervising construction was contracted for at 10 per cent. of the cost, which would amount to $830. It then credited the money paid to plaintiff's assignor for foreman's work at $1 per hour (and there is no conflict in the testimony on this point), amounting to $754, on the contract sum of $830, and awarded judgment for the difference, $76.

[1] In short, the case is tried on the basis of the plaintiff's assignor attempting to prove that he had drawn plans and specifications for and had superintended the construction of the house for 10 per cent. of the cost, and the defendants attempting to prove that the compensation of $1 per hour covered not only this, but his labor as foreman as well. The court decided that plaintiff's assignor was right in his contention and that the defendants were wrong in theirs, but awarded judgment exactly as though it had found the defendants right and plaintiff's assignor wrong. If the latter performed services on a basis of 10 per cent. of the cost, the court had no basis whatever for discharging the obligation to pay the 10 per cent. by crediting thereon the money paid him for other services which all agree were performed. In principle it is exactly the same as where a holder of two promissory notes from the payor discharged one of them upon receipt of payment but was also arbitrarily made to discharge the other note for the same payment.

[2] Although respondents do not appeal, they urge a reversal of the judgment on the ground that there is no evidence to sustain the findings that the claim was legally assigned. Whether or not we should consider this point with the question in mind of its possible effect upon the right of plaintiff's assignor to further maintain the action, we need not decide. The whole contention is that the evidence does not show that the assignment was in writing and signed by the wife of plaintiff's assignor, under the requirements of section 955 of the Civil Code. But the findings are that the claim rests in a contract for the performance of a certain specified service, and is not for wages or salary earned.

[3] In its judgment the trial court ordered each party to pay their own costs. This obviously was error.

Judgment reversed.

90 Cal. App. 683

PEOPLE v. MAGGIO. (Cr. 1596.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 6, 1928.

1. Automobiles 🔑355(8)—Evidence held to support conviction for failure to stop and render assistance after automobile collision (Pen. Code, § 367c).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 367c, for failing to stop and render assistance after automobile collision, evidence, which was uncertain as to exact date of accident but showed that defendant was directing another in operating truck and admitted having had accident, held to support conviction.

2. Automobiles 🔑336—One controlling truck driver and knowing collision occurred is criminally liable for failure to stop and render assistance (Pen. Code, § 367c).

One having control over driver of truck and knowing that collision had occurred is criminally liable under Pen. Code, § 367c, if he fails to cause truck to stop and to render aid to those who might possibly have been injured, regardless of whether he was negligent in causing collision.

3. Criminal law 🔑824(1)—In prosecution for failure to stop after automobile collision, omission of instruction requiring joint act and intent or negligence, not requested, held not error (Pen. Code, §§ 20, 367c).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 367c, for failure to stop and render assistance after automobile collision, it was not error to omit from instructions Pen. Code, § 20, requiring joint operation of act and intent or crimnal negligence, where such instruction was not requested, since only intent which need be proved is that involved in knowledge of facts requiring that vehicle be stopped and that aid be rendered.

4. Criminal law 🔑775(4)—Where evidence was uncertain whether offense was committed August 22 or 23, and defendant set up alibi for 23d, instruction that exact date was immaterial held not error (Pen. Code, § 367c).

Where evidence in prosecution under Pen. Code, § 367c, for failure to stop and render assistance after automobile collision was uncertain as to whether accident occurred on August 22 or 23, and defendant set up alibi as to 23d, instruction that exact date was immaterial held not error as against contention that only August 23 should be considered, in view of prosecution's attempt to fix such date as date of accident, where information alleged accident occurred "on or about August 23."

5. Criminal law 🔑1174(2)—Jurors held not guilty of misconduct warranting reversal of conviction as against contention they were informed through newspaper of facts concerning offense and discussed credibility of witnesses before submission of case (Pen. Code, § 367c).

Jurors held not guilty of misconduct warranting setting aside of conviction under Pen. Code, § 367c, for failure to stop and render assistance after automobile collision, as against contention that they were informed through newspaper of facts concerning collision and that they discussed credibility of witnesses before case was submitted.

6. Criminal law 🔑1134(2)—Juror's affidavit must be disregarded in determining whether misconduct warrants setting aside conviction.

Juror's affidavit must be disregarded in determining whether misconduct warrants reversal of conviction, since jurors are not permitted to impeach their own verdict.

7. Criminal law 🔑1128(2)—Juror's testimony, mentioned in briefs but not appearing in record on appeal, cannot be considered in considering misconduct.

In determining whether misconduct of jurors warrants setting aside of conviction, testimony of juror mentioned in briefs but not appearing in record on appeal cannot be considered.

8. Criminal law 🔑925(1), 1156(5)—Denying new trial for misconduct of jurors is discretionary and will not be disturbed save for manifest abuse.

Question of juror's misconduct when submitted to trial court on motion for new trial is addressed to sound legal discretion of that tribunal, and appellate court will not disturb order denying such motion unless there is manifestly clear and unmistakable abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

Salvadore Maggio was convicted of failing to stop and render assistance after an automobile collision, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. B. Whitelaw and Ernest R. Utley, both of El Centro, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., Elmer W. Heald, Dist. Atty. of Imperial County, and Edward B. Patterson, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of El Centro, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was charged by information, and found guilty by a jury, of having, on or about August 23, 1927, violated section 367c of the Penal Code, which said section provides in part that:

> "Whenever an automobile, * * * strikes any person, or collides with any vehicle containing a person, the driver of, and all persons in, such automobile, * * * who have or assume authority over such driver, shall immediately cause such automobile, * * * to stop, and shall render to the person struck, or to the occupants of the vehicle collided with, all necessary assistance including the carrying of such person or occupant to a physician or surgeon for medical or surgical treatment, * * * and * * * shall further give to the occupants of such vehicle or person struck, the number of such automobile, * * * together with the name and address of the driver of such automobile, * * * also the name of the owner thereof and the name of the passenger. * * *"

This is an appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a motion for new trial.

It appears that at about 2:30 or 3 o'clock a. m., on August 22 or 23, 1927, the exact date being questioned by the parties, W. B. Oswell and Estelle Oswell, his wife, left Yuma, Ariz., in a coupé driving in a westerly direction toward El Centro, Cal., which is about 62 miles distant from Yuma, at the rate of 30 or 35 miles per hour; that when they had proceeded about 37 miles on their journey their automobile collided with a truck which was traveling easterly at about the same rate of speed; that at the point of contact the Oswell car was traveling at about 4 or 5 miles per hour. As a result of the collision the coupé was thrown across the thoroughfare, the left front wheel was bent under the machine, and its running board and fender were torn off. Mrs. Oswell was thrown to the pavement and was injured. The truck proceeded easterly toward Yuma, and, although Oswell attempted to obtain its number or other marks of identification, the darkness of the early hour rendered this impossible.

On the morning of August 22, 1927, Maggio Bros., Incorporated, an El Centro produce company, employed one A. Pecararo as a truck driver. The latter had not theretofore been in Yuma, and did not know the way from El Centro, nor the location of his employer's customers. At 3:30 or 4 o'clock a. m. of the date last mentioned, Pecararo left El Centro with a Fageol truck loaded with fruit belonging to the corporation, which was driven over the same route as that followed by the Oswells, and arrived at the Yuma quarantine station at about 7 or 7:30 a. m. of that day. It is apparent, and is not denied, that upon this occasion appellant accompanied Pecararo to Yuma, under the direction and authority of Maggio Bros., "in order that he might point out the places of business of the corporation's customers."

[1] It is contended by appellant that the truck did not collide with any automobile on the morning of August 22, 1927, and that on the 23d, the date on which the offense is charged by the information, he drove a Chevrolet coupé to Yuma, and that Pecararo drove the Fageol truck to Calexico, in company with another man. That appellant was in Yuma on both dates we think is conclusively established by the evidence. It is urged from the foregoing that since his truck encountered no accident on August 22d, and was not driven upon the highway in question on August 23d, the evidence does not support the verdict and judgment. The respondent contends that all of the evidence tends to show that, regardless of the date, appellant was with the truck at the time of the accident, that he admitted having collided with another machine on his way toward Yuma, and that witnesses who attempted to fix the date were not positive that the accident occurred on August 23d.

W. B. Oswell, the complaining witness, testified on direct examination: "On the 23d, the way I've got it;" on cross-examination, "On or about that date, that is what I say, yes, sir;" and on redirect examination, "I can say it was on the 23d, I will have to say on the 23d, the morning of the 23d." Mrs. Oswell testified, "I think it was the morning of the 23d; there has been so much happened since that, I think it was that morning that we left." T. J. Hart, the quarantine inspector at Yuma, testifying about a conversation with appellant, in which he admitted he had been in an accident on the day of the conversation, swore that the conversation was on or about the 23d, and when asked to be positive by counsel for the defendant, he replied: "I am not absolutely certain, I think it was on the 23d, but probably it could have been on the 22d. * * * I could not swear it was on the 23d." The jury were instructed that the exact time of the commission of an alleged offense charged in the information is not material, "but any time if proven, on or about August 23, 1927, the time alleged in the information, would be sufficient as to the time thereof, but you cannot convict at all except for specific acts charged in the information, as committed on or about August 23, 1927." We think it obvious that under this instruction, and from further evidence, which we shall next consider, the jury may well have concluded that all of the witnesses were uncertain as to whether the offense was committed on August 22, 1927, when appellant was in charge of the truck and its driver, or on the following morning, but that in fact it was committed on the former date, and as charged in the information.

The witness Hart further testified that two other automobiles drove in behind appellant's truck at the quarantine station during the inspection, and that having overheard the occupants of the rear machines talking of an accident, the witness asked appellant:

> "'Did you have an accident this morning?' and he replied he did have one, and I asked him where it happened, and he said it was just on the east side of Holtville, and I asked him if he stopped after he had the accident, and he said he did not."

D. E. Hunt, who conducted a filling station between Yuma and Holtville, on said highway leading to El Centro, testified that:

> "On or about the 23d" of August, 1927, he had learned of a collision caused by appellant's truck earlier in the day, and that when appellant and Pecararo "came back that afternoon, I was kidding him about some one hitting a truck, and he has the only truck of that description on the road, and Maggio denied it, * * * and afterward admitted it after I showed him the dent in the rear wheel. * * * I asked him why he did not take the dent out, and he said it couldn't blow the tire out anyway.

* * * He said a woman was driving the car out in the middle of the road, and 'I wasn't going to drive my car out in the sand for any one.' * * * We were looking at the marks. * * * It was the flange on the demountable rim holding the tire that was dented some 4 or 5 inches long, bent down until you could look where it had hit on the rim, the outside projected out, and it bent it down, and you could see the grip holding to his tube in under; it was bent down some 5 or 6 inches long."

This witness also averred that the defendant at that time said:

> "'Do you think they will do anything to me?' and I said, 'They sure will;' and Mrs. Maggio said, 'What would you do now about it?' and I said, 'If I was doing it I would take it up with the tourist now.' He didn't know who he hit or anything about it, and Mr. Maggio told me then he wasn't driving the car, that he was breaking in a new driver."

It is significant that although appellant denied, as a witness in his own behalf, that he was operating the truck on the morning of August 22, 1927, he was not asked upon the stand, and did not testify under oath that he had no accident, or that he did not have the conversations above quoted. We think the evidence in support of the charge was ample, and that the jury were warranted in returning the verdict upon which the judgment is based.

It is insisted by appellant that the evidence was insufficient to show that Maggio at any time had or assumed authority over the truck or its driver. Various witnesses testified that he had supervision of the Yuma district, and of the truck when it delivered in that vicinity, and frequently drove it himself. It affirmatively appears that appellant accompanied Pecararo for the sole purpose of directing him to places of business of customers of the corporation, and the route traveled upon this occasion was the usual course over which its truck was driven for like purposes at least three times each week. Further, Pecararo had never before been over the road in question, nor had he made any previous trip across the desert. We think the jury were justified in believing, as they doubtless did, that Pecararo operated the truck as and where directed by the defendant. Appellant's statement, referred to above, that "he was breaking in a new driver," is alone very significant. Authorities cited by appellant involving merely the rule as to imputation of negligence of drivers to their passengers or guests, do not apply to the instant case. This is obvious from the following cases which also are cited by appellant: People v. Fodera, 33 Cal. App. 8, 14, 164 P. 22, in holding the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 397) constitutional, states in effect that the application of the act is not limited to persons who knowingly cause their vehicles to collide with those occupied by others, but requires that they stop and render aid to those who may possibly have suffered injury. In People v. Kaufman, 49 Cal. App. 570, 193 P. 953, it was said:

> "It was designed to prohibit, under pain of severe punishment, negligent or wanton drivers of motor cars from seeking to evade civil or criminal prosecution by escape before their identity could be established, and similarly to prohibit all drivers, whether negligent or not, from leaving persons injured in collisions with cars driven by them, in distress and danger for want of proper medical or surgical treatment."

[2] The statute expressly provides that any motor vehicle which strikes another must stop, and embraces with the driver of such vehicle persons occupying the same "who have or assume authority over such driver." Hence it is apparent that appellant, whether negligent or not, having control over the driver and knowing that a collision had occurred and having failed to cause the automobile to stop and to render aid to those who might possibly have been injured, was criminally liable under the provisions of section 367c of the Penal Code. We think the evidence was sufficient in this respect to support the verdict and judgment.

[3] Nor was it prejudicial error for the trial court to omit from its instructions to the jury section 20 of the Penal Code. That section requires that in every crime or public offense there must exist a joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence. Such an instruction was not requested, and no error was committed by its omission. Moreover, the only intent which need be proved is that involved in the knowledge of the facts requiring that the vehicle stop and that aid be rendered as provided by section 367c.

[4] Appellant next contends that the trial court erred to his prejudice in refusing to instruct the jury that, the prosecution having fixed August 23, 1923, and the defendant having set up an "alibi," it was the duty of the people to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was there at the time, and was in supervision of the truck, and that no other time should be considered.

The court instructed the jury that the defense in this case was what is known as an "alibi," and that if after a full and fair consideration of all the facts and circumstances in evidence they entertained a reasonable doubt as to whether or not the defendant was present at the time and place of the commission of the offense charged in the information, if such offense was committed, it would be their duty to acquit him; and the jury were also told in part that if they believed beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant then and there had or assumed authority over said vehicle (therein reviewing the evidence, and defining reasonable doubt), that the defendant would be guilty as charged in the information. All of the substantial positive evidence tended to show that the collision did occur on August 22, 1927, and that it could not have occurred on the 23d. We have carefully reviewed the testimony of the witnesses and the documentary evidence, from all of which we are convinced that an instruction confining the consideration of the jury to August 23d would have been misleading. We think it was not error to tell them that the exact date as charged was immaterial, and that "on or about August 23d, 1927, the time alleged in the information, would be sufficient as to the time thereof, but you cannot convict at all except for specific acts charged in the information, as committed on or about August 23d, 1927."

The refusal of the trial court to give five of the instructions offered by the defendant is also assigned as error. These instructions were refused upon the ground, as noted by the court, that each was "covered by other instructions given." We think it unnecessary to quote them. One such proposed instruction pertaining to the date of the offense would have been misleading, as we have already observed. In the light of the evidence as we view it, the others were properly covered, though couched in different language.

[5-8] Finally, it is contended that certain of the jurors were guilty of misconduct warranting the setting aside of their verdict, in that they were informed through a newspaper of certain facts concerning the collision, and that members of the jury discussed the credibility of certain witnesses in the case before it was submitted to them for deliberation. An affidavit of the publisher of the newspaper recites that the jurors mentioned by appellant were on the subscribers' list, and received their paper each evening, but there is no attempt to show that either of the jurors read of the incident. The discussion of witnesses by jurors appears by four affidavits filed on behalf of the defendant herein upon motion for new trial to have occurred on the courthouse steps during the trial, but before the court had convened. It appears therefrom that Pecararo, the driver of the truck, had theretofore been tried for the offense here charged and that the witnesses in the instant case had appeared and testified in People v. Pecararo; that between 10 and 20 of the whole venire were present at the time the conversations are alleged to have taken place; and that one juror, who participated in the trial of the case at bar, remarked that "they get up there and lie, and lie, and lie, and it shouldn't be permitted." The affidavit of Juror Williams, one of the 12 jurors who rendered the verdict in the present case, is included in the record, but since it is a familiar rule that jurors are not permitted to impeach their own verdict, this affidavit must be disregarded upon that ground. People v. Wong Loung, 159 Cal. 520, 114 P. 829; People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 444, 50 P. 675. The remark quoted appears in the affidavit of one of appellant's counsel, who also avers that "he did not at said time, nor does he now, know what matter said jurors were discussing." The remaining affidavits deal in generalities, and it does not appear therefrom that any improper statement was made concerning the pending case or that a juror of the panel participated in the discussion. Certain testimony of another juror, A. R. Tagg, is mentioned in the briefs, but it does not appear in the record on appeal, and hence cannot be considered. There is no merit to this point. Besides, the question of misconduct having been submitted to the trial court upon motion for new trial, it was addressed to the sound legal discretion of that tribunal, and an appellate court will not disturb an order denying such a motion unless there is manifestly a clear and unmistakable abuse of discretion. People v. Canfield, 173 Cal. 309, 159 P. 1046. We do not think the record presents a ground for reversal in this instance.

The judgment and order denying motion for new trial are affirmed.

DICKENSON v. KALLUSCH et al.
(Civ. 5801.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 19, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⟹162(1)—Plaintiff's acceptance of money decreed to be paid as condition to establishment of defendants' title held to preclude appeal by plaintiff from judgment.

Plaintiff, having accepted sum of money which court required to be paid for plaintiff's benefit as condition to defendants' ownership of property claimed to have been fraudulently conveyed, was not in position to appeal from judgment.

2. Appeal and error ⟹544(1)—Alleged error in omitting findings will not be considered, where appeal is presented on judgment roll alone.

Where case came up on judgment roll only, and no evidence taken at trial was before reviewing court, failure of trial court to make findings on particular matters could not be considered.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Action by Martha Kallusch against Frederick W. Kallusch, Max Brown, and others, in which E. W. Dickenson, as administrator, was substituted on plaintiff's death. From the decree, plaintiff and defendant first named appeal. Affirmed.

Stephen Connell, of San Diego, for appellant Dickenson.

Edward J. Kelly, of San Diego, for appellant Frederick W. Kallusch.

Frank J. Macomber, of San Diego, for respondents Brown.

YORK, J. This action was commenced by Martha Kallusch, wife of Frederick W. Kallusch, to have declared null and void a deed executed by Frederick W. Kallusch to the defendants Brown, conveying certain real property belonging to said Frederick W. Kallusch. Prior to the execution of said deed, Mrs. Kallusch commenced a divorce action against her husband, and obtained an order requiring the defendant husband to pay to her the sum of $115 for attorney's fees and costs. Within two months from the commencement of said divorce action, Mrs. Kallusch died. This action to set aside the deed was continued in the name of the administrator of her estate. In the present action the court entered a decree to the effect that if within a stated time defendants Brown should pay into court for the benefit of plaintiff said sum of $115, defendants Brown should be decreed to be the owners of the real property in question; but that if such payment be not made, a decree would be entered setting aside the deed. The money was paid, and final decree entered, from which decree both plaintiff and Kallusch appeal.

[1] The plaintiff and appellant, as such administrator, having received and drawn down a deposit of said sum of $115, which was the amount that the trial court found that he was entitled to as such administrator under the order for payment of attorney's fees and suit money in the divorce action, which amount was paid into court in this action by the defendants Max Brown and Mally Brown, the respondents herein, in accordance with the interlocutory decree filed herein, such appellant is precluded, after receiving this money, from proceeding with this appeal. Preluzsky v. Pacific, etc., Co., 195 Cal. 290, 232 P. 970.

[2] This case comes up on the judgment roll only and no evidence taken at the trial is before this court; therefore, we cannot pass upon any objection that may be made by the appellants, or either of them, as to the failure of the trial court in making any particular finding on any matter on which they claim a finding should be made. Himmelman v. Henry et al., 84 Cal. 104, 23 P. 1098; Cutting Co., etc., v. Canty, 141 Cal. 692, 75 P. 564.

The findings made are sufficient to support the judgment. It is true that one of the findings objected to is probably a conclusion of law, but there are sufficient findings of fact fully covering the point raised.

The objection of defendant and appellant Frederick W. Kallusch that the trial court did not find that he was drunk and old and feeble when he made the conveyance cannot be raised by him on this record. No evidence is shown to have been introduced to support such or any conclusion in the judgment roll presented herein. Preluzsky v. Pacific, etc., Co., supra, p. 295 (232 P. 970).

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

DONIAN v. DANIELIAN. (Civ. 4971.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 6, 1928.

1. Judgment 🔑938—Complaint on foreign judgment held to state cause of action (Code Civ. Proc. § 456).

Complaint on foreign judgment alleging that proceedings were had in court, and that final judgment was rendered for plaintiff, which has not been paid, held sufficient allegation to state cause of action under Code Civ. Proc. § 456, providing that facts conferring jurisdiction need not be alleged in pleading judgment.

2. Pleading 🔑237(8)—Amendment to complaint on foreign judgment changing date of original action to conform to proof held not to change cause of action.

Where complaint on foreign judgment alleged that plaintiff commenced action in foreign court on certain date, interlineation changing date of commencement of action resulting in judgment sued on, to conform to proof, held not such matter of substance as to change cause of action.

3. Pleading 🔑237(8)—Complaint may be amended to conform to proof, if cause of action is not changed.

Amendment to complaint to conform to proof may always be made, providing cause of action is not thereby changed.

4. Time 🔑9(2)—Action filed November 16, 1922, on foreign judgment dated November 16, 1917, held brought within five-year limitation (Code Civ. Proc. § 336).

Where foreign judgment sued on was dated November 16, 1917, and original complaint on such judgment was filed November 16, 1922, by excluding first date, and including last, action was brought within five years, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 336.

5. Limitation of actions 🔑127(2)—Amendment to complaint on foreign judgment changing date, not stating new cause of action related back to original complaint as respects limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 336).

Where complaint on foreign judgment was amended by interlineation changing date when action resulting in foreign judgment was commenced to conform to proof which amendment did not operate to state new cause of action, amendment related back to filing of original complaint as respects running of statute of limitations, Code Civ. Proc. § 336, and, where original complaint was brought within time limit, statute had not run.

6. Pleading ⚷237(8)—Amendment to complaint on foreign judgment correcting date conforming to proof, but not changing cause of action, held properly allowed without affording opportunity to plead thereto.

In action on foreign judgment, amended by way of interlineation correcting error in date when foreign action was commenced in accordance with proof, ground of demurrer which had been urged against original pleading was in no way affected by amendment, which did not state new cause of action, and hence granting of leave to amend without service of copy or opportunity for defendant to plead thereto, which he might have desired by way of special demurrer and plea of statute of limitations, was not error.

7. Appeal and error ⚷232(2)—Objection that book from which foreign statutes were read was incompetent cannot be considered for first time on appeal, where statutes alone were thus objected to at trial.

Where defendant, sued on foreign judgment, objected to introduction of foreign statute on ground that statutes were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, appellate court could not consider for first time on appeal contention that books from which foreign statutes were quoted and read into evidence were incompetent.

8. Evidence ⚷35—Allegation of foreign court's general jurisdiction could be denied for want of information and belief prior to act empowering court to take judicial cognizance of foreign laws (Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 3, as amended by St. 1927, p. 110).

In action on foreign judgment under verified complaint, alleging that foreign court was court of general jurisdiction, contention that defendant could not deny such allegation for lack of knowledge or information, since law creating foreign court was matter of public record, held without merit, as applied to foreign record prior to Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 3, as amended by St. 1927, p. 110, empowering court to take judicial cognizance of the laws of sister state.

9. Appeal and error ⚷761—Alleged error in refusing nonsuit and new trial, not supported by separate argument and covered by other points, need not be considered.

Contentions that court erred in refusing to grant nonsuit and denying motion for new trial, not supported by separate argument or authority, but merely submitted on record, and presenting nothing not covered by other points, need not be considered on appeal.

10. Judgment ⚷822(1)—Evidence to show plaintiff supposed case had been dismissed held properly excluded as collaterally impeaching foreign judgment sued on.

In action on foreign judgment, evidence offered to prove that plaintiff and defendant arranged to settle obligations between them, and that defendant, after turning over certain property, supposed case had been dismissed, and had no knowledge of further proceedings after leaving state, held properly excluded as an attempt to collaterally impeach judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by Samuel Donian against George H. Danielian. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. Lantz, W. P. Hyatt, and F. C. Huber, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in an action to recover upon a judgment of the county court of Cook county, Ill. Appellant, among other things, contends that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained because the complaint did not allege that any pleadings had ever been filed on which a judgment could be based, or that the judgment there alleged was supported by any pleading, nor that the law of Illinois dispensed with such pleading, nor did the complaint allege the issuance or service of any summons.

Section 456 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "In pleading a judgment or other determination of a court, officer, or board, it is not necessary to state the facts conferring jurisdiction, but such judgment or determination may be stated to have been duly given or made. If such allegation be controverted, the party pleading must establish on the trial the facts conferring jurisdiction."

[1] The complaint alleges:

> "That thereupon such proceedings were had therein in said court; that, on the 16th day of November, 1917, a judgment for the sum of four hundred sixty-three and 75/100 dollars ($463.75) was duly given and made by said court in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant; and said judgment is now a final judgment, and the same, or any part thereof, has not been paid."

This was a sufficient allegation to state a cause of action under section 456.

[2, 3] Appellant contends that an amendment to the complaint by interlineation allowed by the court changed the cause of action. The complaint alleged: "That on or about the 1st day of January, 1917, the plaintiff commenced action in said court"—county court of Cook county, Ill. The court allowed this date to be changed to the 5th day of December, 1916, by interlineation to conform to the proof. An amendment to conform to the proof may always be made, provided the cause of action is not thereby changed. Hancock v. Board of Education, 140 Cal. 554, 74 P. 44. It would seem obvious that the amendment as to when the action was commenced was not such a matter of substance as to change the cause of action. This question of the amendment is further considered in this opinion.

[4, 5] Appellant contends that the cause of action set out in the amended complaint was barred by section 336 of the Code of Civil Procedure, limiting the time within which this action might be brought to five years. It appears from the record that the date of the judgment of the county court of Cook county was November 16, 1917, and that the original complaint in this action was filed November 16, 1922. Excluding the first date, and including the last, it appears that this action was brought within the five years. It further appears, from a marginal note on this complaint made and initialed by the trial judge, that the same was amended, as stated above, on July 8, 1924. Appellant argues that this was equivalent to the filing of an amended complaint on July 8, 1924, setting forth a different cause of action which was barred by the statute. As appears above, the result of the amendment was not to state a new cause of action, and the amendment related back to the filing of the original complaint. As the latter was filed within the five years, the statute of limitations had not run. If the amendment be one which merely corrects a defective or erroneous pleading of the same cause of action, the amendment will relate back to the filing of the original complaint. Redington v. Cornwell, 90 Cal. 49, 27 P. 40; Union Lumber Co. v. J. W. Schonten & Co., 25 Cal. App. 80, 142 P. 910.

Respondent contends that it is presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that the law of Illinois is the same as the law of California as to the time when the judgment became final, and that, applying this rule, the judgment became final on January 8, 1918, and that appellant admits this; but, in any event, it appears from the record, as stated above, that the complaint in the case at bar was filed within five years from the date the judgment was rendered. It is too well settled to require extended discussion that the court has the authority to permit such an amendment, and that, unless the amendment changes the cause of action, it relates back to the filing of the original complaint. The cause of action in the case at bar was not barred by the statute of limitations. In the case of Koch v. Wilcoxon, 30 Cal. App. 517, 520, 158 P. 1048, 1049, the court says:

> "Amendments under our practice are liberally allowed, and in the main that matter rests within the discretion of the trial court. Such amendments may be made to a complaint either during the trial or after the evidence is all in. (Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 365, 51 P. 549, 955; Brown v. Hurst, 1 Cal. App. 752, 82 P. 1056.) An amendment to conform to the proof may always be made, provided the cause of action is not thereby changed."

See, also, Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 366, 367, 51 P. 549, 955.

The authorities cited by appellant relate to cases where the cause of action had been changed by the amendment, and do not apply here.

[6] Appellant specifies error on the part of the trial court in granting leave to amend without service of copy or opportunity for defendant to plead thereto, and argues that because defendant only interposed a general demurrer to the first complaint, it is no reason for assuming that he would not have desired to and would not have interposed several special demurrers to the amended complaint and pleaded the statute of limitations to the amended complaint. Again, appellant's arguments and authorities cited assume an amendment to the complaint changing the subject-matter so as to state a new or different cause of action, which is not the situation in the case at bar. In Flood v. Templeton, 148 Cal. 374, at page 376, 83 P. 148, 149, cited by respondent, the court said:

> "There were merely brief amendments by way of interlineations made to the original complaint, and those amendments in no way relieved from, nor even affected, the grounds of demurrer which had been urged against the pleading. In such cases it is well settled that not only is a new demurrer unnecessary, but that it is not error for the court to refuse, upon application, to permit a new demurrer to be presented. (6 Ency. of Plead. & Prac. p. 381; Stanton v. Kenrick, 135 Ind. 382, 35 N. E. 19; Hawthorne v. Siegel, 88 Cal. 159, 25 P. 1114, 22 Am. St. Rep. 291.) Moreover, and finally, it may be said upon this point that the demurrer is a general one, and charges a failure in the complaint to state facts constituting a cause of action; and this may be urged at any time without demurrer. Code Civ. Proc. § 434; Ryan v. Holliday, 110 Cal. 335, 42 P. 891."

And, in Stohlman v. Martin, 28 Cal. App. 338, 347, 152 P. 319:

> "We cannot say that the court was not warranted in allowing the complaint to be amended in the particulars mentioned. Of course, it is a well-established and no uncommon practice to order pleadings to be so amended as to conform to the proofs during the trial of the cause and even after the trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 432; Daly v. Ruddell, 137 Cal. 671, 676, 70 P. 784."

In the case at bar the cause of action stated in the original complaint was upon a judgment rendered in the county court of Cook county, Ill. The amendment allowed did not in any way affect or change this cause of action; it was merely "a brief amendment by way of interlineation" correcting an error in the statement of the date when the action was begun in accordance with the proof, and in no way affected the grounds of demurrer which had been urged against the pleading.

[7] Appellant specifies that the court erred in admitting evidence of the statutes of Illinois, creating the county court of Cook county, in which the judgment sued on was rendered, over appellant's objection. On this subject the record discloses the following:

> "Thereupon plaintiff quoted and read into evidence chapter 37, page 198, Illinois Revised Statutes by Cahill, chapter 79, pages 21 and 32, same statute, and sections 187 and 204 of said Revised Statutes. Defendant objected to the introduction of said statutes on the ground that they are incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, the court overruled said objection, to which the defendant then and there excepted."

From this it appears that the only objection urged at the trial was that the Illinois Revised Statutes were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. It is to be especially noted that there was no objection that the book offered was incompetent to prove the statutes of Illinois. Appellant now for the first time argues that the volumes from which sections were quoted and read into evidence were compiled by one Cahill, and that it was not shown that Cahill was any authority on the subject. This argument we cannot consider here, as the only objection made in the trial court was to the introduction of said statutes on the ground that they (said statutes of Illinois) were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. French v. Atlas Milling Co., 17 Cal. App. 226, 119 P. 203.

[8] Respondent argues that the complaint was verified, and alleged that the court wherein the judgment was rendered was a court of general jurisdiction; that the defendant answered by saying he had no knowledge or information sufficient to enable him to answer said allegation of plaintiff's complaint and on that ground denied said allegation; and that the law creating said court in which said judgment was rendered is a public record, and cannot be put in issue by a denial based on want of information and belief—citing Art Metal Constr. Co. v. A. F. Anderson, 182 Cal. 29, 33, 186 P. 776; William Wilson Co. v. Trainor, 27 Cal. App. 43, 148 P. 954; Mulcahy v. Buckley, 100 Cal. 484, 35 P. 144; and Brinkley-Douglas Fruit Co. v. Silman, 33 Cal. App. 643, 166 P. 371. We think there is no merit in this argument of respondent. While the case of Mulcahy v. Buckley, and some of the others, might justify the application of the rule of accessibility of the record to the pleader, we find no authority justifying the application of the rule to a case of a foreign record or the public record of another state. We recognize that now the court may take judicial cognizance of the laws of a sister state. Section 1875, Code Civ. Proc. subd. 3, as amended, 1927 (St. 1927, p. 110). But this was not the case, until long after the present action was appealed.

[9] Appellant's contentions that the court erred in refusing to grant a nonsuit and in denying the motion for new trial are not supported by separate argument or authority, being merely submitted on the record, and presenting nothing which is not covered by other points disposed of elsewhere in this opinion. We think they do not require further consideration here. People v. Zarate, 54 Cal. App. 372, 374, 201 P. 955.

Appellant's contention as to a fatal variance between the allegations of the original complaint and the proof relates to the date of the beginning of the action, and was cured by the amendment above referred to.

[10] Finally, appellant specifies as error the trial court's sustaining objections to a certain conversation and in denying defendant's tender of certain evidence, as follows:

> "Mr. Hyatt: We offer to prove by the defendant and Mrs. Danielian, his wife, and Mr. Barsumian, his nephew, that they were present at the home of the defendant when he and the plaintiff entered into an arrangement and settled all obligations between them. The defendant turned over certain property and credits that he had then, and the defendant was discharged from any obligation to the plaintiff, and supposed the case had been dismissed, as it was agreed to be dismissed in that settlement; about two days later he came to California, and has not been back to Illinois since, had no knowledge of any further proceedings by the plaintiff until this action was started five years later."

Respondent contends, and we think correctly, that this is an attempt to collaterally impeach the judgment, a method of attack not open to appellant, and cites 34 C. J. 511; Crouch v. Shafer, 177 Cal. 154, 169 P. 1019; Wood v. Jordan, 125 Cal. 261, 57 P. 997; Brush v. Smith, 141 Cal. 466, 75 P. 55; and Crane v. Cummings, 137 Cal. 201, 69 P. 984. The objections were properly sustained.

We believe the above disposes of all appellant's material contentions and specifications of error.

Judgment affirmed.

Where more than 6 months have elapsed after entry of default judgment before application is made for relief, Code Civ. Proc. § 473, affords no remedy.

2. Judgment ⚷443(1)—Equity will grant relief independent of statute from default judgment to one not guilty of laches who is prevented by extrinsic fraud from presenting valid defense (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Where one who is not guilty of laches is prevented by means of extrinsic fraud from enjoining his day in court or presenting valid defense to action, equity will grant relief independently of provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

3. Appeal and error ⚷1024(4)—Appellate court will not disturb order refusing relief from default judgment, where affidavits of parties are in direct conflict.

Where application was made for relief from default judgment and affidavit made by defendant alleged that attorney for plaintiff had promised not to take default judgment against him, while affidavit of attorney for plaintiff was to opposite effect, held, that order denying relief would not be disturbed on appeal, since affidavit of attorney for plaintiff furnished ample evidence to support court's implied finding of absence of fraud.

4. Judgment ⚷113—Right of defendant, failing to answer amended complaint within 10 days, to participate in litigation is terminated upon entry of default (Code Civ. Proc. § 432).

Where defendant in action for attorney's fees failed to answer amended complaint within 10 days prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 432, and entry of default was made in absence of fraud, right of party to participate in litigation is terminated.

5. Judgment ⚷131—On entry of default in action on contract for recovery of money or damages only, it becomes duty of clerk to enter judgment forthwith (Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subd. 1).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subd. 1, upon entry of default in action arising upon contract for recovery of money or damages only, it becomes duty of clerk to enter judgment forthwith, which duty is ministerial, and failure to perform is not prejudicial.

6. Judgment ⚷111—Defendant failing to answer amended complaint within 10 days by answering subsequent to entry of default acquired no legal rights (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 432, 585, subd. 1).

Where defendant failed to file answer or demurrer to amended complaint within 10 days as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 432, in action arising under section 585, subd. 1, but filed answer day after entry of default, held, that answer added nothing to legal rights, but upon entry of default defendant was out of court, filing of answer being unauthorized and void.

7. Judgment ⚷111—Default judgment held not affected by fact that employee of attorney representing plaintiff taking default admitted service of answer day after entry of default (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 432, 585, subd. 1).

Where defendant failed to file answer or demurrer to amended complaint within 10 days as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 432, in action for attorney's fees under section 585, subd. 1, but day after entry of judgment filed answer, which employee in law firm representing plaintiff admitted, held, that conclusiveness of default judgment was not affected by admission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Action by L. S. Jones against Albert A. Moers, as executor of the estate of Teresa W. Moers, also known as Theresa W. Moers, deceased. From an order denying the motion to set aside a default judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: PRESTON, J., voting for a hearing.

Andreani & Haines and John L. Bisher, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jones, Hoyt & Rifkind, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order denying a motion to set aside a default and judgment. The appellant contends that the judgment was obtained by fraud, and that the clerk was without jurisdiction to enter the default.

November 29, 1924, the plaintiff served and filed his second amended complaint against the defendant, executor of the estate of Teresa W. Moers, deceased. The complaint was based upon an express agreement to pay plaintiff $5,000 for services rendered as an attorney. It was alleged that:

> "During the lifetime of the said Teresa W. Moers * * * he [plaintiff] performed for her, at her special instance and request certain legal services as her attorney at law, for which she promised to pay * * * the sum of $5000."

It was further alleged that a claim for such services was duly presented to the executor of said estate pursuant to section 1496, Code of Civil Procedure, on September 17, 1924, which claim was disallowed. This action was then commenced October 14, 1924. The defendant failed to demur or answer this second amended complaint within the 10 days allowed by section 432, Code of Civil Procedure. On December 10, 1924, upon written demand, the clerk duly entered the default of the defendant. On the following day the defendant served and filed his answer. February 25, 1925, in spite of the answer which was filed subsequent to the entry of default, the clerk entered judgment by default against the defendant for the sum of $5,000. The action then lay dormant until October 14, 1925, when the defendant served and filed his notice of motion to set aside the default and judgment on the grounds of fraud and lack of jurisdiction. The fraud relied upon was set out in an affidavit of John L. Bisher, who was employed in the law firm of Andreani & Haines, which represented the defendant. The affidavit averred that on December 6, 1924, 9 days after the service and filing of the second amended complaint, he met the plaintiff in the courthouse at Los Angeles and told him:

> "He was preparing an answer * * * which he would have ready (to serve and file) in a day or two, * * * but that he might require one or two days in addition to the 10 days allowed by law in which to file the answer; * * * that he intended to demur to the complaint, but would not do so provided he was given additional time in which to file his answer; that the said Jones then stated to affiant that he could have all the time he wanted in which to file his answer; * * * that he (Jones) had never defaulted an attorney, and did not intend to do so."

The counter affidavit of Mr. Jones admitted a conversation with the affiant Bisher on the date mentioned, but it categorically denied that any agreement was made to extend the time to answer; denied that any request was made for such an extension of time, or that the subject of extending the time was ever discussed between the parties. Other affidavits were filed by respective parties. The motion was duly presented, and on October 20, 1925, the court rendered its decision denying the motion to vacate the default and set aside the judgment.

[1, 2] Since more than 6 months elapsed after the entry of the default and judgment before application for relief was made, section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, affords no remedy. But where one who is not guilty of laches is prevented by means of extrinsic fraud from enjoying his day in court or presenting a valid defense to an action, equity will grant relief independently of the provisions of the statute. McGuinness v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 222, 237 P. 42, 40 A. L. R. 1110; Estudillo v. Security Loan, etc., Co., 149 Cal. 556, 87 P. 19; Cal. Beet Sugar Co. v. Porter, 68 Cal. 369, 9 P. 313; Lapham v. Campbell, 61 Cal. 296.

[3] With respect to the question as to whether the defendant was deceived by the alleged promise to extend his time to answer, and thereby suffered default, the affidavits of the respective parties are in direct conflict. In denying the motion to set aside the default and judgment, the trial court necessarily passed upon this question adversely to the defendant. Under such circumstances the decision is controlling. The affidavit of Mr. Jones furnishes ample evidence in support of the court's implied findings of an absence of fraud. The rule is well established by numerous authorities to the effect that where the judgment or order of the trial court is supported by substantial evidence, although there may be a serious conflict, it will not be disturbed on appeal. 2 Cal. Jur. 921, § 543, and cases there cited.

[4-7] The second amended complaint is indorsed as follows:

> "Received a copy of the within this 28th day of Nov., 1924. Andreani & Haines, Attorneys for Plft."

A clerical error was evidently made in designating these lawyers as attorneys for the plaintiff. Many documents in the record clearly establish the fact that this firm represented the defendant. The affidavit of Bisher, upon which the defendant relies, averred that "on November 29, 1924, plaintiff served and filed his second amended complaint." The record satisfactorily shows adequate service of the complaint.

After 10 days have elapsed subsequent to personal service of a complaint, and no demurrer or answer has been filed by the defendant, on motion of the plaintiff, the default of the defendant must be entered. Section 432, Code of Civil Procedure, provides:

> "If the complaint is amended, * * * a copy of the * * * amended complaint, must be served upon the defendants affected thereby. The defendant must answer the * * * complaint as amended, within ten days after service thereof, * * * and judgment by default may be entered upon failure to answer, as in other cases."

Section 585, Code of Civil Procedure, subd. 1, provides:

> "In an action arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only, if the defendant has been personally served and no answer has been filed with the clerk of the court within the time specified in the summons, or such further time as may have been granted, the clerk, upon application of the plaintiff, must enter the default of the defendant, and immediately thereafter enter judgment for the amount demanded in the complaint. * * *"

Upon the failure of the defendant to answer the complaint within the time allowed by law, and upon the entry of default, in the absence of fraud, the right of the defendant to participate in the litigation is terminated, and the subsequent filing of an answer or demurrer on his part is unauthorized and void, unless upon proceedings duly had, the default is first set aside. Upon the entry of default, where the action arises upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only, it becomes the duty of the clerk to enter judgment forthwith. This is a ministerial duty of the clerk, the failure to perform which may not prejudice the plaintiff. In the present case the filing of an answer in behalf of the defendant after his default had been duly entered, added nothing to his legal rights, nor altered his status in the case. Upon the entry of his default the defendant was out of court, and the filing of his answer was unauthorized and void. Christerson v. French, 180 Cal. 523, 182 P. 27; Title Insurance, etc., Co. v. King, etc., Co., 162 Cal. 44, 120 P. 1066; Marston v. Kochritz (Cal. App.) 251 P. 959; Gray v. Hall (Cal. App.) 254 P. 911. Nor is the conclusiveness of the judgment affected by the fact that an employee of the law firm which represented the plaintiff admitted service of the answer after the entry of the defendant's default.

The defendant relies on the case of Lunnun v. Morris, 7 Cal. App. 710, 95 P. 907, and cites it as conflicting with the rule announced in the case of Christerson v. French, supra. There is no conflict between these authorities. In the Lunnun v. Morris Case the default of the defendant had not been entered at the time the answer was filed. The time allowed by law for answering had expired, but the answer was filed before default was entered. The court there said:

> "* * * Where a party pleads before default entered, though out of time or without leave, if the plea be good in form and substance, his default cannot be entered while the plea stands."

This doctrine does not aid the defendant in the present case.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

HENDERSON et al. v. MIGLIETTA.★
(Civ. 5793.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 17, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court June 14, 1928.

1. Mortgages 🔑369(8)—That some of findings were unsupported by evidence held not to affect judgment for plaintiff, where gravamen of plaintiff's charge against defendant was on another ground.

In action to set aside trust deed and for reconveyance for fraud, even though court's findings that plaintiffs relied on representations of defendant that defendant contended that plaintiffs were executing trust deed and not mortgage, and that plaintiffs believed they were executing mortgage and not trust deed, were not supported by evidence, judgment for plaintiff is not affected thereby, where gravamen of fraud charge was that defendant fraudulently lulled plaintiffs into sense of security with reference to necessity of paying interest, and thereby exercised right to foreclose under trust deed.

2. Evidence 🔑441(5)—Defendant selling property under trust deed, after fraudulently agreeing to defer payment of interest, cannot invoke rule that terms of written contract cannot be varied by parol agreement.

Rule that terms of written contract may not be varied by unexecuted oral agreement, made without consideration, held not available to defendant, who fraudulently lulled plaintiffs into sense of security by agreeing to defer payment of interest on notes secured by trust deed, and thereafter sold property under trust deed.

3. Forcible entry and detainer 🔑6(2)—Generally, question of title cannot be determined in action of unlawful detainer.

As a general rule, the question of title cannot be determined in an action of unlawful detainer, the issue being one of possession only.

4. Judgment 🔑747(6)—Judgment in unlawful detainer action cannot be pleaded in bar of subsequent action between same parties to determine title to real property.

Judgment in action in unlawful detainer cannot be successfully pleaded in bar of a subsequent action between the same parties to determine the title to real property involved in the former action.

5. Forcible entry and detainer 🔑12(1)—Counterclaim or cross-complaint is not permissible in unlawful detainer action.

Neither a counterclaim nor a cross-complaint of any kind is permissible in an action in unlawful detainer.

6. Judgment 🔑747(6)—Judgment in unlawful detainer action held not bar to subsequent action to set aside conveyance of such property under deed of trust on ground of fraud.

Judgment in prior action in unlawful detainer, even though tried on theory that title to property was necessarily involved, held not bar to subsequent action between same parties seeking to set aside sale of such property under deed of trust and for a reconveyance on ground of fraud.

7. Interest 🔑39(6)—Defendant, in suit to set aside conveyance under trust deed for fraud, held entitled to interest on loan from date of loan to date of tender of amount due.

In action to set aside sale of real estate under trust deed and for reconveyance on ground of fraud, defendant held entitled to interest on money loaned from date of loan to date of tender of amount due by plaintiff at rate stated in promissory note evidencing such loan.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Jesse Olney, Judge.

Action by Robert Walter Henderson and another against N. Miglietta to set aside sale of real property under a deed of trust and for reconveyance. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Walter E. Byrne and Emery B. Tyler, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.

★Superseded by opinion of Supreme Court, 273 P. 581.

Isaac Jones, of Ontario, and Albert Sidney Brown, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a decree in which it was ordered that a sale of real property made under the provisions of a deed of trust be set aside; a trust declared; and a reconveyance made to plaintiffs of the real property described in the deed of trust.

From the findings of fact made by the trial court, in part it appears that on April 25, 1921, plaintiffs were the owners of the property in question, of the stipulated value of $10,000, which property was held by them subject to a bank mortgage of $2,400, due one year thereafter, and bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum; that defendant represented to plaintiffs that he had considerable money to lend, and that, if plaintiffs would borrow money from him and pay off the bank mortgage, he would take a lower rate of interest on the new mortgage, and make the terms of repayment much easier than those provided in the bank mortgage, and that all defendant wished was that his money bring him a fair rate of interest; that no mention was made at such time regarding the form of security to be given by plaintiffs for such loan, but, after consultation with an officer of a bank, defendant directed that the bank procure for him a trust deed from plaintiffs; that thereafter, without time afforded plaintiffs within which to read the instrument, and believing it to be a mortgage, plaintiffs executed a promissory note for the sum of $2,700 bearing interest at 7 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, together with a trust deed in favor of defendant covering the property in question; that at the time the note and trust deed were executed, by reason of certain arrangements made by defendant in connection therewith, plaintiffs were intentionally and designedly prevented from reading said trust deed; that, when the semiannual interest on said loan became due, defendant requested that plaintiffs pay the same; that at said time the plaintiffs informed defendant they did not have the money with which to pay such interest, but that, if defendant insisted, plaintiffs would obtain such money for defendant; that at said time, in payment of said interest, plaintiffs also offered to sell or assign to defendant a crop of grapes on the property in question; that, although defendant was a dealer in grapes, he refused to accept said crop or to buy it at any price, notwithstanding said crop of grapes was worth more than the amount of the interest then due; that at the same time plaintiffs asked defendant "if it would be all right with him if they let the matter of paying the interest then due to go over until the time for the payment of the second interest installment, and they would arrange to pay both installments of interest at the time when the second installment of interest was due; that at said time, and after said request had been made by the plaintiffs, the defendant told them that that arrangement would be all right with him, and that they would not need pay said first installment of interest until the second installment was due, and they could pay both installments at the same time; * * * that, the plaintiffs relying upon the arrangement to pay the first and second installments of interest at the time the second would become due, and as was represented to them by the defendant as being all right and satisfactory with him, the plaintiffs made no then further effort to obtain the money to pay the first installment of interest, depending and intending to pay both said installments when the second became due; * * * that, had the defendant not stated that it would be all right and satisfactory to him for them to pay the first installment of interest at the time the second installment became due, they (plaintiffs) could have, and would have, obtained the money to have paid, and would have paid, the first installment of interest at or about the time when it became due, but that they relied upon the statement of the defendant and his waiver to his right of immediate payment of the first installment of interest when it became due; * * * that the defendant lulled the plaintiffs into the belief that it was all right and satisfactory with him that they could wait until the second installment of interest was due to pay the first installment of interest, and that he knowingly knew that he had so lulled them into said belief, thereafter and almost immediately started the necessary proceedings to sell their (plaintiffs') property under said trust deed, without in any wise notifying the plaintiffs of any such intention or of any such proceedings, until after said property had been sold"; that thereafter, and in pursuance of the proceedings instituted by defendant, the property of plaintiffs covered by said trust deed was sold—defendant becoming the purchaser at such sale; that the plaintiffs met the defendant and talked with him on several occasions during the time he was proceeding to have said real property sold under said trust deed, and that said defendant on none of said occasions made mention of or discussed with the plaintiffs the matter of the payment of the interest on said trust deed; and on none of said occasions, or at any time, informed or notified the plaintiffs that he had taken steps or proceedings to sell said real property under said trust deed; that prior to and at the time of the sale of said property under said trust deed "the defendant fraudulently and for the purpose of deceiving intending or possible purchasers of said property at said sale, represented to them that the property referred to had little value, and that he would lose money on the property if he himself bid it in, as he knew that no one would pay him the amount which he had loaned thereon for the property; that the property was in a windswept belt, and with no improvements thereon; that the defendant designedly and fraudulently made said statements and representations for the purpose of causing other persons not to make any bid upon said property in order that he might secure same upon his own bid and at the lowest sum possible, and at the time he made said statements and representations he knew that said property was worth more than three times the amount he had loaned thereon, and in excess of the sum of $10,000, and also knew that said property was improved with buildings and for the greater portion thereof with a well-matured vineyard, and that at said time that there was soon to be matured on said vineyard a crop of grapes, which said crop would be reasonably worth the sum of $1,050." Furthermore, that immediately upon receiving notice that said property had been sold under said trust deed plaintiffs offered to defendant the entire sum lent to them by defendant, to wit, the sum of $2,700, and all interest due or unpaid thereon, and all costs incurred by defendant in the sale of said property under said trust deed, and such additional amount as to recompense defendant in full for whatever moneys he had expended in the sale of said property under said trust deed, and in addition thereto the sum of $500, if defendant would release said property from any claim he might have against the same because of said trust deed, and transfer said land to the plaintiffs; but that the defendant then and there refused to release said property or to accept the amounts of money offered to him by the plaintiffs. The trial court also found "that the defendant conceived a fraudulent design in his purpose toward the plaintiffs for the ultimate purpose and object of acquiring said real property of the plaintiffs at a nominal sum."

[1] Appellant contends that certain of the findings by the trial court are not supported by the evidence. In substance, they are as follows: (1) That the plaintiffs, relying upon the statements and representations of said defendant, formally signed and executed said note and deed of trust; (2) that the defendant at said time knew and intended it so to be that the plaintiffs were executing a deed of trust, and not a mortgage, upon said property; (3) that plaintiffs believed, without reading the deed of trust, that they were signing a mortgage.

But it is clear that, even if it could be conclusively shown that before the execution of the note and deed of trust the plaintiffs did not rely upon any representations made to them by defendant, it was defendant's intention that plaintiffs should execute a deed of trust and not a mortgage, and that neither of plaintiffs had any belief as to whether either of them was signing a mortgage or a deed of trust—neither any one of such facts nor all of them together would authorize this court to order a reversal of the judgment. None of those facts, nor all of them combined, constitute the gist of the fraud of defendant which was alleged in the amended complaint of the plaintiffs and which the trial court found to be true. The gravamen of the charge against defendant was that he fraudulently lulled the plaintiffs into a sense of security with reference to the necessity of their payment of the interest due on their promissory note to defendant, and thereafter, while plaintiffs were so deceived, defendant took an unfair and unconscionable advantage of the fact that plaintiffs relied upon his representations of the situation and exercised his assumed right to "foreclose" on the deed of trust. It therefore results that, even though appellant's point in that regard be admitted in its entirety, the judgment of the court cannot be affected thereby.

[2] Appellant has cited many authorities to the effect that the terms of a written contract may not be varied by an unexecuted oral agreement of the parties to the contract made without consideration, from which it is argued that defendant's oral statement to the plaintiffs that it was "all right" for them to defer the payment of the interest until the second installment of interest became due could not avail plaintiffs as against their written agreement to pay on a prior date. Ordinarily speaking, such may be the law; but such a legal principle cannot prevail in the face of positive fraud such as is hereinbefore outlined, practiced by one of the parties to the contract as against the other. Equitable principles cannot be thus subverted. The governing rule is enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Schroeder v. Young, 161 U. S. 342, 16 S. Ct. 516, 40 L. Ed. 721, where it was held that the expiration of the statutory period for redemption from a sale of land under execution did not bar a suit in equity to annul the sale and a deed made thereon, where it appeared that the debtor was lulled into a false security by assurances of permission to redeem irrespective of the statute, although such assurances were not in writing and were made without consideration. In connection with such ruling, the court said in part:

> "Defendant relies mainly upon the fact that the statutory period of redemption was allowed to expire before this bill was filed, but the court below found in this connection that before the time had expired to redeem the property, the plaintiff was told by the defendant Stephens that he would not be pushed, that the statutory time to redeem would not be insisted upon, and that the plaintiff believed and relied upon such assurance. Under such circumstances the courts have held with great unanimity that the purchaser is estopped to insist upon the statutory period, notwithstanding the assurances were not in writing and were made without consideration, upon the ground that the debtor was lulled into a false security. [Citing cases.] In Southard v. Pope's Ex'rs, 9 B. Mon. [Ky.] 261, 264, it is said that 'a refusal by the purchaser to accept the money and permit the redemption to be made within the time agreed would be a fraud upon the defendant in execution, and authorize an application by him to a court of equity for relief.'"

Bristol v. Hershey, 7 Cal. App. 738, 743, 95 P. 1040, 1041, involved a principle similar to that here under consideration, and the court declared that:

"* * * The oral contract to extend the time for redemption was valid, needed no consideration in its support, if the debtor was lulled into a false security and thereby permitted the time for redemption to expire. * * *"

Perhaps the leading case on the subject is that of McCue v. Bradbury, 149 Cal. 108, 84 P. 993, where the facts resemble those in the instant case. Therein a trust deed with its accompanying promissory note was involved. The obligation was due on October 22, 1904. Prior to that time, the promisor stated to the promisee that at a designated place he would be willing and able to pay the note on said 22d day of October, to which the promisee made no objection; his language being, "All right, but it is not due until the 23d." At the time and place specified the promisor went with the money with which to discharge his obligation, but the promisee failed to appear. The next day was Sunday. On the day following, that is, two days after the promissory note fell due, the promisor in good faith tendered to the promisee the full amount with all charges due on the promissory note, which the promisee refused to accept, but immediately instituted proceedings to sell the property under the provisions of the trust deed. Whereupon the promisor began a suit against the promisee to enjoin such sale, and a permanent injunction was granted. On appeal, it was held in substance that equity would refuse to enforce a forfeiture at the instance of one who had obtained the strictly legal right to it by fraud, deceit, or any other form of oppressive practice; on the other hand, equity would relieve the innocent, where such a forfeiture so secured was sought to be enforced. The following language appears in the opinion of the court:

"Appellants' principal contention upon appeal is that the acts of the McCues looking to the payment of the obligation to Bradbury were entirely insufficient as a legal tender of payment, and that this being so, and plaintiffs being in default under the terms of the trust, Bradbury's trustees were justified in proceeding with the sale of the property to extinguish the McCues' obligation. But in this appellants mistake the gist of the action. The action is not based upon the assumption that the tender actually made was a full and complete legal tender, but upon the contention that the acts of the defendant William B. Bradbury, in assenting to the proposed mode of payment, in failing to make objection in any form to the tender as made, and in doing all this in bad faith, to lull the plaintiffs into a fancied security, with the end in view of declaring a forfeiture and forcing a sale of their property—that these acts and this conduct are sufficient to induce a court of equity to relieve against the forfeiture, and to compel defendant Bradbury to accept, in full satisfaction of his demand, the amount due and payable upon the twenty-fourth day of October, which amount the plaintiffs then and ever since have stood ready, willing, and able to pay. It is based upon the equitable principle, often invoked and as often upheld, that equity will refuse to enforce a forfeiture at the instance of one who has obtained the strictly legal right to it by fraud, deceit, or any other form of oppressive practice; and, upon the other hand, will relieve the innocent when such a forfeiture so secured is sought to be enforced."—Citing cases.

[3-6] Appellant urges the point that, by reason of a former judgment in an action between the same parties, plaintiffs were estopped, and the instant action was barred. The record herein discloses the fact that shortly after the instant action had been commenced defendant filed an action against plaintiffs. It is conceded by the parties hereto that the allegations contained in the complaint therein were appropriate to either an action for unlawful detainer or in ejectment, or possibly suitable to a suit to quiet title. But, whatever may be the correct classification or name by which the action should be designated, without meaning to imply that in the circumstances an action in unlawful detainer was appropriate, from the fact that by the prayer in the action plaintiffs therein sought the possession only of the property described in the complaint, together with the further fact that, in all the proceedings from the service of notice to terminate tenancy to the judgment therein, the various and sundry summary steps peculiar to actions in unlawful detainer only were utilized by the plaintiffs, it is apparent that, so far at least as the plaintiff therein was concerned, the action was one in unlawful detainer. The authorities are numerous to the effect that, in an action of unlawful detainer, as a general rule, the question of title cannot be determined; the issue being one of possession only. 15 Cal. Jur. p. 855. A judgment in such an action cannot be successfully pleaded in bar in a subsequent action between the same parties to determine the title to the real property involved in the former action. Bekins v. Trull, 69 Cal. App. 40, 230 P. 24, and cases there cited. It is also well settled that neither a counterclaim nor a cross-complaint of any kind is permissible in an action in unlawful detainer. 15 Cal. Jur. p. 865; Arnold v. Krigbaum, 169 Cal. 143, 145, 146 P. 423, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 370; Knight v. Black, 19 Cal. App. 518, 527, 126 P. 512. Assuming that the plaintiff in the former action was bound by the procedure adopted by him, as well as by the allegations of his complaint by which the possession of the property was put in issue and was demanded in the prayer of his complaint, it is at least questionable whether the issue of title to the property could have been litigated or determined in that action, notwithstanding the fact that the issue of title was submitted by defendant and accepted by the plaintiff. If, relative to the title to the property, the trial court would have been powerless to grant affirmative relief to the defendant on the allegations contained in his answer to the complaint, it would seem but reasonable that the same relative situation should prevail with reference to similar relief to the plaintiff, taking into consideration the summary procedure adopted by him under the statutory provisions relating solely to actions in unlawful detainer. In the case of Phillips v. Hagart, 113 Cal. 552, 554, 45 P. 843, 54 Am. St. Rep. 369, it is held (citing authorities) that an allegation of title in himself by defendant in an action in ejectment is but a general denial in an argumentative form. But, if it be admitted that the accepted issues between the parties as finally presented to the court embraced the question of title, and that the action was tried on the theory that the title to the property was necessarily involved, and as a consequence the trial court had jurisdiction to determine such issue, nevertheless it is clear that the nature of that action differs materially from that of the instant action. In the former action, at most, the legal ownership of the property only could have been determined; while the relief sought in the instant action is purely equitable in character, and the judgment establishes the equitable rights of the parties to the controversy.

The case of South San Bernardino L. & I. Co. v. San Bernardino National Bank, 127 Cal. 245, 59 P. 699, like the instant action, was brought for the purpose of enforcing a trust and to compel a conveyance. Defendant pleaded in bar a judgment in a suit to quiet title between the same parties. The court said:

> "In an action to quiet title the relief sought in the case at bar could not be obtained. This action, being to enforce a trust and compel a conveyance, proceeds on the theory that the legal title is in the defendant, whereas a suit to quiet title ordinarily proceeds upon a contrary theory, and cannot be maintained against the holder of the legal title. The former judgment is conclusive between the parties only 'when the same thing under the same title' is litigated. Code Civ. Proc. § 1908. We think, therefore, that the findings of the court and conclusions of law should have been for plaintiff on the plea in bar. Plaintiff should not be estopped from maintaining an action for relief that he is entitled to on the facts as they exist because he previously mistook his remedy and tried to maintain an action that he never was entitled to. The foregoing views find support in the following cases: Von Drachenfels v. Doolittle, 77 Cal. 295 [19 P. 518]; O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 435 [16 P. 236]; Harrigan v. Mowry, 84 Cal. 457 [22 P. 658, 24 P. 48]; Shanahan v. Crampton, 92 Cal. 9 [28 P. 50]."

An action to quiet title is concededly of equitable origin, which is more than may be said of either unlawful detainer or ejectment. If a decree in a suit to quiet title may not be pleaded in bar of a suit to declare a trust, how much less available to a defendant in such action would be a judgment in another action for unlawful detainer, or ejectment! In opposition to such suggestion, however, see the dissenting opinion in Oakland v. Oakland W. F. Co., 118 Cal. 160, 220, 50 P. 277. See, also, Shively v. Eureka T. G. M. Co., 5 Cal. App. 236, 242, 89 P. 1073, and cases there cited.

In the case of O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 435, 16 P. 236, the rule is announced that a judgment in an action in ejectment is not a bar to a subsequent action to establish a trust. In the course of the opinion the following language occurs:

> "* * * An action of ejectment and an action to declare a trust are essentially different. To prevail in the former, the plaintiff must, as against the defendant, be the holder of the legal title, whether such legal title be evidenced by a deraignment from the paramount source of title, or simply by prior possession; but in the latter the whole case depends upon the theory that the legal title is in the defendant. The rule as expressed in the Code (Code Civ. Proc., sec. 1908, subd. 2) is to the effect that a judgment is conclusive between the parties in respect to the matter directly adjudged; and section 1911 provides that 'that only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former judgment which appears upon its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein, or necessary thereto.' Equitable rights are not necessarily included in an action of ejectment, and their determination, when not pleaded, is not necessary to a determination of the issues in such action."

A part of the syllabus in Hills v. Sherwood, 48 Cal. 386, is:

> "A judgment at law against the defendant in ejectment is not a bar to a bill in equity addressed by the defendants in the ejectment to the equity side of the court, if the relief sought is purely of equitable cognizance."

That fraud was practiced by defendant on plaintiffs, if not conceded, is not seriously questioned. Justice demands that so far as possible the wrong should be righted. While many general authorities may be found in support of a doctrine at variance with the principle announced in the cases to which reference has been had, it is thought that, inasmuch as the latter authorities bear directly on the point at issue, they should control; from which conclusion it follows that the judgment in the former action between the parties was no bar to the instant action.

[7] Appellant complains that the trial court refused to allow the defendant interest on the $2,700 borrowed by plaintiffs from defendant. The promissory note evidencing such indebtedness provided for interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and this court can perceive no reason why interest on the loan at the agreed rate should not be awarded to defendant from the date of the loan, to wit, April 21, 1921, to the date of the tender of the amount due, to wit, May 6, 1923, which amounts to the sum of $196.88.

Attention is also directed to inaccuracies with reference to the accounting by defendant for certain crops of grapes harvested by him on the property in question. It is undisputed that, according to the evidence, defendant should have received, but was not given, credit for picking 75 tons of grapes at $3 per ton, making a total of $225. Other claims for errors in computation on the part of appellant are offset by errors in his favor. As it appears that the judgment should be modified, it is ordered that all that part thereof beginning with the words "Now, therefore," and ending with the words "transferring the legal title to said real property to the plaintiffs" be, and the same is, stricken out; and in the place and stead thereof the following be inserted as a part of said judgment, to wit:

> "Now, therefore, by virtue of the premises, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant, N. Miglietta, holds the legal title to the west one-half of the northwest quarter (N.W.¼) of the northwest quarter (N.W.¼) of section 12, township 2 south, range 7 west, San Bernardino base and meridian, in the county of San Bernardino, state of California, according to government survey, as a trustee only, for the use and benefit of the plaintiffs, Robert Walter Henderson and Ama Blanche Henderson; that the defendant be, and he is hereby, required to account to the plaintiffs for the value of the grape crops on said land for the years 1922, 1923, and 1924, in the sum of $2,300, and for the value of the grape crop hereafter upon said land so long as the defendant detains the possession of said land from the plaintiffs; that the plaintiffs are required to pay to the defendant the sum of $2,700, the amount of the money loaned by the defendant to the plaintiffs, with interest thereon, amounting to the sum of $196.88, together with the sum of $575 expended by the defendant in the production of the grape crops for the years 1922, 1923, and 1924, or a total sum of $3,471.88, less the item of $2,300 required to be accounted for by the defendant to them, being the sum of $1,171.88. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant be, and he is hereby, required, directed, and ordered to convey to said plaintiffs the legal title to the west one-half of the northwest quarter (N.W. ¼) of the northwest quarter (N.W.¼) of section 12, township 2 south, range 7 west, San Bernardino base and meridian, in the county of San Bernardino, state of California, according to government survey, upon payment to the defendant of the sum of $1,171.88, and, upon failure of the defendant to make such conveyance upon said payment being made, or tendered, by the plaintiffs to him, the clerk of this court is hereby authorized and directed to act as a commissioner, to execute a conveyance transferring the legal title of said real property to the plaintiffs herein, and the plaintiffs are authorized to pay said sum of $1,171.88 to the clerk of this court, in such event, for the use and benefit of the defendant, and the clerk of this court, in his capacity as such commissioner, is then authorized and directed to execute said conveyance transferring the legal title of said real property to the plaintiffs."

As so modified, it is ordered that the judgment be, and it is, affirmed; each party to bear his own costs of the appeal.

CRUTCHER v. PACIFIC-SOUTHWEST TRUST & SAVINGS BANK.

(Civ. 6020.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 18, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑628(1)—Eight months' delay in filing transcript held to require dismissal of appeal, notwithstanding injury which incapacitated appellant, where it did not appear transcript was requested (Rules of Supreme Court, Rule 2, § 1; Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Where it did not appear that appellant, who was prevented from attending to business affairs by injury suffered in accident, had ever requested preparation of transcript in trial court or made application for relief from default, filing of transcript eight months after notice of appeal was too late, requiring dismissal of appeal under Rules of Supreme Court, Rule 2, § 1; Code Civ. Proc. § 953a.

2. Appeal and error 🔑792—Jurisdiction to dismiss appeal on court's own motion held not affected by alleged discontinuance of respondent corporation and alleged disqualification of its attorney.

On appeal by former guardian from order settling account and appointing new guardian, alleged nonexistence of respondent corporation on account of merger with another corporation and alleged disqualification of its attorney did not deprive court of jurisdiction to dismiss on its own motion appeal for delay in filing transcript.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Account and petition for settlement and allowance of fees by Elizabeth Ann Crutcher, guardian of the estate of Dewey H. Crutcher, an incompetent, opposed by the Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank, which filed petition for appointment as guardian. From an order settling the account and appointing the defendant guardian, the original guardian appeals. Appeal dismissed.

I. W. Bane, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
C. W. Byrer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. On June 16, 1926, the appellant, as guardian of the person and estate of Dewey H. Crutcher, an incompetent person, filed her fourth and final account, and petition for settlement and allowance of fees, and the same was set down for hearing in the superior court on July 14, 1926. On the date last mentioned the respondent filed its petition for appointment as guardian of said estate, in the place and stead of Elizabeth Ann Crutcher, which was thereafter granted. On April 28, 1927, the court below made an order settling said account, disallowing certain items thereof, which were ordered paid to respondent, and authorizing the latter, upon receipt of the amounts specified, to release certain mortgage liens then of record against the property of the ward. On June 22, 1927, Elizabeth Ann Crutcher appealed from the "order, decree, judgment and rulings of the court" and filed a "notice to the clerk, request for transcript duly certified."

The respondent on March 1, 1928, filed in this court a motion to dismiss said appeal, "upon the grounds that said appellant has wholly failed to serve and file the transcript of said cause within the time and as prescribed by rule II of the Rules of the Supreme Court of the state of California, and has wholly failed to serve or file appellant's points and authorities within the time and as prescribed by rule II of said rules."

[1] The motion to dismiss is opposed by notice, affidavit of Mrs. Crutcher, and a physician's certificate, wherein it is stated that owing to injuries resulting from an accident suffered by the guardian on September 18, 1927, she was unable to attend to her business affairs, and that she relied upon her son to furnish the necessary funds and to file her transcript, but that he failed to do so, and that as soon as she was sufficiently recovered, and on March 12, 1928, she paid the required fees and filed her transcript; and, further, it is asserted that this court is without jurisdiction to entertain the motion to dismiss for the reasons (1) that the respondent is not the legal guardian of said estate "because it does not exist but has heretofore merged and is known as the Los Angeles-First National Trust & Savings Bank," and (2) that respondent's attorney is disqualified to act in this proceeding.

It at once appears that on March 1, 1928—or for a period of more than eight months—when the motion to dismiss the appeal was filed, appellant had not filed her transcript. Admittedly she had filed no transcript at the time of her unfortunate injury, or nearly three months after the filing of the notice of appeal.

Rule II, section 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, requires that a printed transcript must be filed within 40 days after an appeal is perfected, or, if the transcript be prepared under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and notice is filed by the appellant requesting the transcript, that the time shall not begin to run until such transcript is approved and certified as required by law. This appeal was instituted under the latter method. It does not appear from the record before us that appellant ever requested the preparation of a transcript in the court below, and no application was made for relief from the default.

From what has been said, it is apparent that since there is no showing as to when the time began to run, a filing eight months after notice of appeal, and not until this motion to dismiss had been made, does not present such evidence of diligence as to warrant the assumption that appellant at any time intended to comply with the rule or that she did not abandon her appeal.

[2] If it were true that respondent were no longer guardian of the estate, and that counsel were disqualified, as claimed by appellant, these facts would in no way deprive this court of jurisdiction to dismiss the appeal of its own motion upon a mere suggestion of the facts above stated, which require such action.

The appeal is dismissed.

HARVEY v. BERGER. (Civ. 5157.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California. April 20,
1928.

1. Brokers 🔑54—Broker held entitled to commission where owner authorized sale in writing and broker procured purchasers ready and able and owner approved sale over telephone.

Broker held entitled to recover commission for sale of real estate, where he had written authorization from owner for sale of property in which she agreed to pay him commission therefor, and broker procured purchasers ready, able, and willing to purchase on terms conforming to authorization and obtained from purchasers signed written contract to buy on such terms, and owner approved sale over telephone when contract was read to her.

2. Brokers 🔑65(1)—Broker's telling purchasers to take possession without waiting for consummation of transaction held not misconduct forfeiting compensation.

Where broker, after purchasers had signed written contract for purchase of property, through subagent, told them to take possession of property without waiting for consummation of transaction, which they did, such act, while in excess of broker's authority, not being in violation of positive instructions, held not such gross misconduct as to forfeit right to compensation.

3. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence that there was no abandonment of broker's contract for commission was binding on appellate court.

In action for real estate broker's commissions, trial court's finding, on conflicting evidence, that there was no abandonment of contract whereby defendant agreed to pay plaintiff commissions, was binding on appellate court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action for real estate broker's commissions by Walter Harvey against Margaret E. Berger. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. T. Morrow and A. R. T. Truex, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert E. Austin and John N. Helmick, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. [1] The plaintiff, who was a licensed real estate broker, brought this action to recover a commission alleged to be due him on a sale of real estate made for the defendant. Judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals. The plaintiff showed that he had a written authorization from the defendant for the sale of the property, in which she agreed to pay him a commission therefor; that he procured purchasers ready, able, and willing to purchase the property on terms conforming to this authorization; that he obtained from said purchasers a signed written contract to buy on the said terms; and that he notified the defendant of the contract and read it to her over the telephone, including the buyers' signatures, and was told by the defendant that she approved thereof. These facts are sufficient to entitle plaintiff to recover, unless there is something in the showing made by the defendant to countervail their effect. Defendant's contentions on this appeal are in substance two: First, that plaintiff was guilty of misconduct of such gross character as to forfeit his right to commissions; and, second, that the agency contract was in effect abandoned by both parties and was therefore no longer in force when plaintiff made the sale.

[2] After the purchasers had signed the written contract for the purchase of the property, the plaintiff, through a subagent, told them to take possession of the property without waiting for the consummation of the transaction, which they at once did. This was in excess of the plaintiff's authority, which was merely an ordinary real estate broker's contract authorizing him to procure a purchaser, but it was not in violation of any express instructions upon the subject. Defendant, upon learning that the purchasers had taken possession, demanded that they at once vacate the premises, and declined to consummate the deal unless they should comply with this demand. They failed to do so, whereupon defendant employed an attorney and brought an action of ejectment against them, and a considerable number of days elapsed before they finally surrendered the possession. The contention of the defendant on her first point is that by thus exceeding his authority the plaintiff forfeited all right to his commission. The law on this subject is thus stated in 1 Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) p. 1194:

> "The same result of forfeiture will, as has been seen, flow from such willful and persistent disobedience of lawful and reasonable instructions as shows a complete disregard of the fundamental obligations of the relation, and a practical disloyalty to the principal's interests. Less than this, and the agent's negligence, will be ground for damages, or, perhaps, for a discharge, but will not ordinarily work a total forfeiture of the agent's right to compensation."

In 2 Corpus Juris, 761, the law on this point is stated as follows:

> "If an agent in transacting the agency is guilty of unfaithfulness, treachery, or dishonesty, or gross misconduct, gross mismanagement, gross unskillfulness, or of a failure to follow his instructions, he generally forfeits his right to compensation. Where an agent has been guilty of such gross negligence in the transaction of her principal's business as to render his services worthless, he can recover no compensation whatever. But mere errors of judgment on the part of the agent, or omissions which do not amount to misconduct or culpable negligence, do not work a forfeiture of his right to compensation, although the principal is entitled to deduct from the agent's compensation whatever damages he has suffered through the negligence of the agent in the transaction of the business."

Appellant has cited no cases which state the law more strongly in her favor than the two authorities just quoted, nor have we been able to find any. She relies largely upon the numerous cases holding that an agent who has an interest adverse to his principal, or who attempts to act for both parties in the transaction without their knowledge, forfeits his right to a commission. These authorities do not apply to the present case. The plaintiff did not undertake to act for the purchasers, but for the seller, in telling the former that they might take possession. While his act in so doing was in excess of his authority, it was not a violation of any positive instructions, nor do we think under the circumstances of this case it was misconduct of such a gross character as to forfeit his right to compensation. It merely gave rise to a cause of action in the defendant for such damages as she may have suffered by reason of his unauthorized acts, which cause of action she might have asserted as a counterclaim in this action, or perhaps by an independent action. There was no counterclaim in the present action, the answer merely denying the existence of the agency contract and the performance thereof by plaintiff. We do not think the acts complained of are available to defendant in support of these denials.

[3] On the second point defendant cites authorities to the effect that a written contract may be mutually abandoned and the parties released from further obligations on account thereof by parol. It is unnecessary to pass upon this proposition of law, because the facts to which defendant claims it is applicable are shown only by her witnesses. The plaintiff, on the other hand, testified that there was no abandonment of the contract, and since his version of the matter was accepted by the court, it is binding upon us. Plaintiff's written authority fixed no time for its own duration, but provided that defendant should give the plaintiff written notice of withdrawal; and no such notice was shown.

The judgment is affirmed.

RYAN v. ANDRIANO et al. (Civ. 5895.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 19, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 18, 1928.

1. Livery stable keepers 🔑4½—Board of supervisors held without power to refuse permit to continue stable without showing it was insanitary and failure to remove objection; "discretion."

Under city ordinance providing that board of supervisors shall not refuse permit for maintenance of a stable in building now maintained as such except on satisfactory evidence that stable is conducted in insanitary manner and failure to remove the objection within time prescribed, board had no power to refuse permit for continued maintenance of existing stable unless conditions specified in ordinance existed; "discretion" of board as to refusing and revoking permits being a discretion to be exercised under terms and procedure of ordinance.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Discretion.]

2. Livery stable keepers 🔑4½—Charter authorizing local police laws held not to authorize exercise of police power without predetermining rules nor special legislation respecting stable permit.

Provision of city charter giving board of supervisors power to make and enforce all necessary local police, sanitary, and other laws and regulations did not authorize board to exercise all powers which may be legitimately exercised under the police power without appropriate legislation predetermining the rules of conduct by which such police power will be exercised, nor permit board to specially legislate respecting granting or refusing of permit for maintenance of stable.

3. Livery stable keepers 🔑4½—Zoning ordinance held not to deprive applicant for stable permit of right to maintain existing stable in residence district.

Zoning ordinance held not to affect adversely applicant's right to permit to maintain in residence district stable which was operating prior to adoption of ordinance.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action for mandamus by James J. Ryan against Sylvester Andriano and others, as the Board of Supervisors of the City of San Francisco, to compel the issuance of a permit to conduct and maintain a livery stable. From a judgment denying the writ, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John J. Taaffe and Joseph L. Taaffe, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Thomas P. Slevin, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment of the superior court denying a writ of mandamus by which appellant sought to compel the respondent board of supervisors to grant a permit to conduct and maintain a stable for horses at No. 817 Thirty-Sixth avenue, San Francisco.

[1] This stable had been in continuous operation for a period of twenty years prior to the date of the trial, April 5, 1926. Appellant, as a tenant, maintained the stable from 1914 to 1918. In 1918 appellant intended and desired to purchase the stable from the then owner, Mrs. Marie Gommet. As his purchase was contingent upon obtaining a permit, application for the same was made in the name of Mrs. Gommet. The respondents required appellant to make extensive sanitary improvements within certain time limits. These improvements were made, and the permit issued. Appellant purchased the stable and continued to operate it. In 1922 appellant applied for permission to make additional improvements, and, it then being noticed that the permit was not in his own name, he was instructed first to procure such a permit. Application being made for this permit protests were received by the respondent board of supervisors against the granting of the same. The matter was deferred from time to time until December, 1924, when the application for a permit was denied. During this two-year pendency of the application the respondents did not specify objectionable features to the stable and did not fix a time within which appellant should be required to remove such objections. The respondents' denial of the application for a permit seems to be based upon the conclusion that the said stable is not in the interests of the welfare of the inhabitants in the vicinity of its location.

The stable ordinance, No. 2639, New Series, approved February 26, 1914, is substantially as follows:

> Section 1 prohibits the maintenance of a stable without a permit.
> Section 2 provides that those conducting stables at the time of the passage of the ordinance must obtain a permit within not to exceed six months.
> "Section 3. No permit shall be granted for a stable hereafter to be constructed and maintained, or for the future maintenance as a stable of a building not used as such, except on the report of the board of health, or other satisfactory evidence, that the proposed place of construction or maintenance of such stable is unobjectionable from the point of view of sanitation and of the health and physical welfare of the inhabitants of the immediate neighborhood of its location.
> "Section 4. The board of supervisors shall not refuse a permit for the maintenance of a stable in a building now constructed and maintained as a stable except upon satisfactory evidence that such stable is conducted in an insanitary manner and the failure to remove the objection to the manner of its maintenance within a time to be prescribed by the board of supervisors.
> "Section 5. A permit granted hereunder is subject to revocation by the board of supervisors.
> "Section 6. No permit shall be refused or revoked by the board of supervisors except after a full hearing, and then only in the exercise of a sound and reasonable discretion by said board."

Appellant's contention is that, whatever may be the rule to be followed by the board in granting or refusing permits for new stables as defined in section 3 above, nevertheless, in the case of an application for a permit for a stable in a building which was constructed and maintained as a stable at the time of the passage of the ordinance, the board has no power to refuse such permit except where there exist two things which are specified in section 4 of the ordinance, to wit: (1) That the stable is conducted in an insanitary manner; and (2) that the applicant shall fail to remove such objection in a time to be prescribed by a board of supervisors.

The terms of the ordinance uphold the contention of appellant. Section 3 provides for new stables and section 4 provides for stables in buildings theretofore used as stables. The method of treating the application for permits is distinctly different in each class. Section 6 must be construed with section 4. Both must be given effect, and therefore the discretion mentioned in section 6 is a discretion to be exercised under the terms and procedure of section 4, in case of a pre-existing stable, and the discretion mentioned in section 3 is confined to new stables.

[2] The provisions of the city charter (article II, c. 2, § 1), giving the board power to ordain, make and enforce all necessary local police, sanitary and other laws and regulations, cannot be held to authorize the board to exercise all the powers which may be legitimately exercised under the police power without appropriate legislation predetermining the rules of conduct by which such police power will be exercised. To hold otherwise would do away with the necessity of general legislation and would not be due process of law. This charter provision does not permit the board to specially legislate upon each stable separately.

At the trial it was stipulated between counsel that the block in which this stable is situated is zoned under the terms of the city zoning ordinance as for second residential purposes. The zoning ordinance was not in the record, and, upon suggestion of this court, the parties stipulated that said ordinance might become a part of this record and considered upon the determination of this appeal. The said ordinance has been filed with the record in this case. The parties were also given an opportunity to file any additional points and authorities made pertinent by the consideration of this ordinance, but neither one had done so.

[3] It is provided in section 4 of said zoning ordinance that in a second residential district no building or premises shall be used for any purpose other than for certain specified purposes which are enumerated in the ordinance, but among which stables are not included. Section 9 of the zoning ordinance provides:

> "Any nonconforming use existing at the time of the passage of this ordinance may be continued and any existing building designed, arranged, intended or devoted to a nonconforming use may be reconstructed or structurally altered and the nonconforming use therein changed subject to the following regulations," etc.

In section 21 it is provided, among other things, as follows:

> "It is not intended by this ordinance to repeal, abrogate, annul or in any way to impair or interfere with any existing provision of law or ordinance or any rules, regulations or permits previously adopted or issued or which shall be adopted or issued pursuant to the law relating to the use of buildings or premises."

By virtue of these provisions we find that the zoning ordinance does not adversely affect the petitioner's application for a permit because the stable was operating prior to the adoption of both ordinances.

We conclude, therefore, that petitioner's application for a stable permit could not be denied without opportunity being first given him to remove objections to be specified by the board within a time to be specified by the board, as described in section 4 of the stable ordinance.

For these reasons, the judgment appealed from is reversed.

CHARLES T. POWNER CO. v. SMITH.
(Civ. 6145.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 18, 1928.

Master and servant ⚷81—Evidence supported finding that employee's sale of new law codes was not in competition with employer's business of selling secondhand editions.

In action by owner of book store against employee for accounting, evidence held to sustain court's finding that defendant's sale of new law codes through field salesmen in his spare time was not in competition with employer's business of selling secondhand editions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action for an accounting and damages by the Charles T. Powner Company against Olin W. Smith. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dryer, Castle & Hartke, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hewitt, Ford & Crump and Pierce Works, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiff, who is appellant here, is the owner of a bookstore in Los Angeles. Defendant, who is respondent here, was the employee and manager of said bookstore working for wages paid weekly. His work of running the store kept him in the store from opening to closing time with the exception of an hour off for lunch. Appellant brought this action for damages and accounting, charging that the respondent, in violation of his duties and obligations as an employee, engaged in buying and selling books on his own account in competition with and to the neglect and damage of the business and profits of appellant.

The judgment was in general favorable to respondent. It allowed appellant $88, which represented respondent's profit on the sale of four new Penal Codes and one secondhand set of Encyclopedia Britannica, which were bought and sold by respondent under circumstances which meant that he had used his employer's time and facilities in these deals. Respondent had also made a profit of about $851 in working as sales manager for a book concern which through field salesmen sold new editions of California codes. The court refused to allow this amount to the appellant, finding that respondent engaged in this work outside of the hours which belonged to the appellant and that the business was of a nature that did not compete with the employer's business nor conflict with respondent's duty to his employer.

There seems to be no dispute between counsel with respect to any proposition of law applicable to the facts in this case. They both acknowledge that it was respondent's duty to faithfully serve his employer during his working hours and not to engage in a competing business even outside of his working hours. The appeal represents only an attack upon the findings.

To the small extent that respondent was shown to have used the time and facilities of appellant in effecting sales on his own account, he was required by the judgment to account for all profits. The evidence also supports the court's finding that the sale of new law codes through field salesmen was not in competition with the business of appellant's store. The store dealt only in secondhand editions and never in new codes. The law book concern, which put out the codes which respondent and his salesmen sold, was unwilling to sell through a bookstore, but insisted upon a policy of direct solicitation of customers. These facts, together with other evidence printed from the record by respondent, sustain the trial court's findings. The evidence and arguments printed by appellant present at most only a conflict in the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

In action to subject certain realty to lien of judgment, evidence held to sustain finding that judgment debtor's husband executed deed of such realty to her for sole purpose of qualifying her to become surety on his bail bond, on exoneration of which property was to be reconveyed to him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by S. J. Parsons against Annie Dell Robinson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hilton & Christensen, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Sidney J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PULLEN, Justice pro tem. On or about September 1, 1916, the defendant Annie Dell Robinson, who before her marriage to Harry T. Robinson, also a defendant herein, was Annie Dell Segno, was indebted to the plaintiff and respondent herein. In 1919 respondent obtained a judgment in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles for certain moneys against said Annie Dell Segno, now Annie Dell Robinson; said judgment was regularly docketed so as to become a lien upon any and all real property owned by said judgment debtor at that time, and upon any property of which she might become the owner in the county of Los Angeles during the life of said judgment. It further appears that said judgment has never been paid, and that at the commencement of this action the whole thereof remained unpaid and unsatisfied; that Annie Dell Segno intermarried with defendant Harry T. Robinson, and they were at the commencement of this action husband and wife.

In 1923 Harry T. Robinson was indicted by the grand jury of the District Court of the United States in and for the Southern District of California and charged with conspiracy to violate certain laws of the United States. He was arrested upon a bench warrant issued out of said court and taken into custody; bail was fixed in the sum of $25,000; and, in order to secure his release, he procured one R. E. Fitzgerald and Olive S. Fitzgerald, his wife, to become sureties upon said bail bond in the sum of $25,000, and, another surety being required to execute said bail with the said R. E. and Olive S. Fitzgerald, in the sum of $25,000, it was arranged that said Harry T. Robinson should qualify his wife, the said A. D. Robinson, so as to enable her to become a surety, by deeding to her certain real property in the county of Los Angeles; thereupon, the said Harry T. Robinson conveyed to said A. D. Robinson, his wife, certain real property, worth in excess of $25,000; that before the execution of said deed by said Harry T. Robinson to his wife, A. D. Robinson, the said A. D. Robinson had no property of her own, and could not have qualified as surety on said bail bond; that upon receiving the deed to said property A. D. Robinson signed the bail bond as surety and made oath that she was a householder in the Southern District of California, and that she was worth the sum of $25,000, over and above all her just debts and liabilities, exclusive of property exempt from execution. Specific instructions were given by Harry T. Robinson that the deed should not be placed of record, but, contrary to such instructions, the deed was placed of record in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county.

It is the contention of the respondent that the judgment which he had secured in 1919 against Annie Dell Segno, now Annie Dell Robinson, or A. D. Robinson, as she is sometimes referred to herein, the wife of Harry T. Robinson, attached to and became a lien upon the real property which was conveyed to her by Harry T. Robinson in order to enable her to qualify on the bail bond in the federal court. In other words, that the grant deed before referred to vested the legal and equitable title in Annie Dell Robinson, and therefore the property became subject to the judgment lien.

Appellants claim that the deed executed by Harry T. Robinson to his wife did not vest the legal or equitable title in her, for the reason that the property was conveyed without consideration and without any intention on the part of the grantor to give the property to his wife, or that she should have the vested legal title to it, but that she should hold it only in trust for him while as bondsman, and therefore the grant either became a trust, or at most a mortgage to secure the payment of any loss that might be occasioned under the bail bond.

Judgment was rendered in the trial court against the contentions of appellants, and, from the judgment holding that the property became subject to the lien of said judgment, this appeal is taken.

[1, 2] The question to be determined is whether Harry T. Robinson, as grantor in the instrument in question intended thereby to convey the title to A. D. Robinson, and, if he did so intend thereby to convey the title to the property in question, is it an executed instrument?

Robinson, one of the appellants, testified upon the trial as follows:

"Q. Explain how you came to give that deed—the circumstances. A. I needed a bond, and Mr. Fitzgerald had sent a man by the name of Derth.

"Q. By the Court: Were you under arrest at the time? A. I was under arrest at the time. To be exact, I was in the county jail in the evening, and this was the following morning. Mr. Fitzgerald sent Mr. Derth to me and advised me he was willing and would be glad to qualify on the bond, but I would have to get another bondsman. He asked me who I could get, and I suggested a couple of parties, and also said that Mr. Fitzgerald had suggested a transfer of my property to Mrs. Robinson, and that would enable her to qualify as a bondsman. I told him at the time I didn't think it was the proper thing to do because I didn't want to lay myself liable for a judgment that was pending against Mrs. Robinson before we were married. Mr. Derth advised me that he would arrange so that the bond would not be recorded.

"Q. By Mr. Christensen: The deed, you mean? A. The deed; yes. I told him under those conditions I could deed it to her for the present to get quick action on the bond, but under those conditions only. The deed was not to be recorded.

"Q. Did you make the deed then? A. Yes, sir; at his suggestion and under those conditions.

"Q. Were you then released on bond? A. Yes, sir. * * *

"(Continuing) Q. By Mr. Christensen: Now, Mr. Robinson, did you ever part with the actual title to that property? A. No, sir.

"Q. You gave it for the purpose that you have indicated? A. For that purpose only; yes, sir."

The court in finding No. IV found:

> "The court further finds that the said Harry T. Robinson executed the said deed described as Exhibit D in plaintiff's complaint, to the said A. D. Robinson, for the sole purpose of qualifying the said A. D. Robinson to become a surety upon the said bail bond aforesaid; that no other consideration passed from the said A. D. Robinson to the said Harry T. Robinson for the said real property at the time of the conveyance of the said real property, except as set forth in finding III above, it being understood and agreed at that time between the said Harry T. Robinson and the said Annie Dell Robinson, otherwise known as A. D. Robinson, that upon the exoneration of the bail bond aforesaid, the said real property should be reconveyed by the said A. D. Robinson to the said Harry T. Robinson, and it was further agreed that the said deed to said A. D. Robinson should not be recorded. However, the said deed was intrusted to an attorney at law, who represented the said Harry T. Robinson before the United States commissioner at Los Angeles, Cal., and who without authority either from said Harry T. Robinson, or the said A. D. Robinson, filed the said deed for record with the county recorder of Los Angeles county on the said 19th day of October, 1923, and the said deed was recorded in Book 2884 at page 61 of the official records of Los Angeles county, Cal."

The trial court having found, and that finding being based upon ample evidence in the case, that "Harry T. Robinson executed the said deed * * * to said A. D. Robinson for the sole purpose of qualifying the said A. D. Robinson to become surety, * * * that no other consideration passed, * * * that upon the exoneration of the bond * * * the property should be reconveyed, * * *" it follows that A. D. Robinson had no title to which the lien of the judgment of plaintiff could attach; her title being that of trustee merely.

[3] The rule is clearly expressed in 34 Corpus Juris, p. 591, par. 903:

> "The lien of a judgment attaches to the precise interest or estate which the judgment debtor has actually and effectively in the land, and only to such interest; the lien cannot be made effectual to bind or to convey any greater or other estate than the debtor himself, in the exercise of his rights, could voluntarily have transferred or alienated."

Under the circumstances of this case, it is apparent that if A. D. Robinson had refused to execute the bond, or had attempted to convey the property to one familiar with the facts or had refused to reconvey to Harry T. Robinson, upon the exoneration of the bond, he could have enforced performance upon her part by appropriate proceedings; she held the naked legal title to which a judgment lien does not attach. A judgment lien attaches only to the interest which the debtor has in real property, and, if he has no actual interest, though possessing the legal title, then no lien attaches. 15 R. C. L. 807.

[4] Whether or not plaintiff would have occupied any different position if he had been an innocent purchaser for value need not here concern us, for a judgment creditor is not a purchaser for value. The reason for the rule is well expressed in First State Bank v. Jones, 107 Tex. 623, 183 S. W. 874:

> "A judgment lienholder is not in the same attitude as an innocent purchaser for value without notice. The latter has expended his money in good faith to the amount of the purchase price of the land, and is justly entitled to be held harmless. It is right that the loss under such circumstances should be visited upon the landowner whose negligence, in failing to give notice through the deed records of his ownership, occasioned the loss, rather than that it should fall upon the innocent purchaser who was without fault. The judgment lienholder is in a different attitude. He is not in any sense an innocent purchaser. If his lien fails to attach, he loses nothing. His judgment still remains unimpaired in its full amount. In such a case, even though the owner of the land has been negligent in failing to provide a correct record notice of his title, still his negligence has not resulted in injury to the judgment creditor. Under such circumstances, there can be no good reason for any other rule than that his lien attaches to no more than the interest actually owned in the land by the judgment debtor. This was the common-law rule, and it has been consistently followed by this court."

The judgment is reversed.

BANK OF COTTONWOOD v. HENRIQUES et al. (HENRIQUES, Intervener).★ (Civ. 3451.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 17, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 14, 1928.

1. Trusts 🔑81(4)—Where father, purchasing land and paying consideration, had son take title, resulting trust immediately arose (Civ. Code, § 853).

Where father purchased land and paid consideration, and son took title, resulting trust immediately arose in favor of father, and son became trustee under Civ. Code, § 853.

2. Trusts 🔑77—Party claiming trust in land purchased in another's name must show money was paid by him at or before execution of conveyance (Civ. Code, § 853).

Party setting up trust in land purchased with his money in name of another under Civ. Code, § 853, must show money was paid by him at or before execution of conveyance.

3. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑49(1)—Whether one holding title to land in trust was insolvent when executing deed to sister was immaterial.

Whether one holding title to land in trust for his father was insolvent when he executed deed of trust property to his sister was immaterial on question of fraudulent conveyance, since he had no interest in lands to which creditor's judgment could attach.

4. Trusts 🔑136½—Owner held not estopped to assert title to land to which son held title in trust as against son's creditor loaning to son on other security.

Owner of land, to which son held title in trust, held not estopped to assert title as against creditor of son because he voluntarily placed title of record in name of son, where owner did not know anything about son's representations to creditor regarding ownership of land, and was in possession, receiving rents and profits and paying taxes, and creditor made no examination of record or land, and, in making loan to son, creditor relied solely on security of chattel mortgage on cattle.

5. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑299(11)—Evidence held not to show deed from one holding title in trust to sister was made to defraud creditor.

In action to set aside deed, evidence held not to show that deed from one holding title to land in trust for his father to his sister was made to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditor.

6. Trusts 🔑136½—Creditor of one holding title in trust could not claim benefit under statute relating to unrecorded conveyances, where it did not obtain judgment affecting title before conveyance to sister (Civ. Code, § 1214).

Creditor of son holding title to land in trust for his father, being neither a bona fide purchaser or mortgagee could not claim any benefit under Civ. Code, § 1214, relating to unrecorded conveyances, where creditor had not obtained judgment affecting title to property in question before son's conveyance to sister.

7. Judgment 🔑788(1)—Judgment against W. was not "judgment affecting title" to property previously conveyed by W. to sister, within statute relating to unrecorded conveyances (Civ. Code, § 1214).

Filing of suit against W. to foreclose chattel mortgage, after conveyance by W. of land which he held in trust for his father to sister, and attempted attachment of land then standing of record in name of sister, and obtaining of money judgment against W., was not obtaining of "judgment affecting title" to property in question within meaning of Civ. Code, § 1214, relating to unrecorded conveyances.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Judgment (In law).]

8. Estoppel 🔑72—Statute regarding innocent persons suffering by another's act held inapplicable, where one lending did not rely on representation borrower owned land held in trust for father (Civ. Code, § 3543).

Son, holding title to land in trust for father, made financial statement to bank some time before loan in which he represented that he owned land. After plaintiff bank made loan to son secured by chattel mortgage on cattle, son conveyed land to sister. In action by plaintiff bank to set aside deed on ground it was made to defraud creditors, father intervened, claiming title to land. Held, that Civ. Code, § 3543, providing that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer by act of third, he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer, is inapplicable, since plaintiff bank did not act on financial statement, made by son that he was owner of land, in making loan.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; James W. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Cottonwood against William R. Henriques, also known as Willie Henriques, and another, to set aside a deed, in which Frank R. Henriques intervened. From a judgment in favor of the intervener, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Carter & Smith, of Redding, for appellant.

Chenoweth & Leininger, of Redding, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff, Bank of Cottonwood, a banking corporation, brought this action to set aside a deed made by defendant William R. Henriques to his sister, Marie E. Henriques, on December 28, 1921, on the ground that said deed was made and executed for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of the said defendant William R. Henriques.

Frank R. Henriques, the father of defendants William R. Henriques and Marie E. Henriques, intervened in this action, and claimed that he was the owner of the 600 acres of land in Tehama county described in said deed from William R. Henriques to Marie E. Henriques, and that said property was held in trust for him by Marie E. Henriques.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

The case, being one in equity, was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of the intervener, Frank R. Henriques, from which judgment the plaintiff, Bank of Cottonwood, prosecutes this appeal.

Most of the material facts are without substantial conflict, and can be thus briefly stated: The plaintiff is a banking corporation organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California and having its principal place of business in the town of Cottonwood, Shasta county, Cal. Defendant William R. Henriques was engaged in the stock business, and had from time to time borrowed small sums of money from the appellant on his unsecured note. On December 15, 1919, William R. Henriques owed the appellant for money theretofore borrowed on two unsecured notes, $660. He had never given appellant any statement of his financial condition. On December 15, 1919, he visited the bank, and the cashier explained to him that the state banking department required from all debtors, when the loan reached the sum of $500 or more, a statement of the debtor's financial condition, and requested him to furnish such a statement to the bank. Thereupon the cashier produced a blank form of financial statement, and assisted Mr. Henriques in filling it out, the cashier asking the questions and inserting Mr. Henriques' answers thereto, and, when this statement was completed, it was signed by William R. Henriques, and filed with the bank. This statement, as far as the land in question is concerned, is as follows:

Description of Real Estate.

Location.	Improvements.	In Whose Name is Title Held.	Value of Land and Improvements.	Amount of Mortgages or Liens.
Tehama Co.	Fenced	Self	$4,200.00	No

It must be remembered that, at the time this statement was signed on December 15, 1919, William R. Henriques was not borrowing, or attempting to borrow, any further moneys from appellant. Thereafter, and on the 23d of July, 1920, William R. Henriques applied to appellant for a further loan of $3,500 on 110 head of cattle. These cattle were appraised by appellant at $55 per head, and the loan was made, and a chattel mortgage on the cattle was taken to secure the same. At the time this $3,500 loan was made no further financial statement was made or requested of William R. Henriques. The evidence is conflicting as to whether or not the old financial statement was considered; the cashier claimed that it was referred to and discussed, and it was because of such statement as to ownership of the land, made by William R. Henriques, that the loan of $3,500 was made. William R. Henriques, on the other hand, claims that the statement was not mentioned or referred to in any way in connection with the $3,500 loan, and that this loan was made solely upon the chattel mortgage on the cattle. However, the court found upon this conflicting testimony "that said loan of $3,500 was made to the defendant William R. Henriques solely upon and by reason of the security of the cattle. * * * It is not true that on or about the 23d day of July, 1920, said defendant William R. Henriques represented to plaintiff that he was the owner in fee of the land described in the deed." (The land in dispute.)

Out of the $3,500 loan, the bank deducted the two unsecured notes, and paid William R. Henriques the balance, so at that time the entire indebtedness to the bank was $3,500.

William R. Henriques did not pay said note of $3,500, and some of the cattle covered by the chattel mortgage died, and others were lost, and on the 8th of September, 1924, the bank brought an action to foreclose said mortgage, and judgment was obtained, and all of the cattle that could be found were sold, and a deficiency judgment was docketed against William R. Henriques for $4,275.65, which remains unsatisfied.

The appellant never had any description of the land other than that stated in the financial statement, and never examined the records until some time in July, 1924, at which time it discovered that William R. Henriques had executed a deed on December 28, 1921, to Marie E. Henriques for 600 acres of land, which appellant claims was the land listed in the financial statement given by William R. Henriques to it on December 15, 1919. After discovering this deed of record, the appellant bank commenced this present action on March 31, 1925, to have it set aside on the ground that the same was made to defraud the creditors of William R. Henriques.

On November 16, 1925, the day set for the trial of this action, Frank R. Henriques was permitted by the court to intervene, and filed what is termed an "Answer of Intervener," in which he alleges, among other things, "that he now is, and ever since the 17th day of November, 1917, has been, the owner of said lands and premises described in the said deed from William R. Henriques to Marie E. Henriques, and between the 17th day of November, 1917, and the 28th day of December, 1921, said property stood in the name of said defendant William R. Henriques, but said William R. Henriques had no right, title, or interest in or to said premises other than as trustee for intervener, and he never at any time authorized or empowered said William R. Henriques to represent in any manner whatsoever that said William R. Henriques was the owner or the owner in fee of said premises."

The evidence introduced on behalf of the intervener, Frank R. Henriques, shows without conflict that on November 17, 1917, Frank R. Henriques purchased from one M. B. Connell the 600 acres of land involved in this action for the sum of $2,700. The entire purchase price was paid by Frank R. Henriques, and nothing was paid, or agreed to be paid, by William R. Henriques. The deed was made by Mr. Connell to William R. Henriques at the request of Frank R. Henriques upon the oral understanding and agreement that William R. Henriques would take and hold the title to the property as trustee for Frank R. Henriques, and that William R. Henriques would have no title in or to said property other than as trustee for the said Frank R. Henriques. The deed was, immediately upon its execution, recorded in the office of the county recorder of Tehama county, and immediately after the transaction was completed the intervener, Frank R. Henriques, entered into possession of said lands, and he has ever since November 17, 1917, had the exclusive possession and control of said lands, and has paid all taxes levied or assessed against the same, received for his own use and benefit all rents and profits derived from the property, and at no time since November 17, 1917, has William R. Henriques or Marie E. Henriques had any possession or control over the property, and neither of them has received any rent or income from said property.

There is nothing in the evidence to show that Frank R. Henriques did anything to show or indicate that William R. Henriques had anything to do with the lands or had any ownership therein, except what might be shown by the deed itself, which was a simple bargain and sale deed, and did not on its face disclose any trusteeship in relation to the said lands.

At the time this deed was made, Frank R. Henriques owned, and was in possession of, a considerable tract of land adjoining the land in question, and William R. Henriques was in no wise connected in business with his father, and not on the property, but was at the time engaged in the stock business in another part of the country, at a place known as "Gas Point" in Shasta county. The land in question is situated about 14 miles from the town of Cottonwood, but none of the officials of the bank ascertained the description or exact location of said lands, or visited the lands, or made any inquiry as to the character or condition or use of the lands, or who was in possession of the same, or who was receiving the rents, issues, and profits therefrom. Any inspection of the land, or any inquiry concerning the same, would no doubt have shown that the lands were under the exclusive possession and control of the intervener, Frank R. Henriques. The lands had been leased by Henriques several times to persons who did business in, and were known in, Cottonwood.

William R. Henriques conveyed the land on December 28, 1921, to Marie E. Henriques at the request of the intervener, Frank R. Henriques, because of the illness of William R. Henriques. There was no consideration for the conveyance.

Frank R. Henriques did not know that William R. Henriques had listed the lands with the bank, or had attempted to secure any credit on account of the property standing in his name.

From all these facts the court, as above stated, found in favor of the intervener, Frank R. Henriques, and made very full and complete findings upon all the issues in the case.

[1-3] Appellant first contends that the deed from William R. Henriques to Marie E. Henriques was void as against the creditors of William R. Henriques, because of the insolvency of William R. Henriques. We are unable to agree with this contention, for two reasons: First, the court found upon substantial evidence that William R. Henriques was not insolvent on December 28, 1921, when he made the deed to his sister Marie E. Henriques, and that said deed was not executed for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding the creditors of William R. Henriques. It is true, as contended by appellant, that the court found that William R. Henriques was, at the time of the commencement of this action, insolvent, and that appellant was unable to satisfy its deficiency judgment against him. This deficiency judgment, however, was not entered until March, 1925, over three years after he made the deed to his sister. A person's financial condition could, and often does, materially change in three years. If a man is insolvent in March, 1925, that is no proof that he was also insolvent in December, 1921, three years before. Second, the facts are undisputed, and the court found, that, when the property was purchased on November 17, 1917, the intervener, Frank R. Henriques, paid the whole purchase price, and that the conveyance by the seller, M. B. Connell, to William R. Henriques, was made at the request of Frank R. Henriques upon the understanding and agreement that William R. Henriques would take title to the property as trustee, for the use and benefit of Frank R. Henriques, and William R. Henriques would have no title or interest in said property other than as trustee.

The rule is well settled that, when land is purchased, for which one party pays the consideration and another party takes the title, a resulting trust immediately arises in favor of the party paying the consideration, and the other party becomes the trustee. It is equally well settled that the party setting up the trust must show the money was paid by him at or before the execution of the conveyance. Section 853, Civ. Code; Murphy v. Clayton, 113 Cal. 153, 45 P. 267; Case v. Codding, 38 Cal. 193; Breeze v. Brooks, 71 Cal. 169, 9 P. 670, 11 P. 885; South San Bernardino Land & Investment Co. v. San Bernardino National Bank, 127 Cal. 245, 59 P. 699; Polk v. Boggs, 122 Cal. 114, 54 P. 536; Moultrie v. Wright, 154 Cal. 520, 98 P. 257; Lincoln v. Chamberlain, 61 Cal. App. 399, 214 P. 1013; Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 1033; Brown v. Spencer, 163 Cal. 589, 126 P. 493; Webb v. Vercoe (Cal. Sup.) 258 P. 1099.

It follows, therefore, that William R. Henriques was not the owner of the property in question, but was only the trustee for Frank R. Henriques, the real owner, and that William R. Henriques had no interest in the lands in question, to which the lien of appellant's judgment could attach.

The law is also well settled that a bankrupt may continue to discharge his duties as a trustee, and trust property in his possession does not go to his assignee or to his creditors. Hayford v. Wallace, 5 Cal. Unrep. 476, 46 P. 293; Perry on Trusts, § 346.

Therefore, William R. Henriques having no interest in the lands to which appellant's judgment could attach, it is wholly immaterial whether he was solvent or insolvent, or contemplated insolvency, when he made the deed of the trust property to his sister, Marie E. Henriques.

[4, 5] It is next contended by appellant that the intervener, Frank R. Henriques, is estopped from asserting title to the property in question, for the reason that he voluntarily placed the title of record in the name of William R. Henriques. There is no merit in this contention. The intervener did absolutely nothing other than to permit his property to stand of record in the name of William R. Henriques. There is nothing in the record to show that the intervener knew anything about any representations made by William R. Henriques to appellant regarding the ownership of the land. From the time the land was purchased, intervener was in possession thereof, receiving all rents and profits, and paying all taxes assessed thereon. Appellant made no examination of the record or the land to ascertain who was in possession of the same. Furthermore, the findings negative the idea that the bank, in making the loan of $3,500 to William R. Henriques, relied on the financial statement of William R. Henriques that he owned the land. Indeed, the court found upon sufficient evidence that the bank loaned the $3,500 solely and alone upon the security of the chattel mortgage upon the cattle.

It was necessary for the appellant, in order for it to prevail in this action, to show that Frank R. Henriques was in some way privy to William R. Henriques' obtaining credit from the bank, or that, in gaining such credit, the bank relied upon some affirmative statement or act of Frank R. Henriques, other than his permitting the title to stand of record in the name of William R. Henriques, and the mere fact that Frank R. Henriques allowed the title to the land to stand of record in the name of William R. Henriques is unavailing to appellant, unless it established to the satisfaction of the court that they relied thereon as an inducement to give credit to William R. Henriques (Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 75, 31 P. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257; Murphy v. Clayton, supra), but, as we have seen, the findings of the trial court negative any such contention.

It does not appear that the deed from William R. Henriques to Marie E. Henriques was made to hinder, delay, or defraud the bank; on the contrary, it was made simply to transfer the bare legal title to the land from William R. Henriques to Marie E. Henriques.

[6, 7] Appellant further contends that the facts of the case at bar bring it within the provisions of section 1214 of the Civil Code. We find no merit in this contention. Section 1214 deals exclusively with bona fide purchasers and mortgagees, and appellant is neither a purchaser nor a mortgagee of the land in question. Approximately three years before the action to foreclose the chattel mortgage was commenced and the property attached, it had been conveyed to Marie E. Henriques.

If the property had stood of record in the name of William R. Henriques at the time of the commencement of the foreclosure suit, and sold under execution and purchased by appellant, then, and in that case, section 1214, Civil Code, would apply, and the intervener would have been foreclosed of all interest in the property, provided, of course, appellant had no notice of the claim of the intervener. The appellant, being neither a bona fide purchaser or mortgagee, must have obtained a judgment affecting the title to property in question in order to claim any benefit under section 1214 of the Civil Code. See Riley v. Martinelli, 97 Cal. 575, 32 P. 579, 21 L. R. A. 33, 33 Am. St. Rep. 209; Murphy v. Clayton, supra.

It seems too clear to admit of argument that the filing of the suit to foreclose the chattel mortgage on September 8, 1924, and the attempted attachment of the land, then standing of record in the name of Marie E. Henriques, and the obtaining of a money judgment against William R. Henriques, is not the obtaining of a judgment affecting the title to the property in question within the meaning of section 1214, Civil Code.

While the facts in the case of Moore v. Schneider, 196 Cal. 393, 238 P. 85, relied upon by appellant, are entirely different from those in the case at bar, still the court in that case, speaking of the purpose of section 1214, Civil Code, used the following language, which is particularly appropriate here:

"Its purpose is to prevent fraud through the withholding of notice of transactions affecting titles, to the detriment of subsequent purchasers in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and those who may seek to confirm their claims to real property by judgments affecting the title."

[8] Lastly, appellant contends that it should be protected by applying the provisions of section 3543 of the Civil Code "that where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer." Under the facts of this case, this section has no application. In the first place, this is an action to set aside a deed upon the ground that it is made to defraud creditors; secondly, the court found that the appellant did not act upon the financial statement made by William R. Henriques that he was the owner of the land in making the loan.

Appellant's whole contention, in its last analysis, is that intervener, Frank R. Henriques, is estopped from claiming the land in question by reason of the fact that he permitted the title to stand of record in the name of his son, William R. Henriques. A complete answer to this contention is the finding of the trial court that appellant never acted upon the representations made to it by William R. Henriques that he was the owner of the property, but, on the contrary, the loan was made to William R. Henriques solely on the security of the cattle.

After a careful review of the entire record, we are of the opinion that the trial court's conclusions were correct, and that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

BOWMAN v. CARROLL. (Civ. 6168.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 14, 1928.

1. Trusts ⇨105—That defendant utilized property in which plaintiff had half interest to raise purchase price for other property vested in plaintiff interest in latter property.

In action to compel accounting and establish trust, fact that defendant utilized property in which she conceded plaintiff had one-half interest, to raise substantial part of purchase price paid for other property, held to operate to vest in plaintiff interest in latter property.

2. Account ⇨18—Evidence held to show plaintiff entitled to accounting as to land transactions with defendant which were handled at profit.

Evidence held to show that plaintiff was entitled to accounting as to transactions with defendant in which property selected by plaintiff had been purchased and handled at profit, where evidence was conflicting as to what share of purchase money had been furnished by plaintiff.

3. Account ⇨8—Plaintiff may obtain equitable relief under unterminated contract for acquisition of properties, though he did not furnish agreed amount.

Plaintiff suing to compel accounting under contract with defendant and to establish trust may obtain equitable relief, though he did not furnish half of cost of acquisition of properties as agreed, where agreement was not terminated and parties continued to operate thereunder.

4. Account ⇨18—In action for accounting as to land transactions, evidence held insufficient to support finding as to net sale price of certain lot.

In action for accounting, based on transactions for acquisition of land, evidence held insufficient to support court's finding as to net sale price of certain lot, in view of conflict between defendant's testimony on which finding was based and other testimony given by defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by William J. Bowman against Evelyn Carroll to compel an accounting and to establish a trust. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Porter & Sutton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Guy Eddie, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment rendered in an action to compel an accounting under a partnership agreement entered into between the plaintiff and defendant for the purchase and sale of real estate; also to impress a trust upon a parcel of land acquired pursuant to said agreement and standing in defendant's name. Insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings and the judgment constitutes the main ground of appeal.

The complaint alleged that under the terms of said agreement plaintiff was to select the property to be purchased and that title thereto was to be taken in defendant's name; that each party was to furnish one-half of the cost of the acquisition of the property, and, when sold or otherwise disposed of, the proceeds derived therefrom should be equally divided. The court found that said agreement had been made as alleged, and that pursuant thereto plaintiff selected and there was purchased at various times five parcels of land situate in Los Angeles, four of which were afterwards sold at a profit, and a bungalow court was erected on the fifth parcel, with reference to which the court found as follows: That the parties "agreed that they would erect a bungalow court upon said property, plaintiff at said time offering, and suggesting that he secure a loan on certain individual personal property belonging to him in order to defray his half of the cost of said venture; that defendant, however, stating to the plaintiff that it was not necessary for him to do so, and that she would advance the money necessary from funds she then had on hand, and it was then and there so agreed by the parties; that, pursuant to said arrangement and understanding, there was constructed upon said lot a seven-unit bungalow court, the defendant advancing to the plaintiff during the construction of said court the sum of approximately $8,000, for the payment of the cost thereof, and which said moneys were used in the construction of said building." The court further found that defendant afterwards received the sum of $3,831.82 as rentals from said bungalow court, but refused to account to plaintiff for any part thereof or for any of the profits derived from the sale of the other properties. The vital finding upon which the decision in the case turned, however, was that "plaintiff did not furnish one-half of the cost of the acquisition of the properties" above mentioned, except his half of the purchase price of the first parcel purchased, which the court found was subsequently sold for $3,388.64 net; and therefore the court concluded that plaintiff was not entitled to an accounting as to any of the properties acquired pursuant to said agreement, but should be given judgment for the sum of $1,694.34, representing one-half of the sale price of the parcel last mentioned. Judgment was entered accordingly.

[1] The evidence shows: That all of the property acquired was purchased at various times in the order following: First, a lot on the corner of Seventy-Seventh and Main streets; second, a lot on the corner of Ninety-First street and Moneta avenue; third, a corner lot at Seventy-Eighth and San Pedro streets; fourth, a corner lot at Seventy-Fifth and San Pedro streets; and, lastly, lot No. 33 of tract No. 1889, upon which the bungalow court was erected. That the entire purchase price of the first piece purchased, on the corner of Seventy-Seventh and Main streets, was advanced by plaintiff, and afterwards defendant reimbursed him for her half thereof, and that the last piece of property acquired, the bungalow court property, was purchased prior to the sale of the lot on Seventy-Seventh and Main streets, for a consideration of approximately $3,000, of which sum $1,969.93 had been paid by defendant at the time the bungalow court was completed. But, according to defendant's own testimony, $1,000 of the purchase price paid for the latter property was obtained by her through the medium of a loan made on the security of the lot at Seventy-Seventh and Main streets in which plaintiff admittedly owned a one-half interest. Her testimony in this respect was as follows:

"Mr. Eddie (Attorney for Defendant): Q. What did you do to raise that money? A. Had to go to the bank and raise money. Sold Liberty bonds and made loans on other pieces of property, and I got the Bank of America to loan me one thousand on the Seventy-Seventh street and Main lot to help pay for it."

Therefore, and aside from any disputed claim of plaintiff's that he paid other sums toward the purchase of the bungalow court property, the fact that defendant utilized the property in which she at all times conceded plaintiff a one-half interest, to raise a substantial part of the purchase price paid for the bungalow court property, manifestly operated to vest in plaintiff an interest in the latter property.

The evidence further shows without conflict that during the operation of the partnership agreement plaintiff paid to defendant various sums of money, but the purpose of most of these payments is in dispute; plaintiff claiming that many of them were to be applied toward his share of the cost of the acquisition of said properties, and defendant claiming that all of them were made in settlement or partial settlement of accounts existing between them foreign to their real estate enterprises. In this regard the evidence shows that prior to the making of said agreement, and while the parties were operating thereunder, they entertained toward each other a friendly and social relationship which plaintiff asserted had culminated into an engagement to marry; but the existence of such an engagement was denied by the defendant. Be that as it may, it was clearly established that the real estate agreement grew out of the social relationship, and that during the times mentioned plaintiff manifested implicit confidence in defendant and personally attended to many business matters for her in connection with other enterprises in which she was interested, and that, incidental thereto, he collected moneys due her, and she advanced him money for expenses and reimbursed him for expenditures made in her behalf. As a result of these outside transactions, the parties were frequently adjusting accounts and passing money back and forth.

Two of the payments made by plaintiff to defendant during the period mentioned were evidenced by checks—one dated November 7, 1921, for the sum of $200, and the other dated November 15, 1921, for the sum of $1,306. The real purpose of these two payments is not clear. Plaintiff testified that $400 of the total sum thus paid constituted part payment of his share of the purchase price of the second parcel of land purchased, situate on the corner of Ninety-First street and Moneta avenue, which the evidence shows was selected by plaintiff, bought by defendant for a consideration of $2,000, one-half of which was paid by defendant at the time of its acquisition, and that said property was afterwards sold for a consideration of $10,000, of which $2,500 had been paid at the time of the trial of this action. Defendant at one time in her testimony claimed that said checks were given in payment of plaintiff's share of the purchase price of the lot on the corner of Seventy-Seventh and Main streets, which was the first piece of property acquired under the agreement, but the record clearly proves that this statement was not true, because in another part of her testimony defendant admitted, and the evidence shows beyond question, that plaintiff advanced the entire purchase price of $1,500 for the acquisition of said lot and was afterwards reimbursed by defendant by check for her half thereof, and still in another part of her testimony defendant claimed that said checks were given in payment of amounts due from plaintiff on other accounts. In the absence of an accounting, however, there is nothing in the record to prove that plaintiff was at that time indebted to her in the amount represented by the checks or in any other amount.

With reference to the purchase of the third lot, on the corner of Seventy-Eighth and San Pedro streets, defendant testified that the property was selected by plaintiff and purchased by her for $1,800; that she made a down payment thereon of $560, and afterwards paid the balance; that she therefore claimed that plaintiff had no interest in said lot. After the breach between the parties occurred, however, and before suit was commenced, defendant prepared and submitted to plaintiff a statement of their accounts wherein she conceded to plaintiff one-half of the net sale price of the property last mentioned; but, in explanation thereof, she testified that plaintiff was entitled to such one-half "provided he would pay up his half which he agreed to do."

As to the fourth piece of property purchased, on the corner of Seventy-Fifth and San Pedro streets, the evidence shows without conflict that plaintiff selected said lot and made the initial payment thereon of $50, and that defendant paid the balance of the down payment, amounting to $950. Defendant claimed, however, that the $50 paid by plaintiff was in liquidation of a like amount which plaintiff owed her on another account.

[2] It would appear, therefore, first, from the trial court's findings, that, notwithstanding plaintiff failed to furnish his full quota of the purchase price of the four parcels last acquired, there was no termination of the agreement, but the parties continued to operate thereunder and to acquire property in defendant's name; and, secondly, from the uncontradicted evidence, it appears that the first parcel of land acquired in which plaintiff admittedly owned a one-half interest was used in the acquisition of another parcel, that a small part payment was made by plaintiff on the purchase price of a third parcel, and that larger payments were made to defendant which he claims should have been applied toward his share of the cost of the acquisition of the remaining properties. Under such circumstances we think plaintiff was clearly entitled to an accounting, for it would seem that, in view of the other transactions had between them, in no other manner could the nature and extent of his rights in the property thus acquired be fully and fairly adjudicated.

[3] Evidently the trial court's decision denying plaintiff any equitable relief was based upon the theory that plaintiff had not furnished the full one-half of the cost of said properties, for there was no finding to the effect that plaintiff did not furnish any portion of the cost of the acquisition of said properties, and, in view of the foregoing evidence, there could not be. As supporting the trial court's decision, defendant in her brief quotes a rule of law set forth in the note appended to the case of McDonough v. Saunders, 201 Ala. 321, 78 So. 160, as reported in 11 A. L. R. at page 432, which in part reads as follows:

> "The rule seems to be that failure of a party to a joint adventure to contribute his share of the expenses is ground for abandonment of the enterprise by his coadventurers, and his exclusion from further operations by them, provided," the note continues, "they take definite steps to effect that result. They cannot, however, continue the enterprise, using what he has contributed, or failing to notify him of the dissolution, and then exclude him from a share of the resulting profits. On the other hand, his failure may, in some instances, preclude his securing relief in a court of equity." (Italics ours.)

The author of the note then proceeds to discuss and quote from cases arising in various jurisdictions wherein equitable relief had been denied, among them being Miller v. Butterfield, 79 Cal. 62, 21 P. 543. But it will be found that in most, if not all, of the cases cited, such relief was denied because the defaulting parties wholly failed to contribute any part of the consideration for the purchase of the property. Such was the case of Miller v. Butterfield, supra.

In the present case, however, the trial court's findings show, as already pointed out, that, although plaintiff did not furnish the full one-half of the cost of the acquisition of the properties as agreed, the agreement was not terminated upon that or any other ground, but remained in full force and effect and the parties continued to operate thereunder from the time it was made until after the bungalow court was erected. Under its terms, all of the property in question here was acquired, and the bungalow court was constructed, plaintiff having superintended the building thereof and paid practically all of the bills, with about $8,000 advanced to him by defendant for that purpose. At no time did defendant attempt to abandon or cancel the agreement, but, on the contrary, continued to accept the benefits of plaintiff's services in selecting the property which she acquired in her name, and whatever money he may have contributed toward the purchase thereof, and afterwards sold or operated said properties at large profits. Therefore, under the authorities cited, it was not essential, as the findings imply, for plaintiff to establish that he furnished the full amount of money agreed in order to obtain equitable relief. It was sufficient for him to prove a substantial compliance with the terms of said agreement or a waiver thereof by the defendant.

[4] Furthermore, we find no evidence in the record to support the trial court's finding that the net sale price of the lot on Seventy-Seventh and Main streets was only $3,388.82. The evidence on this point was furnished by the defendant. She testified that the lot sold for $5,000; and, in the statement prepared by her prior to the commencement of the action, she set forth the amount of plaintiff's one-half share thereof as being $2,473.50, indicating that the net sale price was $4,947. Assuming that the difference of $53 was deducted from the gross sale price as given in her testimony for the payment of taxes and expenses incidental to the sale, there would still be a balance of approximately $1,558.18 unaccounted for. In this connection the record shows that at the conclusion of the evidence the trial court called defendant to the witness stand, and the following proceedings took place:

> "The Court: How much do you admit the plaintiff is entitled to, according to your figures, in the one house, in which you admit he has an interest, namely, Seventy-Seventh and Main? * * *
> "Q. All I want to know is the sum total, what you admit he is entitled to—half of the net profit? A. Half of — $3,388.75.
> "Q. $1,694.37; is that correct?
> "Mr. Eddie: That is correct.
> "The Court: Is that what you get?
> "Mr. Eddie: $1,694.37; yes; that would be correct.
> "The Court: Plaintiff may have judgment for that amount."

Apparently from the foregoing proceedings defendant and her attorney were allowed to fix the amount which was awarded to plaintiff as his one-half of the net sale price of said property, but how they arrived at the sum of $3,388.75 as being the net sale price, instead of $4,947, as stated by defendant in her testimony, is not disclosed. It may be fairly inferred, however, from other testimony given by defendant, that she charged plaintiff with certain items claimed to be due on accounts foreign to the sale of that particular lot, which, in the absence of a full accounting, was obviously unfair to plaintiff.

For the reasons hereinabove stated, the judgment is reversed.

SMURDA et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 5975.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 17, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court June 14, 1928.

1. Husband and wife 🔑270(1)—Action to establish trust in which husband and wife are beneficiaries is one affecting community property.

An action to establish a trust in property in which husband and wife are beneficiaries is one affecting community property.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑7(1)—Dismissal may be had at any time before final submission.

An action may be dismissed at any time before its final submission.

3. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑7(2)—Suit in equity requiring proof cannot be finally submitted until evidence is taken, even though default of defendants is regularly entered.

A suit in equity, requiring proof, cannot be finally submitted until evidence is taken, even though defendants defaulted, and their defaults are regularly entered.

4. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑42—Where no affirmative relief is sought in answer, dismissal ipso facto terminates case, and ousts court of jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 1).

Where answer seeks no affirmative relief, the effect of a dismissal made under the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 1, is ipso facto to terminate the case and oust court of jurisdiction to proceed.

5. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑42—Judgment and other steps taken by court subsequent to dismissal held void for want of jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 1).

On dismissal of suit involving community property by plaintiff husband and his attorney, under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 1, court completely lost jurisdiction, and judgment rendered and all other steps taken subsequently to such dismissal are void for want of jurisdiction.

6. Prohibition 🔑10(1)—On court losing jurisdiction by dismissal by plaintiff, prohibition will be granted to restrain further unauthorized action.

Where court has lost jurisdiction as result of a dismissal by plaintiff and his attorney, prohibition will be granted to restrain further illegal and unauthorized action about to be taken.

8. Prohibition ⟹10(2)—That receiver, appointed on entry of unauthorized judgment after dismissal by plaintiff, threatens to take possession, held to warrant issuance of writ of prohibition (Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 1).

Where suit involving community property was dismissed by husband and his attorneys under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 1, thus ousting court of jurisdiction, held that, on subsequent entry of judgment and appointment of receiver, court will grant prohibition, where it is shown that receiver threatens to take possession of the property.

9. Prohibition ⟹28—Remedy by writ of review will be given, though prohibition only was petitioned for, where it appears on complete record that petitioner is entitled to remedy afforded by writ of review.

Where a complete record of case as affecting points in dispute is presented, and it appears that petitioner is entitled to remedy afforded by writ of review, that relief will be granted, though petitioner has asked only for prohibition.

Application for writ of prohibition by Mary Calista Flynn Smurda and another to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County to restrain further proceedings in an action to establish a trust. Writ granted.

Dockweiler & Dockweiler & Finch, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

D. Joseph Coyne, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. In this proceeding the petitioners pray for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court from further proceeding in an action begun on November 19, 1926, by Thomas Flynn and Martha C. Flynn, his wife, against the petitioners and certain other defendants designated by fictitious names. By that suit the relief sought was to have certain property declared to be held in trust and the trustees thereof constructive trustees for the plaintiffs in said action, and to secure a decree requiring the reconveyance of said property to the plaintiff Thomas Flynn. On December 27, 1926, Thomas Flynn entered a dismissal of the action; previously, on the same date, counsel for Martha C. Flynn ordered a default of the petitioners herein, and the clerk entered it. Thereafter such steps were taken that Thomas Flynn was served with summons as one of the fictitious defendants, and filed an answer which admitted the truth of the allegations of the complaint, and asked that the relief prayed in the complaint be granted. On April 8, 1927, judgment was entered in favor of Thomas Flynn against the defendants in said action.

The petition in this proceeding alleges all of the above facts, and that the petitioners had no knowledge of any of them which transpired since December 26, 1927; that, after judgment was entered upon the petition of Mary C. Flynn, Thomas Flynn was adjudged incompetent, and the Security Trust & Savings Bank was appointed guardian of his estate; also that on November 7, 1927, M. W. Purcell was appointed guardian ad litem for Thomas Flynn in said suit. It is represented that the superior court is proceeding and threatening to proceed, with the enforcement against the petitioners of said judgment. The court has appointed Robert E. Allen receiver of the real and personal property involved, which petitioners allege is owned by Mary C. Flynn.

However, the judgment purports to quiet the title of Thomas Flynn to said property and to perpetually enjoin petitioners from claiming the same or any interest therein, and declares that petitioners hold said property as trustees for Thomas Flynn and Mary C. Flynn, and commands petitioners to convey the property to Thomas Flynn. It also provides that, should need arise upon application therefor, a receiver be appointed to carry out the judgment. Such an application was made and a receiver was appointed.

[1] It seems to be contended by respondent that the beneficial interest in a trust is community property, and that an action to establish a trust in which two persons, husband and wife, are beneficiaries, is not one affecting community property. We cannot follow this reasoning, and no authorities are cited to uphold this theory. It seems conclusive that, if the property involved is community property, a suit in equity to protect the community title of husband and wife is one affecting the community as much as would be an action for unlawful detainer or for damages, involving the same property. Here, it is recited in the complaint of Thomas Flynn and Martha C. Flynn, and the answer of Thomas Flynn, and is found by the court's findings to be a fact, and is declared in the judgment, that the property in which a trust was asked to be, and was attempted to be, established, was community property of Thomas and Mary C. Flynn. However, in this proceeding we need not decide the question principally argued by counsel as to whether or not a wife who is a party to an action affecting community property has authority to direct the entry of default of a defendant. Even if the wife here had that right, the suit was thereafter dismissed by the husband, Thomas Flynn, and his attorneys of record, under subdivision 1 of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[2-4] An action may be dismissed at any time before its final submission. McDermot v. Grant, 181 Cal. 332, 334, 184 P. 396, and cases there cited, in which it is said:

"A case is submitted after the court, trying the case without a jury, has taken the case under advisement, at the close of the evidence and argument."

This case was not finally submitted until the conclusion of the hearing, which occurred on April 6, 1927, nor could the suit have been finally submitted until evidence was taken, even if the defendants had defaulted and their defaults had been regularly entered, for it was one in equity requiring proof. Of course, the effect of a dismissal, where the answer seeks no affirmative relief, and which is made under the provisions of the Code, as was done in this case, is ipso facto to terminate the case and oust the court of jurisdiction to proceed. Huntington Park Imp. Co. v. Superior Court, 17 Cal. App. 692, 121 P. 701; Hopkins v. Superior Court, 136 Cal. 552, 69 P. 299; Kaufman v. Superior Court, 115 Cal. 152, 46 P. 904.

[5] It follows that, although the court had previously possessed jurisdiction over the persons and the subject-matter of the suit in question, such jurisdiction had been completely lost. Hence the judgment rendered and all other steps taken subsequently to the dismissal of the action are void for want of jurisdiction.

[6] Where the court has lost jurisdiction as a result of a dismissal by the plaintiff and his attorneys, prohibition will be granted to restrain further illegal and unauthorized action about to be taken. Hopkins v. Superior Court, supra.

[7, 8] But it is contended that prohibition issues only to prevent the commission of a future act, and not to undo an act already performed, and that in this instance the receiver appointed by the court has performed all of the acts required of him to carry the judgment into effect, that not only has the judgment itself been rendered, but full compliance has been made with its provisions. If this were the fact, it would be an insuperable objection to the issuance of the writ of prohibition. Valentine v. Police Court, 141 Cal. 615, 75 P. 336. A writ of prohibition will not issue to secure the annulment of proceedings already had.

But the petition asserts that Mary Calista Flynn Smurda is in possession of the property in question. In its return the respondent court nowhere denies this allegation. True, it is said that the receiver has executed a grant deed to Thomas Flynn, and the assignments of the mortgages in conformity with the court's order, and generally that the receiver has performed the duties incumbent upon him to be performed. This falls short of putting in issue the direct statement in the petition above mentioned, which is admitted to be true by lack of denial. There is, then, something to be done, namely, the taking of possession by the receiver of the property, real and personal, which the petition avers that the receiver threatens to do, and will do, unless restrained by this court.

[9] Aside from this warrant for the exercise of jurisdiction by this court, where, as here, a complete record of the case as affecting the points in dispute is presented, and it appears that petitioner is entitled to the remedy afforded by writ of review, that relief will be given, though the petitioner has asked only for prohibition. Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 P. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192; Traffic Truck Sales Co. v. Justice Court, 192 Cal. 377, 220 P. 306; Finn v. Butler, 195 Cal. 759, 235 P. 992.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment dated April 6, 1927, in favor of Thomas Flynn and against petitioners herein, as well as the order appointing a receiver, be, and they are, annulled, and the respondent court and the receiver are prohibited from further proceeding in said action.

THOMPSON, J. This original proceeding in mandamus is brought for the purpose of securing the peremptory writ commanding the respondent, as director of public service of the city of Long Beach, to execute a contract with petitioners for the construction of a sanitary sewer system in certain territory lying partly within the boundaries of the city of Long Beach and partly within the boundaries of the city of Los Angeles. The system proposed is a comprehensive plan for supplying sewer facilities to the inhabitants on either side of the line. On the Los Angeles side it consists of approximately 2,400 feet to be laid on a street crossing the boundary and connecting with approximately 1,300 feet on a street running at right angles to the first-mentioned street, and then connecting on another street running at right angles with the last-mentioned street for a distance of approximately 2,800 feet, and there connecting with 2,620 feet of sewer already constructed. All of these streets cross the boundary, but the proposed system itself crosses only on the street first mentioned. On the Long Beach side of the invisible line, the system runs along the line of the street first mentioned which crosses the boundary for a distance of some 400 or 500 feet, then along a right of way, and connects with several thousand feet of laterals and branches in that city.

It appears from the petition and return that all of the preliminary steps, including a consent to the proceedings by the council of the city of Los Angeles, were taken as required by the provisions of the act which has been termed the City Boundary Line Act (Deering, Gen. Laws, 1923, p. 3376, and Deering, Cons. Supp. 1925–1927, p. 1995), up to the point where the city council of the city of Long Beach awarded the contract to the petitioners, and they had complied with everything to be done by them prior to the signing of the contract by the respondent. When the contract properly executed by petitioners was tendered to the respondent, together with the necesary bonds, he declined to sign. In order to understand the objection raised by the respondent to the contract, it is necessary to call attention to the further fact that the only street affected which extends across the exterior boundary of the two municipalities is one which it is proposed shall carry the main trunk line of the sewer system, and that by far the greater portion of the system lies within the boundaries of the city of Long Beach.

The respondent asserts that the Boundary Line Act was never intended to cover the improvement of streets or the construction therein of sewers other than those forming or extending across the exterior boundaries. He points to the title and to sections 1, 2, and 36 of the act, and argues that they indicate a legislative intent to so limit the authority of the municipality exercising jurisdiction. That portion of the title which would seem to bear such construction reads:

> "An act to provide for the establishment and change of grade of public streets, avenues, lanes, alleys, courts, places and rights of way, forming the exterior boundaries of any municipality, whether partly or wholly within or without said boundaries, or extending into the territory of two or more municipalities, or extending into the territory of one or more municipalities, and unincorporated territory, and providing for work upon and the improvement thereof, and providing for the construction of sanitary and storm sewers, drains and drainage systems, together with any and all appurtenances and appurtenant work in connection with any of such work or improvements. * * *"

Section 1, which declares that certain streets, alleys, and rights of way shall be deemed and held to be open public streets, uses the exact phraseology of the title, except that there is inserted the words "or crossing" after the word "forming," so that it reads, "forming or crossing the exterior boundaries," Section 36 reads:

> "The provisions of this act shall apply to and authorize the improvement of any street or right of way extending along the boundary line between two municipalities * * * or extending from or through one or more municipalities into or through unincorporated territory. * * *"

Section 2, as amended in 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 1414), is set forth in full as follows:

> "Whenever the public interest and convenience may require, and whenever the city council or other legislative body of each of the municipalities and the board of supervisors of the county, having jurisdiction over any portion of the territory proposed to be included in an assessment district to be formed under this act, shall by resolution consent to the formation of such assessment district and the commencement of a proceeding under this act for the construction of any public work or improvement, the city council of any municipality and the board of supervisors of the county in which said municipality is situated, are hereby severally authorized and empowered to establish, change or modify the grade of, and to order the whole or any portion or portions either in length or width, of any one or more of the streets, avenues, lanes, alleys, courts, places or rights of way forming or crossing the exterior boundary or boundaries of any municipality or municipalities of this state, whether partly or wholly within or without said boundaries, or extending into or through the territory of two or more municipalities or extending into or through the territory of one or more municipalities and unincorporated territory, graded or regraded to the existing or proposed official grade, paved or repaved, macadamized or remacadamized, graveled or regraveled, oiled or reoiled, and to order the construction, reconstruction or repair therein of sidewalks, culverts, bridges, gutters and curbs; and to order the construction, reconstruction or repair therein or in any property or right of way owned by any such municipality or county, of sanitary sewers, storm sewers, drains and drainage systems, ditches and conduits of any kind or character, for sanitary or drainage purposes, and all structures, plants and appurtenances and appurtenant work of any kind or character necessary or convenient in connection therewith; and to order the construction, reconstruction or repair therein or in any property or right of way owned by such municipality or county, or wells, pumps, drains, reservoirs, storage tanks, channels, tunnels, pipes, hydrants, meters or other appurtenances for supplying or distributing a domestic water supply; and to order any other work to be done which shall be deemed necessary to improve the whole or any portion of such streets, avenues, lanes, alleys, courts, places or rights of way. The council or board of supervisors may include any of the different kinds of work mentioned in this section, and may include such work on any number of streets, avenues, lanes, alleys, courts, places or rights of way, or any portions thereof, whether contiguous or directly connected, or otherwise. in one proceeding, or one contract, or both and may except therefrom any of said work already done to the official grade and which may be in good condition and repair."

It is worthy of note that the words, "and to order the construction, reconstruction or repair therein or in any property or right of way owned by such municipality or county, of wells, pumps, drains, reservoirs, storage tanks, channels, tunnels, pipes, hydrants, meters or other appurtenances for supplying or distributing a domestic water supply," were added by the amendment of 1927. It is also to be observed that the Legislature at its last session, with the evident purpose of making the act more available and workable and to conform to the procedure extensively employed by municipalities in improvement work, adopted verbatim, by way of amendment, those portions of the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (Deering, Gen. Laws, 1923, p. 3328) largely containing the procedure to be followed.

So far as we have been able to discern, the only case which has passed upon the legislative intent of the act under consideration is that of Gadd v. McGuire, 69 Cal. App. 347, 231 P. 754, wherein it was said:

"The conditions which the City Boundary Line Act is designed to remedy extend beyond the boundaries of any one municipality. Where the evil to be remedied reaches beyond the boundaries and jurisdiction of any one municipality—whether such extra-municipal ill be due to an unimproved roadway extending into one or more other municipalities, or to unsanitary conditions due to the lack of a suitable regional sanitary sewer system, or to a widespread overflow of rain waters—a proceeding to correct the evil by a single comprehensive scheme of improvement on lands in an improvement district which embraces a portion of all of the municipalities affected by the evil conditions is, as we have shown, more than a mere municipal affair."

And again the court, after speaking of the advantages to accrue by having a city street and connecting highway in connecting contiguous unincorporated territory improved in one comprehensive scheme, and a like community of interest which the inhabitants of two or more municipalities or of a municipality and unincorporated territory may have in the construction of a storm sewer system by a similarly inclusive plan of improvement, says:

"In the same way we can readily imagine a case where it would be equally vital that there should be a common sanitary sewer system, serving the lands on either side of the invisible boundary line. If the city should construct a sanitary sewer system and none should be constructed in the thickly settled community occupying the contiguous unincorporated territory, it is more than likely that there would be unsanitary conditions, threatening the health and welfare of the near-by city dwellers as well as those living just outside of the city, in spite of the city's enterprise."

[1-3] A portion of the language of section 2 of the act so perfectly coincides with the part of the opinion just quoted that we feel the necessity of repeating it for the sake of calling attention directly to it. It reads:

"The council or board of supervisors may include any of the different kinds of work mentioned in this section, and may include such work on any number of streets, avenues, lanes, alleys, courts, places or rights of way, or any portions thereof, whether contiguous or directly connected, or otherwise in one proceeding, or one contract, or both, and may except therefrom any of said work already done to the official grade and which may be in good condition and repair."

[4, 5] It would seem that this grant of power would be ample in its scope to permit the construction of a sanitary sewer system extending beyond the boundaries of the municipality, and not necessarily confined to streets forming or crossing the exterior boundaries. It is argued, however, that this language is limited by the title, section 1 and section 36, which we have already quoted. The title must be read not as a limitation upon the authority conferred or as sufficiently defining the power to be given by the act, but as a reference to or skeleton of that which will be found in its body. It will be noted, of course, that the title includes reference to sanitary sewer systems "together with any and all appurtenances and appurtenant work" in connection therewith. It would be most illogical to say that a sanitary sewer system could consist of a main trunk line without laterals or branches. It is a familiar rule that the constitutional provision requiring the subject of an act to be expressed in its title must be liberally construed, for which we only need to cite Estate of Wellings, 192 Cal. 506, 221 P. 628. It is also established that, where the title is sufficient to suggest to the mind the field of legislation to be occupied, the title will not be construed to restrict the act in its operation. People v. Jordan, 172 Cal. 391, 156 P. 451; Hunt v. Manning, 24 Cal. App. 44, 140 P. 39. We think the reference in the title to sewer systems and appurtenant work is ample reference to authorize the subsequent language of the act and the obvious purpose of the Legislature. Neither can section 1 be considered as limiting the authority conferred in section 2, but rather as a declaration on the part of the Legislature that the streets, avenues, lanes, etc., therein mentioned are public streets and that the improvements anticipated in the section are for the public weal. It is apparent, from the wording of section 36 of the act and from the fact that no mention is made therein of the construction of sanitary or storm sewers or drainage systems, or of sidewalks or culverts or waterworks, or the establishment or change of grade, that it was not intended to limit the powers of the body acquiring jurisdiction, but rather to make it clear beyond controversy that the improvement of the streets was authorized, as well as the establishment of or change of grade. It cannot be seriously doubted that such was the legislative intent to which we should give effect. To say that section 36 had the effect of limiting the authority conferred by section 2 would be to say that the municipalities would have no authority under the act (excluding for the moment the provisions of section 19) to install a sanitary sewer system even when laid below the surface of streets forming or crossing the exterior boundaries, for the very patent reason that the installation of a sewer system is not an improvement of the streets. And yet it cannot be successfully argued that the Legislature was less desirous of protecting the health of its citizens from unsanitary conditions than of providing improved streets for its motorists. That it was the intent of the Legislature to provide for the construction of regional sewer systems is further evident from the provisions of section 19 of the act, which reads as follows:

> "The council, or board, shall have full power and authority to construct sewers, gutters, and manholes and provide for the cleaning of the same, and culverts or cesspools, or crosswalks or sidewalks, or any portion of any sidewalk upon or in any of such streets, avenues, lanes, alleys, courts or places, and also for drainage purposes over or through any right of way obtained or granted for such purposes, with necessary and proper outlet or outlets to the same, of such materials, in such a manner, and upon such terms as it may be deemed proper."

It will be noted that this language is quite comprehensive when it uses the expression, "over or through any right of way obtained or granted for such purposes," and is in keeping with the portion of section 2 which we have already emphasized.

As has already been suggested, it would be manifestly unfair to the citizens of a municipality as well as the citizens of adjoining territory to subject them to the contamination of unsanitary conditions of adjoining territory by reason of lack of authority to comprehend a logical district in one proceeding. We can assume that there will be nothing unjust or unfair to the inhabitants without the limits of the city acquiring jurisdiction in the scope of the work to be done, by reason of the safeguard against such contingency found in the provision that proceedings thereunder are subject to the limitation that the legislative body having jurisdiction over the territory outside the municipality shall consent to the proceedings. There is nothing in this proceeding which would indicate that the district was not properly laid out as one comprehensive plan for the benefit of all of the inhabitants of the district, whether within the city of Long Beach or within the city of Los Angeles. The return indicates no other reason than the one discussed for the refusal to sign the contract.

The peremptory writ will issue.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF LINDSAY v. GARNER et al. (Civ. 3452.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 20, 1928.

1. Chattel mortgages ⚷157(2)—Evidence held to support finding that real estate mortgagee's advancement to crop mortgagee was direct loan on issue whether real estate mortgage lien was subsequent to that of crop mortgage.

In suit to foreclose mortgage on realty, evidence held sufficient to support court's finding that amount advanced to crop mortgagee by plaintiff and used in caring for crops was direct loan, and not made for purpose of caring for plaintiff's security on issue whether lien of real estate mortgage was subsequent to that of crop mortgage.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Trial court's finding, sustained by evidence, will not be reversed.

Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence will not be reversed, where there is evidence to sustain it.

3. Chattel mortgages ⚷138(2)—Citrus fruit mortgage held prior to earlier real estate mortgage (Civ. Code, § 2955 [St. 1893, p. 84; St. 1909, p. 34]).

Subsequent mortgage, given on all citrus fruit grown on mortgaged lands as authorized by Civ. Code, § 2955 (St. 1893, p. 84, and St. 1909, p. 34), held prior to real estate mortgage, decree for foreclosure of which should have provided that sale thereunder should be subject to crop mortgagee's right to take and hold all such crops at any time before expiration of redemption period.

4. Appeal and error ⚷1152—Error in conclusion that crop mortgage was subsequent to real estate mortgage held correctible without further proceedings below (Civ. Code, § 2955; Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, as added by St. 1927, p. 583; Const. art. 6, § 4¾).

Error in trial court's finding and conclusion that mortgage on citrus fruit, under Civ. Code, § 2955, was subsequent to real estate mortgage, and foreclosure decree not providing that sale of mortgaged lands thereunder should be subject to mortgagee's right to take crops at any time before expiration of redemption period held correctible, without further proceedings in trial court, by order of appellate court, under Const. art. 6, § 4¾, and Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, as added by St. 1927, p. 583.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Lindsay against J. C. Garner, the Native Son Orchards Company, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant corporation appeals. Modified, and affirmed as modified.

C. W. Braswell, of Long Beach, for appellant.

Avery J. Howe and Howe & McBride, all of Lindsay, for respondent.

BARTLETT, Justice pro tem. This action was instituted to foreclose a mortgage on certain real property in Tulare county, Cal., executed by defendants James C. Garner and S. J. C. Garner his wife, on October 13, 1921, securing payment of a promissory note for $8,000, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, the note being payable on demand, and if no demand be made, then on January 1, 1924. The complaint was filed on October 13, 1925. The mortgage was recorded on October 17, 1921. The note and mortgage provided for the allowance of reasonable attorneys' fee in the event of the institution of foreclosure proceedings. The particular description of the properties mortgaged was followed by the clause, "together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues and profits thereof."

The defendants Garner and wife defaulted, and judgment was entered against them. The mortgaged property was an orange orchard of navel and Valencia orange trees, producing crops of oranges therefrom, requiring during the spring and summer months intensive care, proper plowing, pruning, spraying, and artificial irrigation. Defendant Native Son Orchards Company is a packing corporation engaged in the business of packing oranges at Lindsay in Tulare county. During the four years prior to the trial of this action on November 24, 1925, this corporation had advanced the Garners certain sums of money for the purpose of caring for the citrus trees upon the mortgaged premises, and on February 18, 1924, the Garners executed unto the Native Son Orchards Company a crop mortgage on all citrus fruit then growing on or to be grown on the mortgaged lands during the year 1924 and during each and every year thereafter until the indebtedness secured by the crop mortgage was paid; the items of indebtedness, for which the crop mortgage was made security being a promissory note of J. C. Garner to the Native Son Orchards Company for $1,420, dated February 13, 1924, payable December 15 after date, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, a reasonable attorneys' fee if suit was instituted to collect the note, and such other moneys as might be thereafter loaned or advanced to the Garners by the Native Son Orchards Company during the continuance of the mortgage, not to exceed in all the sum of $1,500 exclusive of the sum mentioned in the note of $1,420.

Plaintiff alleged that the Native Son Orchards Company has or claims to have some interest or claim on the mortgaged premises, which claim it is alleged is subsequent and secondary to the lien of the plaintiff's mortgage. By its answer the Native Son Orchards Company admits that it has and claims an interest in the mortgaged premises, by reason of the crop mortgage from the Garners of February 13, 1924, hereinbefore mentioned; denies that this crop mortgage is subsequent to plaintiff's mortgage; alleges that it had, for the purpose of caring for the citrus trees upon the mortgaged premises, advanced to the Garners approximately $2,372.43, that the Garners were partially insolvent and unable to care for the premises and the orange trees growing thereon, that the mortgaged property was located in an arid district, was dependent upon artificial irrigation, that without proper irrigation and other care the orange trees would have become totally worthless and of no value, that prior to the advancement of moneys to the Garners plaintiff agreed through its agent, one S. A. Warson, that the advancements made by the Native Son Orchards Company were for the protection of the security held by plaintiff, and that the same should constitute a prior lien as against that of plaintiff's mortgage; and, as relief in the action, the Native Son Orchards Company demanded that the crop mortgage be declared by the decree of the court to be paramount and prior to plaintiff's mortgage and for its costs.

The trial court found that the moneys advanced by the Native Son Orchards Company were not advanced under any understanding or agreement on the part of plaintiff that they were for the protection of plaintiff's security or that they would constitute a prior lien to that of plaintiff's mortgage, and found that the crop mortgage was and is subsequent in effect and time to the real property mortgage of plaintiff.

The usual decree of foreclosure of mortgage was thereupon made and entered on January 19, 1926, and under this a sale of the premises described in plaintiff's mortgage was made on February 23, 1926, by the commissioner appointed to make the sale, at which sale plaintiff purchased the properties described in its mortgage for the sum of $10,069.72, which amount covered and satisfied the judgment and all costs and left no deficiency.

It appears from the transcript on appeal that on the day the action was tried it was stipulated that a receiver of the properties be appointed and that one Chester Dowell was so appointed, the order of appointment being set forth in the transcript, specifying, as to his powers and duties, as follows:

> "Now, therefore, it is ordered that Chester Dowell be, and he is hereby, appointed the receiver of and for the plaintiff under the order of the court to take, care for, irrigate, cultivate, spray or fumigate said property, to take the rents, issues, and profits therefrom. That he shall take possession of said property described in said complaint and properly mature and raise any crops that may be raised or growing upon said trees on said property or that may hereafter grow thereon, market the same, and generally do and perform all acts that may be ordered and sanctioned by the court or by law, and retain any funds until further order of the court."

No question is raised or presented on this appeal concerning the appointment of the receiver or any action on his part that he may have taken by and through his appointment.

Defendant Native Son Orchards Company appeals from the judgment in the action and the whole thereof on a bill of exceptions. Appellant urges a reversal of the judgment on the grounds: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding that the sum of $1,100 which had been advanced to appellant by plaintiff and used in caring for the crops of citrus fruits growing on the mortgaged lands during 1925 was a direct loan to the Native Son Orchards Company and not made for the purpose of caring for plaintiff's security; (2) failure of the court to find the extent of the interest of Native Son Orchards Company in the crop of oranges on the trees on the mortgaged premises at the time of the trial of the action; (3) failure of the court to find the extent of the interest of the Native Son Orchards Company in the crop of oranges to be gathered during the redemption period; (4) error in adjudging that the Native Son Orchards Company be foreclosed of all right, title, or interest in and to the mortgaged premises; (5) error in not adjudging that the Native Son Orchards Company was entitled to the crops matured and unharvested on the mortgaged premises at the time of the entry of judgment and would be also entitled to such crops as would mature during the period of redemption.

[1] In support of its claim that the moneys advanced by respondent during the summer of 1925 was not a direct loan to appellant, reliance is placed upon a letter of appellant to respondent which reads as follows:

> "Native Son Orchards Co.
> "R. O. MacDonald, Manager.
> "Lindsay, California, June 29th, 1925.
> "First National Bank, Lindsay, California—Gentlemen: It is understood that during the summer you will advance us approximately $1,100 for purposes of financing the J. C. Garner place during the year. It is understood and agreed that we will advance this money to Mr. Garner under our crop mortgage, and that it will be repaid out of the first money realized on the crop after picking and hauling expenses are paid, and before any money is retained by us under the crop mortgage.
> "Your truly,
> "Native Son Orchards Co.,
> "By R. O. MacDonald."

There is nothing in the foregoing letter that implies there was any understanding that moneys advanced were to be considered as secured by the respondent's mortgage. It states that appellant will advance the money to Garner under its crop mortgage, and that, outside of packing and hauling charges, the proceeds realized from the crop shall be devoted to repaying the money advanced. In effect it made moneys realized from the crops payable to respondent as a charge on the crops prior to appellant having any claim on crop proceeds other than packing and hauling expenses. The conclusion of the trial court that the advances were direct loans to appellant finds ample support in the evidence. The manager of appellant, MacDonald, testified there was no agreement between the bank and appellant that the crop mortgage would be prior in effect to the bank mortgage. His testimony in this regard is as follows:

> "Q. Did Mr. Warson or any other official of the bank tell you they would waive their real estate mortgage in favor of your crop mortgage? A. No.
> "Q. Then you have never had any undertaking or agreement to the effect that the advancements made would be a prior lien as against the First National Bank Mortgage with Mr. Warson? A. I wouldn't say that was the understanding at all."

This shows there was neither a direct nor an implied undertaking that the real estate mortgage was to be considered a subsequent lien to the crop mortgage of appellant. The following question was asked MacDonald regarding the $1,050 note which appellant executed to respondent for the money advanced:

> "I suppose the $1,050 note must be paid regardless of the crop that is coming in? A. When they are due I will go in and pay them."

[2] The question of whether the moneys advanced were a direct loan or not was a question of fact resolved by the trial court in respondent's favor, and the evidence, if there be any conflict, will not permit a reversal, where there is evidence to sustain the finding. Estate of Jepson, 178 Cal. 257, 172 P. 1107; Hitchcock v. Rooney, 171 Cal. 285, 152 P. 913; McKean v. Alliance Land Co., 200 Cal. 396, 253 P. 134; Dam v. Bond (Cal. App.) 251 P. 818.

[3] The questions for solution on this appeal, presented by the second, third, fourth, and fifth specifications of error above set forth, involve matters of grave importance to the fruit-growing industries of the state of California. By its answer in this action the defendant Native Son Orchards Company asks that a subsequent crop mortgage be declared prior and paramount in effect to a prior mortgage on the lands and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, duly executed and recorded before the execution of the crop mortgage on the citrus crops growing and to be grown on the mortgaged land. Whether or not the foreclosure decree should so declare must be determined through a construction of the provisions of section 2955 of the Civil Code, reading as follows:

> "Mortgages may be made upon all growing crops, including grapes and fruit, and upon any and all kinds of personal property, except the following: 1. Personal property not capable of manual delivery; 2. Articles of wearing apparel and personal adornment; 3. The stock in trade of a merchant."

This statute was enacted in 1909 as it now stands. Stats. of Cal. 1909, p. 34. The clause, "mortgages may be made upon all growing crops, including grapes and fruit," was first enacted into section 2955 of the Civil Code in 1893 (Stats. of Cal 1893, p. 84). Prior to that the section had provided that mortgages may be made upon "growing crops." The purpose and intent of enacting the section in its present form was fully discussed by the Supreme Court of California in the case of Simpson v. Ferguson, 112 Cal. 180, 40 P. 104, 44 P. 484, 53 Am. St. Rep. 201, decided by the court in bank on March 28, 1896.

The facts in that case are very similar to those in the one at bar. Plaintiff sought to foreclose three promissory notes bearing date October 1, 1891, executed to him by the defendant Shaw, secured by a mortgage on orange lands in Riverside county. Following the particular description of the mortgaged lands was the clause:

> "Together, with all and singular, the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof."

Defendant Ferguson held a record mortgage on the same property executed by defendant Shaw, and also held a chattel mortgage executed to him by said Shaw on June 17, 1893, upon the crop of oranges then growing, or to be produced during the season of 1893 and 1894, upon the trees upon the mortgaged lands described in plaintiff's mortgage. A judgment of foreclosure was awarded plaintiff, directing that the mortgaged lands be sold and the proceeds applied in paying the amount due plaintiff, and directing that, if any such surplus remained, defendant Ferguson should be paid the amount found due him. Ferguson moved the trial court to amend its judgment so as to provide that the growing crop of oranges be sold separately and their proceeds applied upon the judgment in his favor. The trial court denied the motion, and Ferguson appealed from the judgment. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment and directed a modification directing a sale of the mortgaged property in accord with Ferguson's request. The decision as first rendered was by the court in department. A petition to have the case heard in bank was granted, and several eminent counsel appeared as amici curiæ, and the matters involved received a close and careful consideration and discussion; the court in bank finally adopting the conclusion arrived at in department. The court says:

> "It is urged that sections 2955 and following of the Civil Code, providing for the manner of mortgaging growing crops, do not establish an exclusive method; that, as this class of prop> erty may, under some conditions, be regarded as realty, and under other conditions as personalty, it must follow that under corresponding conditions the property may be the subject of a real estate mortgage or a chattel mortgage, according to the circumstances; and that plaintiff having a valid mortgage upon the land, with its rents, issues, and profits, this gives him a valid lien upon the growing crops, as effectually, to the same extent for all purposes, as if executed with the formalities required in the case of a crop mortgage. We are unable to coincide in this view.

> "In the first place, we think it quite manifest from the provisions of the code in question that the Legislature intended thereby to provide an exclusive mode for the mortgaging of growing crops, and intended to declare that for such purpose this species of property shall be regarded as chattels. There is nothing in the statute to indicate that it was not intended to cover every case of a mortgage given upon that class of property. In the second place, while it is perfectly true that growing crops may be either personal or real property, according to circumstances, and while, as suggested by respondent, a mortgage of the land gives a lien upon everything that would pass by a grant of the land, which includes crops growing thereon, it is, nevertheless, well established that such lien, so far as the growing crops are concerned, is limited in its effect to the crops growing upon and unsevered from the land at the time of foreclosure. It does not vest the mortgagee with a right to the crops grown intermediate the giving of the mortgage and the foreclosure thereof. Until the latter event, where, as in this state, the mortgage creates no estate in the mortgagee, but confers only a lien upon the property, the mortgagor is entitled to such crops, with the same absolute right and dominion over them as if the mortgage did not exist. This doctrine is thoroughly well settled, with no considerable diversity upon the subject among text-writers or the courts."

Since its rendition, this decision has been adhered to and approved in a number of cases of similar nature.

In Scott v. Hotchkiss, 115 Cal. 89, 47 P. 45, an action to foreclose a mortgage, a receiver was appointed under a clause in the mortgage authorizing such appointment. The mortgagor sold the property after executing the mortgage to one Fountain. Prior to this he had leased the property to one Millard. The mortgage was executed in 1891. Millard entered under his lease in 1892. The foreclosure action was begun in February, 1895. The court found that when the receiver was appointed a crop of wheat and hay was growing on the premises, 60 acres of summer fallow, 20 acres of winter-sown, and about 100 acres of volunteer; that Millard put in these crops, except the 20 acres of winter-sown, prior to December 1, 1894; that he furnished the seed, labor, and teams used in putting in the crops; that the customary rental for lands such as the mortgaged premises was one-fourth of the hay and grain grown on the premises, the other three-fourths being retained by the tenant as compensation for the labor, seed, use of teams, and other machinery used in producing the crop and the costs of harvesting, sacking threshing, baling, and piling the whole crop. The defendant Fountain claimed the entire crop, and Millard claimed three-fourths of the crop. The claim of Millard for three-fourths of the crop was sustained. The court says:

> "The general subject here under consideration was discussed in the late case of Simpson v. Ferguson, 112 Cal. 180 [40 P. 104, 44 P. 484, 53 Am. St. Rep. 201]. It was there held that growing crops could be mortgaged only as provided in section 2955 et seq., of the Civil Code. They are therefore not covered by an ordinary real estate mortgage. While growing they are real estate, and are included in the mortgage. But if the mortgagor is in possession, he is entitled to the rents and profits, and to the crops if harvested before foreclosure and the transfer of title thereby to a purchaser."

The court cites with approval a similar doctrine announced in Sexton v. Breese, 135 N. Y. 387, 32 N. E. 133, and West v. Conant, 100 Cal. 231, 34 P. 705, and Freeman v. Campbell, 109 Cal. 360, 42 P. 35.

Adherence to the conclusions adopted in the Simpson v. Ferguson Case is announced in the subsequent cases of Bank of Woodland v. Heron, 120 Cal. 614, 52 P. 1006; Modesto Bank v. Owens, 121 Cal. 223, 53 P. 552; Locke v. Klunker, 123 Cal. 231, 55 P. 993; Cowdrey v. London, etc., Bank, 139 Cal. 298, 73 P. 196, 96 Am. St. Rep. 115; and Mau, Sadler & Co. v. Kearney, 143 Cal. 506, 77 P. 411. These cases may be said to have established a rule of property concerning mortgages on growing crops in this state which clearly supports the claim of appellant that the trial court erred in finding, in its finding No. 9, "which crop mortgage was and is subsequent in effect and time to the real property mortgage of plaintiff," and, in its conclusion of law No. 4, "that the crop mortgage of the Native Son Orchards Company is subsequent in time and effect to the real property mortgage of plaintiff," and in not providing in the decree of foreclosure entered in this case that the sale thereunder of the mortgaged lands should be subject to the right of the Native Son Orchards Company, at any time prior to the expiration of redemption, to take and hold all the crops of citrus fruits growing and maturing on said lands.

[4] The record on appeal in this case shows a situation where the errors complained of can be corrected by an order of the appellate court made in pursuance to the powers given by section 4¾ of article 6 of the Constitution and section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure (St. 1927, p. 583), without further proceedings in the trial court.

It is ordered that the following portion of finding No. 9 of the trial court, to wit, "Which crop mortgage was and is subsequent in effect and time to the real property mortgage of plaintiff," be stricken out and that there be substituted therefor the following: "Which crop mortgage was and is prior in effect to the real property mortgage of plaintiff to the extent of the crops of citrus fruits growing and maturing upon the mortgaged premises up to the time of the expiration of the period of redemption from sale under the order of foreclosure;" that conclusion of law No. 4 of the trial court, "that the crop mortgage of the Native Son Orchards Company is subsequent in time and effect to the real property mortgage of plaintiff," be stricken out, and that there be substituted therefor the following: "That the crop mortgage of the Native Son Orchards Company was and is prior in effect to the real property mortgage of plaintiff to the extent of the citrus crops growing and maturing upon the mortgaged premises up to the time of the expiration of the period of redemption from sale under the order of foreclosure;" and that the judgment appealed from be and the same is hereby modified by adding thereto the following: That the crop mortgage of the Native Son Orchards Company is a lien prior in effect to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage upon any and all crops of citrus fruits growing and maturing on the mortgaged premises up to the time of the expiration of the period of redemption from sale under order of foreclosure—and, as so modified, the judgment will stand affirmed, appellant to recover its costs of appeal.

FISKE v. NIAGARA FIRE INS. CO. OF NEW YORK. (Civ. 4925.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 16, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court June 14, 1928.

1. Insurance 🔑146(1)—Question of intent held determining factor in proper construction of insurance contract.

Question of intent of parties in contract of insurance insuring against theft, robbery, and pilferage held determining factor in arriving at proper construction of contract.

2. Insurance 🔑425—Policy against "theft," robbery, and pilferage of automobile held not to cover larceny by conditional buyer, one of parties insured, by trick or device of worthless check.

Parties to insurance contract held, in view of Pen. Code, § 490a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1047, § 7, not to have intended by insurance against theft, robbery, and pilferage of automobile to include in contract insurance against larceny by trick and device such as worthless check, of conditional buyer, one of the parties insured; "theft," in its ordinary acceptation as distinguished from its legal definition, meaning the secret, furtive act of feloniously appropriating to one's own use the property of another under cover of darkness or some scheme designed to escape detection.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Theft.]

3. Insurance 🔑146(3)—Doctrine that policy susceptible of two constructions will be construed favorably to insured will not be applied to misinterpret parties' intention.

While the Supreme Court recognizes the rule that, where provisions of an insurance policy are reasonably susceptible of two constructions consistent with the object of the obligation, one of them favorable to assurer and the other to assured, that the one favorable to assured will be adopted, yet it will not extend this doctrine to the point where it does violence to the English language or fails properly to interpret the minds of the parties.

Stephens, Justice pro tem., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by Willard O. Fiske against the Niagara Fire Insurance Company of New York, a corporation. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed.

David R. Faries, John R. Berryman, Jr., and Edwin Heizman, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

David D. Stuart, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover on a contract of insurance, insuring against "theft, robbery, and pilferage." The defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The lower court overruled the demurrer, giving the defendant ten days to answer. No answer having been filed within the time given, judgment was entered in the sum prayed for, and the defendant prosecutes this appeal therefrom on the judgment roll. While counsel for the parties litigant say the sole question to be decided in this case is whether larceny by trick and device is insured against, we feel that we cannot be so limited to a purely academic discussion of an abstruse problem, but rather must look to the complaint to determine in what manner, if at all, the theft is alleged.

We find that on February 21, 1923, the plaintiff and one Spainhower entered into a conditional contract of sale, by the terms of which plaintiff agreed to sell an automobile to Spainhower for $400, payable "$140 upon the execution" of the contract, and the balance at the rate of $30 per month. Subsequent to the execution of the contract, which was also subsequent to the delivery of the check for $140, but prior to the delivery of the automobile, the insurance policy was issued by the appellant insuring the plaintiff and Spainhower "jointly and severally" against loss occurring by reason of "theft, robbery, or pilferage." Payment of the check of $140 was never made, for the reason that Spainhower had no account with the bank upon which it was drawn. Spainhower departed with the automobile for "parts unknown," and neither he nor the automobile has ever been located.

We think the sole question in the case is reasonably stated by counsel, but perhaps the opinion may subsequently be cited with more assurance of its proper application if we reframe it to read: The sole question to be solved is whether it was the intent of the parties to the insurance policy by using the words "theft, robbery, and pilferage" to insure against a larceny by trick and device, by one of the parties named as a beneficiary under it, the trick and device having been made use of prior to the issuance of the policy. In other words, we are to inquire: What did the parties contemplate when they used the term "theft," under all the circumstances surrounding the making of the contract? Prior to the legislative session of 1927 we had no criminal offense in California designated by the word "theft." Some states, however, had previously given to the word "theft," as we now have done, a statutory meaning quite different from that sense in which it is popularly employed. We need not go farther afield than our own state to illustrate this thought. Prior to the passage of the statute shortly referred to there had been a consistent distinction marking the offenses of larceny and embezzlement. Last year the Legislature passed an act (section 490a, Penal Code [St. 1927, p. 1047, § 7]) which reads:

> "Wherever any law or statute of this state refers to or mentions larceny, embezzlement, or stealing, said law or statute shall hereafter be read and interpreted as if the word 'theft' were substituted therefor."

We might ask the question, was the word in the policy at the time it was used intended to be as comprehensive as the definition now given to it by statute? It is intimated in Hartford Fire Insurance Co. v. Wimbish, 12 Ga. App. 712, 78 S. E. 265, and Michigan Commercial Insurance Co. of Lansing v. Wills, 57 Ind. App. 256, 106 N. E. 725, that the words "theft, robbery, and pilferage" have the same meaning when used in an insurance policy as in a prosecution for such offenses. If in this instance the word "theft" at the time it was employed by the parties here was not intended to include embezzlement, then by which particular statutory or legal definition thereunder, if any at all, should it be governed? These questions are asked for the purpose of emphasizing the thought that, at least in the absence of a statutory definition in this state, the words would more faithfully depict the minds of the parties if they receive that meaning popularly and customarily attributed to them by laymen. A most interesting and illuminating case upon this subject is Anderson v. Hartford Accident Co., 77 Cal. App. 641, 247 P. 507, where it was said that the term "highway robbery" should be interpreted according to the customary meaning it had acquired by "its consistent use throughout the English speaking world."

[1] That the question of intent is the determining factor in arriving at the proper construction of the contract before us is evident from the following authorities upon the subject:

Buxton v. International Indemnity Co., 47 Cal. App. 583, 191 P. 84, involved the construction to be placed upon a policy as altered by a letter written by the insurer to the insured prior to the issuance of the particular policy, reading as follows:

> " 'I wish to advise you that the International Indemnity Company will from this date extend policies on all cars in which you may have an equity to cover any claims arising under the following conditions: * * * (3) If the conditional buyer of an automobile or any member of his immediate family should steal any automobile insured under our policies and thereby commit a felony, upon warrant being secured for the arrest of such party or parties, the company hereby agrees that your equity in any automobile insured by this company will be fully protected.' "

After holding that the letter and the policy constituted one contract, the court quite properly held that it was the intent of the parties to the contract of insurance thus made to insure against embezzlement of the automobile by the conditional purchaser in contravention of section 504a of the Penal Code. While it is too well settled to require citation of authority that the decision can only be read as settling the law applicable to the facts then before the court, it is important here to note that the intention of the parties was the governing factor in the determination of the case. In arriving at this intention, the court made use of dictum that the policy without the letter would cover "theft by one having a conditional contract of purchase, * * * if we concede the possibility of such an offense." The court also says:

> "It is difficult to imagine how he" (the conditional purchaser) "could commit larceny in connection therewith, for this offense involves unlawfulness in taking possession. Appellant enlightens us upon this point by arguing that, if the contract of purchase was entered into for the purpose of stealing the car, then the original possession would be unlawful and the act would be larceny. It seems unlikely that the plaintiff desired insurance against a situation such as this. The necessary elements of such an offense to bring it within the terms of such a policy would be most difficult of proof."

We have italicized that portion of the quotation which seems to have an important bearing upon the proper construction to be put upon the terms of the policy here in question, and in arriving at the intent of the parties when the policy was issued, insuring the plaintiff and the conditional purchaser jointly and severally against loss.

The case of Delafield v. London & Lancashire Fire Ins. Co., 177 App. Div. 477, 164 N. Y. S. 221, also approaches the problem from the standpoint of the intent with which the word "theft" was employed in the policy. It says:

> "While this policy insures against 'theft,' it seems clear that it was not the intention of the parties to the contract of insurance to insure against larceny by trick and devise; that is, theft, the commission of which involves, as an essential element, the deception of the insured, resulting in a surrender of the possession of his property. The term 'theft,' as used in this policy, does not include all forms of larceny recognized by law. It does not include a larceny perpetrated, as this was, under the form and guise of a business transaction conducted by the insured himself."

We also draw some light from Stuht v. Maryland Motor Car Ins. Co., 90 Wash. 576, 156 P. 557, where the court was again considering the exact words of this policy. It is there said:

> "The words 'theft,' 'robbery,' and 'pilferage' are well understood. They were used in this policy in their common and ordinary meaning."

Reference may properly be had to two very interesting and instructive cases involving marine insurance contracts where the word "thieves" was under consideration, which cases go a long way toward demonstrating that the common or ordinary meaning of the word is to govern the construction of the instrument. In the first case, Atlantic Ins. Co. v. Storrow & Boyd, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 285, the policy contained a provision insuring against loss by "thieves," and the question was whether the policy was intended to cover a loss by "simple larceny (furtum)" or only one "perpetrated by open violence, denominated latrocinium by the civil law." It was determined that the policy was not limited to losses from assailing thieves, but also covered a loss occasioned by larceny unaccompanied by violence. This was contrary to the view entertained by the English and Continental text-writers and also contrary to the statement found in Kent's Commentaries (14th Ed.) 303, as follows:

> "The theft that is insured against by name, means that which is accompanied by violence (latrocinium) and not simple theft; furtum non est casus fortuitus."

In commenting upon the decision in Atlantic Ins. Co. v. Storrow & Boyd in the notes relative to the quotation just given from Kent's Commentaries, the author says:

> "This decision overrules all the old authorities and text-books, for they all apply the term 'furtum,' or simple theft, as well as 'latrocinium,' or robbery, to assailants from without the ship, and exclude from the policy simple theft, as not being properly a casualty. All the English text-writers follows the same rule, as Malynes (Lex Mer. c. 25), Molloy (de Jur. Mar. b. 2, c. 7, § 7), Beawes (Lex Mer. 313), Weskett (on Ins. tit. 'Theft'), Park (30, 31), Millar (145, 146), and Marshall (by Condy, i. 243). Park, in his 6th Ed., says that the English law is silent on the subject. The decision by Chancellor Walworth may be reasonable, and it is according to the popular acceptation of the word 'thieves,' but it is against all the text authorities, foreign and domestic. It is also in contravention of the principle that thefts are not casualties; and it may be a matter of questionable policy whether the owners and masters of ships ought to be indemnified against thefts of goods under their own care, and occasioned by their own lack of vigilance."

The pertinency of the last part of this last quotation to a correct application of the law to the facts before us is made apparent when we consider that ordinary business precaution would have prevented the acceptance of the check for $140 without certification of its genuineness. However, the next authority, the case of American Insurance Co. v. Bryan, 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 563, 37 Am. Dec. 278, is fully as illuminating. For a more thorough understanding of the meaning of the word "thieves," we have concluded to sacrifice somewhat the cause of brevity and quote liberally from this case. The policy in question insured against, "pirates, rovers, thieves, and barratry of the masters and mariners"; barratry being "a criminal, or at least intentionally fraudulent misconduct of the master or mariners towards the owner of the vessel." In the argument of counsel for the respondent, we find the following:

> "The word 'thieves' has the same meaning in the policy as in all other cases, and there is not a word in the English language which has, and has had for centuries, a more defined, limited, and restricted meaning, both in common use and among lexicographers. Walker defines 'thievish,' 'secret, sly, acting by stealth; the robbery may be by stealth, yet thievery is by common understanding intended to mean secret, private larceny.' "

Again he says:

> "There seems then no ground for saying that the law limits the meaning of the word 'thieves' to 'assailing thieves'—that it changes the meaning of furtum into latrocinium. No usage is shown establishing this distinction. On the contrary, the word when used in a policy is held by underwriters themselves to have its natural and usual meaning. This is evident from the fact that many companies limit their liability by excepting loss by thieves or by assuring in express terms against 'assailing thieves.' "

The court adopted this reasoning of counsel, and said:

> "This throws us back to examine the older use and meaning of the words 'thieves' and 'theft.' They have had a peculiar use in our language. The primary meaning, which is now the ordinary one, is that of secret stealing or simple larceny. But they had formerly a more general signification, and comprehended robbery or violent taking, although that was never the exclusive sense. The signification was either an unlawful and guilty taking of property generally, or else and more especially a secret taking. Our received translation of the Bible, that still fresh and living 'well of English undefiled,' was but little prior in date to the ascertained use of the clause in question, and it abounds in examples of these uses. The original words in the New Testament [here occur two Greek words] have respectively the precise sense of a 'secret thief,' and 'a robber by force.' They are translated indiscriminately by 'thief,' though the former word is never translated 'robber.' When the two words occur together, their distinct meanings are marked as 'he is a thief and a robber.' (John x, 1.) But we read, 'a certain man fell among thieves,' literally, 'among robbers.' Again: 'Ye have made my house a den of thieves,' in modern language, 'a robber's den' (spelunca latronum, in the vulgate).
> "At a later date, we find Blackstone, a legitimate English classic, as well as the most pleasing and perspicuous of elementary teachers, explaining larceny by theft, and he speaks of it as either simple larceny or plain theft, unaccompanied by any atrocious circumstances, or else compound larceny, of which robbery is a species. It is needless to multiply examples, to show that at whatever period we may fix the introduction of this clause in our policies, the words comprehended the largest risk of felonious taking, with or without force, secretly or by open assault. Modern use has gradually restricted the sense to thieving unaccompanied by violence, but at no period do we find any usage of an exclusive signification of robbery only, which would not embrace the other meaning."

In the case of Spinetti v. Atlas Steamship Co., 80 N. Y. 71, 36 Am. Rep. 579, the bill of lading exempted the company from liability from loss arising by reason of "theft on land or afloat" and "barratry of master or mariners." This cause was determined by resolving the intent of the parties, the court citing with approval the authority from which we have just quoted. It is obvious that it is just as great an error to stretch the word beyond its proper signification as it is to restrict it by undue limitation. Rapalje in his work entitled "Larceny and Kindred Offenses" says:

> "'Larceny' is derived from the Norman 'larcyn,' Latin 'latrocinium.' * * * It must be done fraudulently and secretly, so as not only to deprive the owner of his property, but also to attempt to leave him without knowledge of the taker."

While this last statement quoted by Rapalje from State v. Ledford, 67 N. C. 71, may not receive approval as a legal definition, it is instructive upon the common or ordinary meaning of the word "theft," for it is apparently confused with that word. Our own word "furtive" is derived from the Latin furtum, and indicates the stealthiness or secretiveness inherent in the predecessor of simple theft. Webster's New International Dictionary defines thief as "one who steals, esp. stealthily or secretly; one who commits theft, or larceny; formerly, also, a robber."

[2] We are of the opinion from our investigation of the meaning of the word "theft" that it signifies, in its ordinary acceptation, as distinguished from its legal definition, the secret, furtive act of feloniously appropriating to one's own use the property of another under cover of darkness or some scheme designed to escape detection. Or, to phrase it differently, the word, to the ordinary layman, conveys the mental picture of one who secretly takes and carries away another's property, rather than one who deals with cheats and swindles, tricks, artifices, or devices.

That it was the intention of the parties to the contract to employ the word in its ordinary sense is strongly suggested by the fact that they were not satisfied to use it in an all-inclusive sense, but also employed the word "robbery" to indicate the loss occurring by the use of violence or fear (inherited from the Latin latrocinium) and "pilferage" to indicate petty thievery. One of the most potent factors to be considered in arriving at the sense in which the word was used in the policy is the fact that Spainhower was one of the beneficiaries named in the policy. Had it been intended that the contract was to insure the other beneficiary against loss from a trick and device used by Spainhower prior to the issuance of the policy, is it not more than passing strange that he also should have been insured? A case has been called to our attention, to wit, Neal v. Liverpool Ins. Co., 178 App. Div. 730, 165 N. Y. S. 204, in which it was held that, where the conditional vendor and vendee of a motorcycle were both named as beneficiaries in the policy, the conditional seller was entitled to recover the balance due on the contract where the loss occurred as a result of the conditional purchaser's stealing the motorcycle himself. No sound reason is advanced for the ruling. The intent of the parties is not discussed and apparently not considered. A portion of the opinion reads:

> "I am of the opinion that the policy covers the plaintiff's loss. It in effect insured each interest separately, namely, that of the plaintiff, the conditional vendor, and of Arthur, the conditional vendee, and by its express terms covers theft by any person other than such as are expressly excepted by the terms of the policy. As to the plaintiff's interest, Arthur is not within this exception."

We cannot help but remark that no account is taken of the fact that the persons who are excepted are those in the employment, service, or household of the insured. Even though the facts were not essentially different in the instant action, we could hardly accept the foregoing as authoritative.

In so far as the case of Rush v. Boston Insurance Co., 88 Misc. Rep. 48, 150 N. Y. S. 457, is concerned, we must bear in mind that, on the strict question as framed and limited by counsel, it is prior to the case of Delafield v. London & Lancashire Fire Insurance Co., supra, decided by the same department, and, if there be no distinction in the two cases, it must be considered as affected by the latter. However, the Rush Case is in no way pertinent to the question here under consideration, for the reason that all the facts said to constitute the larceny were committed by one other than a conditional purchaser, and subsequent to the time the policy was issued. Furthermore, the judgment for plaintiff against the insurance company was reversed because the trial court rejected testimony tending to show that the person who took possession of the automobile was acting under an honest belief that he was entitled to possession. Therefore this case is of no assistance whatever in the determination of our problem. The authority of Overland-Reno Co. v. International Indemnity Co., 115 Kan. 137, 222 P. 122, would be more valuable if it discussed the question under consideration, but the opinion is confined to a consideration of the question framed by counsel and stated by the court as follows:

> "The defendant contends that the act of Dolson did not constitute a larceny, but that the car was procured by false pretense."

After determining that the offense was larceny, it is assumed or taken for granted that it was covered by the policy without discussion of that question.

[3] The case of Hill v. North River Ins. Co., 111 Kan. 225, 207 P. 205, 24 A. L. R. 736, can hardly be accepted by us as authority for the reason that it extends the meaning of the word "theft" far beyond its popular or common acceptation. It is there said:

> "The prevailing rule is that any scheme, whether involving false pretenses or other fraudulent trick or device, whereby an owner of property is swindled out of it with the preconceived intent of the swindler not to pay for it, is classed as larceny, and is punished accordingly."

While we recognize the rule that where the provisions of a policy are reasonably susceptible of two constructions consistent with the object of the obligation, one of them favorable to the assurer and the other favorable to the assured, that the one favorable to the assured will be adopted, we cannot extend this doctrine to the point where it does violence to the English language or fails to properly interpret the minds of the parties. The case of Illinois Automobile Insurance Exchange v. Southern Motors Sales Co., 207 Ala. 265, 92 So. 429, 24 A. L. R. 734, is not helpful, for the reason that it was an appeal from an order granting a motion for a new trial where a judgment had gone for the defendant; the trial court being of the opinion at the time it granted the motion for a new trial that the plaintiff was entitled to recover under a policy containing the words here in question, where the purchaser executed notes representing a part of the purchase price secured by a certain amount of timber which he claimed to own, but which he did not own. The Supreme Court determined that the purchaser did not consummate a theft of the car, and reversed the order granting the motion for a new trial. If the case can be considered helpful, it must be taken as denying the doctrine laid down in Hill v. North River Insurance Co., supra, to the effect that any false pretense or fraudulent trick or device is classed as larceny and constitutes a theft under the policy. We are of the opinion that the demurrer should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed.

I concur: WORKS, P. J.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. (dissenting). The following opinion having been prepared by me, and my associates disagreeing therewith and having agreed upon and filed the main opinion, with which I cannot agree, I file this as my dissenting opinion in the case.

The defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The lower court overruled the demurrer, giving defendant ten days to answer. No answer having been filed within the given time, judgment was entered in the sum prayed for, and defendant appeals on the judgment roll.

Appellant states, and respondent agrees thereto, that the only question involved is, "Does the policy insuring against theft, robbery and pilferage insure against a larceny committed by means of trick and device?"

As shown by the allegations of the complaint, an automobile was obtained from plaintiff's assignor by trick and device, in that one Spainhower pretended to purchase the car through a lease contract, which provided that the title should remain in plaintiff's assignor until a full compliance with its terms was had, and delivered a check as and for the initial payment, stating that he had money in the bank and that the check would be paid upon presentation. Payment thereon was never made, for the reason that Spainhower at no time had an account with the drawee bank. The automobile has never been returned, and Spainhower immediately disappeared. As the judgment was entered after demurrer sustained and no answer filed, we must consider the whole transaction upon Spainhower's part as fraudulent and as a scheme to trick plaintiff's assignor into delivering the car to him so that he could make way with it. The agreement of counsel as to the sole point presented for decision also requires us to accept the facts as constituting a taking by trick and device.

The controversy, reduced to its simplest terms, is: Plaintiff claims that a taking by trick and device is a "theft," while defendant claims that it is not. Appellant contends that the word "theft" does not contemplate a loss through trick and device.

Bouvier says:

> "Theft is a popular term for larceny. It is a wider term than larceny and includes other forms of wrongful deprivation of property of another."
> "'Theft' is defined as a proper term for larceny, and is used by Blackstone as synonymous with the latter word and as descriptive of one and the same offense. Hence it is held that the word 'theft' describes a crime and is synonymous with larceny." People v. Donohue, 84 N. Y. 438.

The turning point in all cases of this nature is whether or not there was an intention on behalf of the owner of property to presently part with the title as well as the possession of the property. 25 C. J. 657, and cases cited. In the instant case the title was specifically retained by plaintiff's assignor. This rule in reference to larceny prevails alike in England and the United States. In the case of People v. Shaughnessy, 110 Cal. 602, 43 P. 3, the court says:

> "In The Queen v. Russett, L. R. 2 Q. B. Div. 312, decided in 1892, Coleridge, C. J., said: 'If the possession of the money or goods said to have been stolen has been parted with, but the owner did not intend to part with the property in them, so that that part of the transaction is incomplete, and the parting with the possession has been obtained by fraud, this is larceny.'"

To the same effect are People v. Smallman, 55 Cal. 185, and People v. Rae, 66 Cal. 423, 6 P. 1, 56 Am. Rep. 102, the latter a leading case in which the principle is exhaustively treated, both in the main and dissenting opinions. The principle contended for here is affirmed in both. We quote from the main opinion:

> "Where, by means of fraud, conspiracy, or artifice, possession of the property is obtained with felonious intent, and the title still remains in the owner, larceny is established. While the crime is false pretenses, if the title, as well as the possession, is absolutely parted with."

This language is quoted with approval in People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 737, 81 P. 131. See, also, People v. Johnson, 91 Cal. 271, 27 P. 663; In re Clark, 34 Cal. App. 440, 167 P. 1143; Matter of Moss, 120 Cal. 695, 53 P. 357; People v. Rial, 23 Cal. App. 713, 139 P. 661, and People v. Edwards, 72 Cal. App. 102, 236 P. 944.

Appellant relies upon Delafield v. London, etc., Ins. Co., 177 App. Div. 477, 164 N. Y. S. 221 (a case essentially the same as the instant one), in which his contention is squarely upheld; but after an extensive research there has been found no other authority holding to the principle therein enunciated. The case cited does not discuss the points presented and cites no authority in support of the conclusion therein reached. In Hill v. North River Ins. Co., 111 Kan. 225, 207 P. 205, 24 A. L. R. 736, a case where an automobile was stolen by trick and device, the insurance policy seems to have been about the same as in the instant case, insuring against "theft, robbery, or pilferage." The opinion reviews the authorities and holds the taking to be "theft," as the term is used in the policy. Commenting upon the Delafield Case, the court says:

> "It seems that this New York case may have had several features to distinguish it from the one before us; but whether it had or not, it does not * * * shake our conviction that the case at bar was correctly decided."

In Illinois Automobile Ins. Exchange v. Southern Motors Sales Co., 207 Ala. 265, 92 So. 429, 24 A. L. R. 734, the expression "theft, robbery, or pilferage" is analyzed in the light of the authorites, and "theft" is held to cover larceny by trick and device. The court there said:

> "The decision in Delafield v. London, etc. [177 App. Div. 477, 164 N. Y. S. 221], * * * is not acceptable authority. The court there seems not to have taken any account of the rule of construction to which we have referred."

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Wimbish, 12 Ga. App. 712, 78 S. E. 265, analyzes the terms "theft, robbery, and pilferage" fully, and comes to the same conclusion reached in the two last above cited cases. The same may be said of Stuht v. Maryland Motor Car Ins. Co., 90 Wash. 576, 156 P. 557.

Buxton v. Industrial Indemnity Co., 47 Cal. App. 583, 589, 191 P. 84, deals with the words "steal" and "theft" in an insurance policy, and holds that "theft" covers a case where there is a felonious intent to make way with an automobile at the time a purchaser on a conditional sales contract acquired possession of it. And so in Rush v. Boston Ins. Co., 88 Misc. Rep. 48, 150 N. Y. S. 457, it was held, under an automobile insurance policy using the same terms as those in the policy considered in the instant case—theft, robbery, or pilferage—that the claimant "could not recover unless he had been deprived of [the automobile] feloniously * * * and that proof of taking by trick and device would be sufficient to allow an inference of intent."

In Overland-Reno Co. v. International Indemnity Co., 115 Kan. 137, 222 P. 122, the court was considering the exact point before us here, and said:

> "The defendant contends that the act of Dolson did not constitute a larceny, but that the car was procured by false pretense. We adhere to the doctrine in Motor Co. v. Insurance Co., 111 Kan. 225, 207 P. 205, 24 A. L. R. 736, and Overland-Reno Co. v. Indemnity Co., 111 Kan. 668, 208 P. 548. In the former it was said: 'The prevailing rule is that any scheme, whether involving false pretenses or other fraudulent trick or device whereby an owner of property is swindled out of it with the preconceived intent of the swindler not to pay for it, is classed as larceny.'"

Blashfield in his "Cyclopedia of Automobile Law," vol. 3, § 81, treats the law on this subject as follows:

> "It has been held, in one jurisdiction, that the word 'theft,' as used in such a policy, does not include all forms of larceny recognized by law, and does not cover larceny by trick and device, that is theft that involves as an essential element, the deception of the insured resulting in the surrender of the possession of the insured property but not in parting with title. Delafield v. London & Lancashire Fire Ins. Co., 177 App. Div. 477, 164 N. Y. S. 221. But, in other jurisdictions, under the rule that where the provisions of a policy of indemnity are reasonably susceptible of two constructions consistent with the object of the obligation in question, one favorable to the insured and the other favorable to the insurer [see Faris v. American Nat. Ass'n, 44 Cal. App. 55, 185 P. 1035], that one will be adopted that is favorable to the insured, it is held that the words 'theft,' 'robbery,' or 'pilferage,' in an automobile policy, will include larceny in any and every form not expressly excluded by other provisions of the policy, and that the term may therefore include securing the possession of a chattel, not the title thereto or a special property thereunder, by or with the consent of the owner, through a fraudulent trick or device, then intending to steal the chattel, or the act of a swindler, who deprives the insured of the possession of an automobile, the insurer retaining title to it, by means of a preconceived plan which involves impersonation, misrepresentation, and fraud. Under this rule, any scheme, whether involving false pretenses or other fraudulent trick or device, whereby an owner of an automobile is swindled out of it, with the preconceived intent of the swindler not to pay for it, is larceny within such a policy. * * *"

It may be debatable whether or not, under the agreed point at issue, as mentioned in the briefs of both parties, attention should be given to and comment made in this opinion upon possible questions that may have importance in the case. However, two points will be briefly noticed.

A reading of the complaint will show that the spurious contract for the sale of the automobile was entered into, and the check for the first payment delivered, prior to the issuance of the policy of insurance, also that the delivery of the automobile under the contract was subsequent to the issuance of the policy. This state of facts does not change the effectiveness of the policy. While the whole plan to steal the automobile was in course at the effective date of the insurance policy, the theft had not been accomplished. It was only accomplished when the possession was actually obtained by the thief. To argue otherwise would be to say that an insurance policy would not be applicable to a case where prior to the date thereof a person had secured duplicate keys to the insured car for the purpose of stealing it, but had only used them successfully after the date of the policy.

The other point which possibly may properly be considered here is as to whether the policy, having been issued to the owner and the contract holder, who turned out to be a thief, as to their respective interests, affects the contract as to the owner. Logically this cannot be. It has been held in O'Neill v. Queen Ins. Co., 230 Mass. 269, 119 N. E. 678, that a policy insuring an automobile against theft, taken out by one who has no insurable interest, is void as to him. The statement that a person who steals an automobile, as in the instant case, has acquired no insurable or other interest therein is incontrovertible, and needs no citation of authority to support it. A person has no insurable interest in a thing if his assumed or asserted right therein arises under a contract which is void or unenforceable in good morals or at law or in equity. Hessen v. Iowa Automobile Mut. Ins. Co., 195 Iowa, 141, 190 N. W. 150, 30 A. L. R. 657. The further statement that, the policy having been procured by the owner in good faith, it cannot be invalidated by the felonious act of the thief, is axiomatically sound. The point is decided in Neal v. Liverpool, etc., Ins. Co., 178 App. Div. 730, 165 N. Y. S. 204, a case dealing with a theft by trick and device on a conditional sales contract:

> "The plaintiff sold the motorcycle by a conditional bill of sale to Arthur. The verdict is for the amount due and unpaid to plaintiff for the purchase price. The proof tends to show that Arthur, one of the insured, himself stole the motorcycle, and the question is whether the plaintiff, the other insured, may recover for its interest in the motorcycle. I am of the opinion that the policy covers the plaintiff's loss. It in effect insured each interest separately, namely, that of the plaintiff, the conditional vendor, and of Arthur, the conditional vendee, and by its express terms covers theft by any person other than such as are expressly excepted by the terms of the policy. As to the plaintiff's interest, Arthur is not within this exception."

The judgment should be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. POZZI. (Cr. 1005.) *

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 19, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 18, 1928.

1. Indictment and information 🔑130—Information in three counts charging maintenance of liquor nuisance held not demurrable because charging three distinct offenses not relating to same transaction (Pen. Code, §§ 950, 951, 952; Volstead Act, tit. 2 [27 USCA § 4, et seq.]).

Information charging in three separate counts that defendant willfully and unlawfully maintained on three separate dates place in city where intoxicating liquor, to wit, whisky and jackass brandy, was kept and sold and bartered, which liquor was fit for beverage purposes, in violation of Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (27 USCA § 33), held not demurrable under Pen. Code, §§ 950, 951, and 952, providing requisites of information as charging three separate and distinct offenses not relating to same act or transaction.

2. Indictment and information 🔑128—Information charging in three separate counts maintenance of place where intoxicating liquor was sold, held proper under statute (Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 [27 USCA § 33]; Pen. Code, § 954).

Information charging in separate counts that defendant maintained on three separate dates place where intoxicating liquor was kept, bartered, and sold, in violation of Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (27 USCA § 33), providing that place where liquor is sold was common nuisance, held proper under Pen. Code, § 954, providing two or more different offenses of same class may be charged in same information.

3. Indictment and information 🔑130—Information charging maintenance of common nuisance on three different dates held to charge three separate offenses (Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 [27 USCA § 33]).

Information in separate counts charging maintenance of place where intoxicating liquor was kept, bartered, and sold on three different dates under Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (27 USCA § 33), making such maintenance nuisance, held to charge three separate offenses.

4. Intoxicating liquors 🔑224—That proof showed sales of liquor were made on separate dates did not authorize inference that sales were continuous, constituting but one offense (Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 [27 USCA § 33]).

Where information charged sale of liquor on three separate dates constituting place, thereby constituting place where liquor was sold a common nuisance under Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (27 USCA § 33), held that it could not be inferred from proof of sale on several days named in information that sales were continuous so that different sales constituted but one offense.

5. Intoxicating liquors 🔑143—Statute providing for notice to one maintaining public nuisance held inapplicable to common nuisance under Volstead Act (Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 [27 USCA § 33]; Pen. Code, § 373a).

Pen. Code, § 373a, providing that one who, after reasonable notice, refuses to remove public nuisance, is guilty of misdemeanor, held inapplicable to common nuisance prohibited by Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (27 USCA § 33).

6. Criminal law 🔑371(10)—In prosecution for maintenance of liquor nuisance, evidence of subsequent sales held admissible to show intent (Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 [27 USCA § 33]).

In prosecution for maintaining liquor nuisance under Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (27 USCA § 33), admission of evidence of sales of intoxicating liquor at place named in information subsequent to several occasions upon which offenses were alleged to have been committed held proper as tending to show intent with which crime was committed.

7. Criminal law 🔑369(1)—Generally evidence of crime other than that for which defendant is on trial is inadmissible.

General rule is that evidence of commission of certain crime by defendant other than crime for which he is on trial is inadmissible.

8. Criminal law 🔑371(10)—Evidence of sales two and three months prior to first offense of maintaining liquor nuisance, charged to show intent, held not too remote (Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 [27 USCA § 33]).

In prosecution for maintaining common nuisance under Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (27 USCA § 33), admission of evidence of sales of liquor three and two months prior to date upon which it was alleged defendant committed first offense charged in information held admissible to show intent and not too remote; question of remoteness being one of weight for jury.

9. Intoxicating liquors 🔑236(9)—Evidence held to sustain conviction for maintaining common nuisance in violation of Volstead Act (Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 [27 USCA § 33]).

In prosecution for maintaining common nuisance under Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (27 USCA § 33), evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

10. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal of requested instructions, covered by instructions given, held not error.

Refusal of instructions requested, which were covered by instructions given, held not erroneous.

★ Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

HART, J. [1] The defendant, by information filed in the superior court in and for the county of Mendocino, was charged in three different counts of maintaining a common nuisance on three different designated occasions, in that, as the information charges, he willfully and unlawfully did, on the 1st day of April, 1927 (first count), on the 3d day of May, 1927 (second count), and on the 21st day of May, 1927 (third count), maintain "a place, in the city of Ft. Bragg, Mendocino county, state of California, where intoxicating liquor, to wit, whisky and jackass brandy, was kept, sold, and bartered, which said whisky and jackass brandy was then and there fit for beverage purposes, in violation of title 2 of the Volstead Act" (27 USCA § 4 et seq.), contrary, etc. The information is based on section 21 of title 2 of said act (27 USCA § 33), which provides that:

> "Any room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or place where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, kept, or bartered in violation of this title, and all intoxicating liquor and property kept and used in maintaining the same, is hereby declared to be a common nuisance, and any person who maintains such a common nuisance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $1,000 or be imprisoned for not more than one year, or both," etc.

The information, as a whole, was demurred to on the general ground, also upon the ground that it "does not conform to the requirements of section 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code," and on a number of other special grounds, to wit, uncertainty, ambiguity, and indefiniteness in certain specified particulars. Each count of the information was separately demurred to on like grounds.

The demurrer was overruled. The jury, by whom the questions of fact were tried, found the accused guilty on each count of the information. The defendant made a motion in arrest of judgment, and also moved for a new trial. Both motions were disallowed, and the court pronounced judgment upon the accused as follows: Upon the first count, a fine of $1,000, with the alternative, upon default in the payment of said fine, or any part thereof, of imprisonment in the county jail one day for each $2 of the fine not paid, not exceeding one year; upon the second count, a fine of $500, or, upon default in the payment of said fine, the like imprisonment to the one preceding; and, upon the third count, "imprisonment in the county jail for the term of six months"—said "sentences to run consecutively."

The defendant appeals from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

The grounds urged for a reversal, generally stated, are: (1) That the information, without authority of law, charges three separate and distinct offenses not relating to the "same act, transaction, or event, but each relating to separate and distinct act, transaction, or event"; (2) that the court erred to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the accused in certain of its rulings upon the evidence; (3) that there is not in the evidence sufficient support to the verdict; (4) that error was committed by the trial court in its refusal to allow and submit to the jury certain instructions proposed by the accused.

1. The demurrer was properly overruled. The information states the offense charged in each count "in ordinary and concise language," and "in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." Pen. Code, §§ 950, 951, and 952.

[2] The joinder of the three separate offenses in the information under as many different counts was legally proper. Pen. Code, § 954. Said section authorizes the charging in an indictment, information or a complaint of "two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, or different statements of the same offense, or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, under separate counts." The offenses charged in the information here under the three separate counts are "of the same class of crimes or offenses." In fact, as is obvious, the three counts charge precisely the same offense, committed, however, at different times. The cases cited by counsel for defendant in support of his position that the joinder in an indictment or information under separate counts of two or more different offenses not relating to the "same act, transaction, or event" is not authorized by law, and therefore involves prejudicial error, were decided before section 954 was amended so as to permit the joinder in the accusatory pleading of "two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses." Hence those cases have no application.

[3, 4] But it is further contended that the alleged offenses charged in the information constituted but one offense; that, in other words, the crime of maintaining a common nuisance cannot be segregated into two or more offenses and so charged under different counts in an indictment or information as the commission of separate and independent offenses, where, as here, the several acts constituting the alleged nuisance have been committed between intervals of time of several days or two or three weeks only from each other, but that a single charge only may be alleged, all the acts committed on the three several occasions being merely evidentiary or proof of the commission of the single offense. We are not impressed with this contention. It will be noted that the language of section 21, tit. 2, of the Volstead Act, under which the defendant in this case was proceeded against, is that any house, place, or any of the other structures therein mentioned, "where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, kept, or bartered, in violation of this title, and all intoxicating liquor and property kept and used in maintaining the same, is hereby declared to be a common nuisance, and any person who maintains such a common nuisance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." It is clear that under that provision, where any one of several things or acts is done at such building, structure, etc., the place where such act is done or committed ipso facto and instantly becomes a common nuisance, and any person, not exempt by express provision of the statute from the penalties thereof, who maintains such nuisance, is guilty of a misdemeanor. If, in other words, intoxicating liquor is manufactured at any such place, or if such liquor is sold or bartered at any such place, or if it be kept at any place, then in either case the place at which such act is committed is by the statute itself stamped as a common nuisance, and the party so maintaining such nuisance is guilty of a misdemeanor. If a person on one certain day of each month were to engage in manufacturing intoxicating liquor, no one would say that every such time he had so manufactured such liquor for two, three, or four months, would not constitute as many different and distinct offenses of maintaining the common nuisance defined by the federal act. As to the crime of maintaining a common nuisance for the selling of such liquor, let it be supposed that a person owned or had legal possession of a place located near a park where public festivals or other outdoor amusements were held once every week—on every Sunday, for instance—and that at such place he engaged in selling intoxicating liquor on each of such days only, would it be reasonable to say that he would not, under the federal statute, be guilty of maintaining a common nuisance on each and every one of such days? We can conceive of no reasonable ground for a negative answer to the question thus propounded. But, as has been shown, the Volstead Act (27 USCA) unqualifiedly declares that any place where intoxicating liquor is sold is a common nuisance and that any person who maintains that nuisance—that is, who sells such liquor at such place—is guilt of a misdemeanor. The act does not prescribe a specific period or length of time of the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor or during which it shall be sold shall be necessary to constitute a nuisance. It has been said that "the offense may be committed in one day as well as in two or more." McFadden, Prohibition, § 428, p. 389; Feigin v. U. S. (C. C. A. 9th Cir.) 279 F. 107. Of course, the evidence, direct and circumstantial, must be such as to show that such liquor was unlawfully sold, kept, or bartered on the premises on the particular day in question. It must be shown that surrounding the case are special circumstances which might themselves be sufficient to establish the habitual character of the offense, or the intent or purpose with which the liquor was kept by the accused. Marshallo v. U. S. (C. C. A. 2d Cir) 298 F. 74. Manifestly, it cannot be held, as a matter of law, that the fact of the sale of liquor on each particular day of several, in the absence of proof of other sales in the interval of time elapsing between the several sales charged under the different counts, warrants the conclusion or an inference that the accused did not discontinue the unlawful business during such intervals of time. The fact of the sales made on each of the days in question might afford an inference that the sales were continuous—that is, in this case, that they were more or less made every day from and including the 1st day of April to and including the 21st day of May—but, in the absence of proof to that effect, it cannot, from the mere proof of sales on the several days named in the information, be so inferred as a matter of law.

[5] Counsel for the defendant appear to assume that section 373a of the Penal Code has application here. That section provides:

> "Every person who maintains, permits, or allows a public nuisance to exist upon his or her property or premises, and every person occupying or leasing the property or premises of another who maintains, permits or allows a public nuisance to exist thereon, after reasonable notice in writing from a health officer or district attorney to remove, discontinue or abate the same has been served upon such person, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished accordingly."

The first answer to the proposition is that the prosecution of the accused in this case is under the Volstead Act, which contains no provision, as does the Code section, requiring notice to be given to the offending party to discontinue the nuisance. Secondly, it is to our minds obvious that the provision of said section requiring such notice to be given to a party guilty of maintaining a public or common nuisance has no application whatever to a case of the character of the one at bar. It is readily perceivable how such a provision may properly apply to a case where a legitimate business may, by the manner in which it is conducted and maintained, become a menace to the health and comfort of a considerable portion of the public, and so become under the law a public or common nuisance. Such nuisances may be abated by recourse to appropriate civil remedies afforded by the law, and the Legislature may, as it has done, for good and sufficient reasons, denounce the act of maintaining such nuisance as a public offense, and provide, as in effect it has, that if, after notice by the authorities to discontinue the same, the person maintaining such nuisance, fails or omits to discontinue it or remove the cause thereof, will be prosecuted and punished for such dereliction. His omission to abate the nuisance is in reality wherein he offends the law. But it is inconceivable that such a notice should be required to be given a party maintaining a nuisance per se, or which is of and in itself criminal. Every element of the offense of maintaining a common nuisance under the federal statute upon which this prosecution is founded involves a criminal act. The keeping by a person of intoxicating liquor at any of the places mentioned in the statute is itself an act which subjects him to the penalties of a misdemeanor, as likewise does the sale thereof. The possession of intoxicating liquor and the sale thereof by one not included within the excepted class are separate and distinct offenses, and a person keeping and selling the same may be prosecuted for either separately; yet both offenses are essentially elements or ingredients of the crime of maintaining a common nuisance under the Volstead Act. It would indeed be an unique anomaly in the administration of criminal law to require notice to be given to an habitual transgressor of public law to cease his criminal activities before he could be proceeded against in a criminal action to punish him for his offenses against society.

[6, 7] 2. It is contended that error was committed by the trial court in permitting evidence of sales of intoxicating liquor at the place named in the information subsequent to the several occasions upon which the accusatory pleading alleges that the several offenses charged were committed.

It is a well-settled general rule that evidence of the commission of a certain crime by the defendant other than the crime for which he is on trial is inadmissible. There are, however, exceptions to that rule, and we think the case here comes within such exceptions. These exceptions rest on various reasons, dependent upon or according to the nature of the case and the circumstances attending or surrounding the act of committing the crime charged. Apt and illuminating illustrations of the application of the exception under different circumstances are to be found in the following cases: People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 460, 44 P. 186; People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 621, 76 P. 500; People v. Harben, 5 Cal. App. 29, 91 P. 398; People v. Zimmerman, 11 Cal. App. 115, 104 P. 590; People v. Weir, 30 Cal. App. 766, 159 P. 442; People v. Ferdinand, 194 Cal. 555, 563, 229 P. 341. The general theory upon which evidence of the commission of other crimes cognate in nature to the one for which the accused is on trial is received is that the legal relation of the two crimes is such that the proof of the commission of the "other crime" tends directly to show the intent or the purpose or the motive with which the crime for which the defendant is on trial was committed. So, in the present case, the theory of the legal propriety of permitting evidence of similar crimes to those charged in the information committed by the accused prior and subsequent to the commission of those charged is (the unlawful possession of the liquor by the defendant having been shown) that the commission of such prior or subsequent acts tends to show that the defendant had conceived and contrived a system for the illicit traffic in prohibited alcoholic liquors and hence to show the wrongful intent with which or the like purpose for the accomplishment of which he kept or possessed intoxicating liquor at the place where it is charged that he was selling the same to such of the public as might desire thus to be accommodated.

[8] The claim that the allowance of proof of the sale by the defendant of intoxicating liquor in the months of January and February, 1927 (three and two months prior to the 1st day of April, 1927, on which day it is alleged, as seen, that the defendant committed the first of the offenses charged in the information), is too remote from the date of the alleged commission of said first offense or the other offenses to be relevant or material or competent cannot be sustained. That evidence was admissible on the same theory as that upon which evidence of subsequent sales was receivable. The question of the remoteness, in point of time, of the several occasions from each other, is one of weight, which it was for the jury to determine.

What has been said above answers the proposition advanced by defendant that evidence of sales charged under one particular count of the information would naturally but wrongfully be considered by the jury in passing upon and determining whether the charges in the other counts were sufficiently proved. The jury would have the right to consider the fact of sales on each of the dates on which the several offenses are respectively charged to have been committed as evidence of the intent or purpose with which the liquor was kept by the accused on each of such dates. In other words, and by way of illustration, evidence of sales of liquor on the 1st of April would be proper to be considered by the jury in determining the intent or purpose of the accused in having possession of intoxicating liquor at the place named on the 3d and 21st of May. The rule is well stated in People v. King, 23 Cal. App. 259, 262, 137 P. 1076, 1077, as follows:

> "Such evidence is admissible as an exception to the general rule upon the theory that, if it be shown that a defendant has been repeatedly guilty of similar offenses, it may be reasonably and logically inferred that the act charged against him in the information was accomplished with a felonious intent"—citing Underhill on Criminal Evidence (2d Ed.) §§ 87, 89, and certain California, as well as cases from other jurisdictions.

[9] 3. The evidence sufficiently supports the verdict as to the three counts of the information. Briefly summarizing the evidence addressed to the proof of the offense charged in each count of the information is all that is conceived to be necessary. First, it should be stated that the defendant owned and conducted the Pacific Hotel at the town of Ft. Bragg, in Mendocino county. This was the place at which the alleged offenses were committed. One Louis P. Remegie, who was the manager of a private detective agency in San Francisco, was employed by the district attorney of Mendocino county early in the year 1927 to investigate supposed "bootlegging" activities in Ft. Bragg. He testified he first met defendant at his hotel in February, 1927; that he then represented to defendant that he was a drummer, and as such was selling "pants presses."

He testified (count 1): Was at defendant's hotel on April 1, 1927, about 7 p. m., accompanied by a man named Northern; the latter took witness into a back room, which was the kitchen; they purchased two drinks of whisky, for each of which they paid 25 cents, or 50 cents for the two; they also purchased one pint of liquor and paid $2.50 therefor; defendant served the liquor to witness and Northern and received the money; they bought and paid defendant for four drinks that day; at the time spoken of there were several other men in the kitchen; some of these men then present appeared to be under the influence of liquor; witness took with him the pint bottle of whisky sold to him by defendant.

Witness Northern: Worked in the mill of the Caspar Lumber Company, in Mendocino county near Ft. Bragg; worked for that company from the 1st day of February until the 16th of April, 1927; during that time went to Ft. Bragg "twice or three times a week"; always saw defendant, usually at the Pacific Hotel in Ft. Bragg; during that period of time he purchased from defendant at the Pacific Hotel about eight drinks of intoxicating liquor; made those purchases at different times from the 1st of February to the 16th of April, 1927; paid defendant for those drinks 25 cents a drink, the defendant always personally serving the drinks to witness; saw other persons during the time mentioned buy drinks from defendant fifteen or twenty times; had seen on several different occasions during the period of time above stated persons under the influence of liquor at defendant's place; witness stated that during the period of time referred to by him he was in the employ of the sheriff of Mendocino county, being paid by the sheriff for his services $100 per month.

Cross-examination: Purchased for the first time a drink of whisky from defendant on the 1st of February; saw intoxicated persons at the hotel "twice or three times, one of those times being the 1st of April; one man witness knew was intoxicated on said date; knew it from the way the man walked, talked, and acted; the man talked loud; saw him obtain from defendant three drinks there on the 1st of April; the time of day witness was in the kitchen of the Pacific Hotel on April 1st was about 7:45 p. m.

Witness Young, detective, employed by the district attorney of Mendocino county to investigate conditions as to traffic in intoxicating liquor in Ft. Bragg, was in said place in January, 1927, and on the afternoon of the 27th day of said month bought from defendant, "in a room behind the kitchen in the Pacific Hotel," about eight drinks of whisky and a bottle of whisky "which I took away with me"; witness on that day paid the defendant the money for the drinks which were personally served and delivered to witness by defendant in said room of the hotel, the latter accepting and receiving from witness the money therefor; on the evening of January 31, 1927, witness purchased two drinks from defendant at the same place, the latter personally serving the liquor and receiving the money therefor from witness; witness was first taken to the Pacific Hotel by one Curley Flaherty, who introduced witness to defendant; on the second visit of witness to the hotel (January 31), he was accompanied by one Jim Brown, a deputy sheriff.

Second count. Remegie, the detective, testified that on the 3d day of May, 1927, about 4 p. m., he and one George Saleskie, one of his "operators," or another detective in his employ, went to the Pacific Hotel and in the "back room" above mentioned, he purchased seven drinks and a pint bottle of moonshine whisky from defendant, and paid the latter 25 cents each for the drinks and $2.50 for the pint bottle; that there were several other persons whose names the witness did not know and also defendant's two brothers in the room at the time; that some of the "other men" appeared to be under the influence of intoxicating liquor. Said Saleskie testified that he was with Remegie at the Pacific Hotel on the 3d of May, and that he was there also on the 4th of May; it was about 4:30 p. m. that he and Remegie were at said hotel on the 3d of May; he, Remegie, and the defendant at that time "shook dice" for the drinks; they played ten games; Remegie lost four, witness three, and defendant three; they were then "taken to the back" or the "kitchen"; they "had ten drinks coming; witness paid defendant for three drinks of 'moonshine whisky'" and Remegie for four, "and we took the balance out in cigars"; "around 11:55 of the same evening (3d of May) Mr. Remegie purchased six glasses, one round of drinks, and a pint bottle"; Remegie paid the money for the six drinks and the pint bottle to the defendant; all this occurred in the kitchen of the Pacific Hotel.

Cross-examination: A man named Cavanaugh suggested playing the dice game for drinks; defendant's two brothers were present, but they did not participate in the game; Cavanaugh was the man who appeared to be intoxicated.

Count 3. Remegie testified: On the evening of May 21, 1927, he, with Sheriff Byrnes of Mendocino county, a deputy sheriff and the district attorney, Gibson, drove to Ft. Bragg and parked their car near the Pacific Hotel; this was about 8:40 p. m. of the 21st; the officers then searched Remegie to be able to say that he then had no liquor on his person; no liquor was then found on his person; Sheriff Byrnes thereupon marked a $5 bill in a way that it could be identified and delivered it to the witness who, with the bill in his possession, immediately thereafter went to the defendant's hotel; on entering the hotel, Remegie first saw defendant's two brothers; he asked them where defendant was, and one or the other replied, "He is back behind"; witness conversed for a moment with the brothers, when defendant "came out, and went behind the bar and placed some money in the cash register."

Continuing, Remegie testified: "I then shook hands with him (defendant) and went in the back of the kitchen where I purchased four drinks of whisky at 25 cents a drink, and also purchased one pint of whisky for two dollars and a half from Privato Pozzi (defendant) with this marked $5 bill"; witness then left the premises and returned to where the car in which he and the officers mentioned rode to Ft. Bragg and "handed the bottle over to Mr. Gibson (district attorney); Sheriff Byrnes and his deputy, McDaniels, examined the bottle; about an hour later, witness, with Sheriff Byrnes and District Attorney Gibson, returned to the Pacific Hotel, "raided" the place, and, among other articles, found the marked $5 bill in defendant's cash register; they searched all the rooms of the hotel, in fact, they searched the premises inside and out; the search was first begun by Deputy Sheriff McDaniels and another deputy, known as "Frenchie" Brochner; witness did not know what, if anything, in the way of incriminatory evidence was found at that time; later a more thorough search was made by the sheriff, district attorney, and witness; they found no liquor about the premises; they found a 5-gallon vinegar keg; it had a strong odor of whisky; witness was certain that it "smelled of moonshine whisky."

C. H. McDaniels, deputy sheriff, assisted in the search. He corroborated Remegie as to parking near the hotel, the search of Remegie's person as told by the latter, and that no liquor was found on the person of Remegie; was instructed before proceeding with the search of defendant's place to guard the cash register; found in the cash register the marked $5 bill spoken of above; saw and smelled the "5 or 10 gallon" keg mentioned by Remegie; it "smelled of whisky"; also found a "funnel and syphon, which both smelled of moonshine whisky, and there was a trough to the side of the dining room in the rear of the place with quite a number of pint bottles there which recently had been washed out, and one bottle contained a half teaspoonful of moonshine whisky; there was also one case of empty pints there; probably those cases hold about 24 dozen; it was a large case; * * * they were regular pint flasks like these," referring to some bottles taken from defendant's place on the night of the search and introduced in evidence; 5 glasses were found on and taken from a table in the kitchen, which "smelled of" whisky; a bottle was found in the trough "to the side of the dining room."

Sheriff Byrnes corroborated the testimony of McDaniels in all vital respects as to the circumstances of the search of defendant's premises on the evening of the 21st of May, 1927, and the results of such search, and also as to the marking of the $5 bill from which the payment for a bottle of liquor was made and the finding of said bill in the cash register of the defendant at the time the search was in progress. The details of the sheriff's testimony need not be recited herein. It should be stated, though, that the sheriff further testified that, on either the 20th or the 21st of September, 1927, he stepped into the defendant's hotel and into the kitchen and there saw several men playing dice at a table, on which also, at the same time, there were standing several whisky glasses and a pint bottle "partly full of whisky." The glasses had just been used, as they "smelled of" whisky. The defendant and his two brothers and three other men were standing by the table. This was near the hour of 7 a. m. The defendant himself did not testify at the trial, nor did he introduce any testimony in his defense. His brother, Palmiro Pozzi, was called to the stand by the people and testified that the defendant was the owner of and conducted the hotel at all the times mentioned herein. No one can reasonably doubt from a perusal of the testimony as above given that each offense stated in the information is amply supported.

[10] 4. The complaint that the court erred in refusing to submit to the jury certain instructions proposed by the defendant is not well founded. The principles declared in the instructions so proposed and by the court rejected, where pertinent to the case, were clearly set forth in the court's charge. The principal criticism in this particular is that the court failed to instruct the jury that the purpose for which testimony of sales of liquor by defendant prior and subsequent to the 1st of April, the 3d of May, and the 21st day of May, 1927, was not to prove other different and distinct offenses from those charged in the information, but merely to show the purpose for which defendant kept intoxicating liquor in his possession and the character of the place; that refusal by the court to adopt into its charge an instruction proposed by defendant covering that proposition emphasized the prejudice resulting to the rights of the accused by the court's omission and refusal thus to instruct the jury. We are somewhat at a loss to understand why such complaint is made, since within the charge delivered by the court to the jury is embraced a clear statement of the rule referred to. Indeed, upon all the principles pertinent to the case as made, the instructions given to the jury were full, clear, and correct, and afforded sufficient enlightenment upon the law of the case to enable the jury to perform their important duties intelligently and justly. The case was fairly tried, and the verdict as to each count of the information appears to be just.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

91 Cal. App. 121

O'NEILL v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 3491.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 18, 1928.

1. Master and servant 🔑417(7)—Findings that employee unreasonably refused medical treatment, not shown to have been tendered to him, held unwarranted (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 16).

On insurance carrier's application for limitation of liability under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831), Industrial Accident Commission's findings that employee unreasonably refused medical treatment tendered him by applicant and that his failure to submit to hospitalization and medical care and his insistence on chiropractic treatments were unreasonable held not supported by record, in absence of showing that any tender of medical or surgical treatment was ever made to him by employer or insurance carrier, or that he would not submit readily to examination provided for in section 16.

2. Master and servant 🔑405(6)—Evidence held to show injured employee entitled to compensation for services of nurse and physician called by his relatives (Workmen's Compensation Act).

On insurance carrier's application for limitation of liability under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831), evidence held to show that injured employee was entitled to compensation for services performed by nurse and medical treatment given him by physician called by his relatives on employer's failure to furnish proper medical treatment for two weeks after injury.

3. Master and servant 🔑393½, 404—Insurer's failure to tender medical treatment until after employee secured treatment did not bar such tender and proof of proper treatment on application to limit liability (Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 9, 16; § 11, subd. E).

Employer's neglect to furnish injured employee proper medical treatment for two weeks after injury, and insurance carrier's failure to tender proper treatment until after employee secured treatment for himself, held not to bar insurance carrier's right to make such tender and present to Industrial Accident Commission proof of what treatment should be given on application for limitation of liability, in view of Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 9, 16, and section 11, subd. E (St. 1917, pp. 836, 842, 845).

Application by the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, for limitation of its liability on any claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Law, by Gilman F. O'Neill, employee, against Charles F. Gildersleeve, employer. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission limiting applicant's liability, the employee brings certiorari. Award set aside in part and cause remanded.

Wallace Rutherford, of Napa, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner and R. P. Wisecarver, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Upon the application of the petitioner this court heretofore issued its order directing the respondent Industrial Accident Commission to certify to this court a transcript of the record of the proceedings had before said body wherein it was found that the petitioner was not entitled to be reimbursed for his reasonable medical and hospital treatment after the 23d day of September, 1927, and further found that on said date the petitioner unreasonably refused medical treatment tendered him by the insurance carrier, and further finding that the failure of the employee to submit to hospitalization and medical care in San Francisco and his insistence upon the chiropractic treatments are unreasonable, and the insurance carrier is not liable for such portion of disability or death caused, continued, or aggravated by such refusal of medical treatment, and thereupon limiting the award to the petitioner herein to the sum of $16.67 a week beginning as of September 11, 1927, as disability indemnity.

The record shows: That the petitioner, prior to and on the 3d day of September, 1927, was a laborer employed by Charles H. Gildersleeve, of Mendocino county, near the town of Covelo. That on said date the petitioner was riding with a truck driver on a truck going after a load of lumber, when by some means the truck was overturned and the petitioner received an injury to the twelfth dorsal vertebra, resulting in paralysis from the hips down. That at the time of his employment petitioner was receiving a wage of $27 per week. Immediately after the injury Charles H. Gildersleeve employed one Dr. Osborne to care for the petitioner. Dr. Osborne gave the petitioner a narcotic to allay the pain, treated the cuts and abrasions on the petitioner's body, assuring him that he was suffering from shock and would soon recover the use of his limbs. Dr. Osborne did nothing further and went away on a camping trip without making any arrangements for the care of the petitioner, the petitioner being left in a bunkhouse at the camp belonging to the employer. On September 4, 1927, Dr. Hogshead, of Covelo, was called into the case. He treated the cuts and abrasions for the period of two weeks, caused the petitioner to be removed to a private hospital operated by a practical nurse, but other than taking care of the immediate daily necessities of the petitioner and caring for the cuts and abrasions, did nothing toward caring for petitioner's spine or to relieve the petitioner from the paralysis above mentioned. This continued for a period of about two weeks, during which period of time the employer visited petitioner occasionally, knew of petitioner's physical condition, but neither the employer nor the insurance carrier made any arrangements for nor performed any act toward taking proper care of the petitioner or giving him proper medical or surgical treatment. After the lapse of about two weeks the relatives of the petitioner, learning of his condition, caused him to be moved to the city of Napa and placed in the home of a trained nurse, where three doctors were called in to the case. It appears that Dr. Virginia Enos, a chiropractor, was employed to reduce the dislocation of the twelfth dorsal vertebra. Dr. Welty was first called to look after the physical condition of the petitioner and subsequently Dr. Dawson.

The record shows that Dr. Welty, after being called upon the case, made some arrangements, not disclosed, to remove the petitioner to a hospital and engaged the services of an ambulance to be used in such removal. This appears, however, to have been done without any consultation with the petitioner or any of his relatives who had brought him from Covelo to Napa. Dr. Welty then retired from the case. Subsequent to this it appears that Dr. Dawson prescribed for the petitioner, and Dr. Enos gave chiropractic treatments to reduce the spinal dislocation. The record also sets forth that X-ray photographs were taken of the petitioner's spine while at Napa, and the record contains photostatic copies thereof. On or about the 23d day of September, 1927, an agent of the insurance carrier, in conference with the mother, father, and sister of the petitioner, at Napa, tendered the treatment of a specialist in San Francisco, the name of the specialist not being given. This tender was not accepted. The record, however, shows that the offer was not made personally to the petitioner, and that the petitioner did not hear anything about such offer. On the 3d day of October, 1927, the insurance carrier filed with the Industrial Accident Commission an application for adjustment of the claim of the petitioner that might be made under the Workmen's Compensation Law of the state (St. 1917, p. 831), setting forth the injury suffered by the petitioner, the fact of his still being disabled, and seeking to have its liability limited on the theory that the employee had unreasonably refused to submit to medical or surgical treatment, etc. Upon this hearing it is contended that the findings of the commission are not supported by the testimony, that the conclusion based thereon is therefore erroneous, and that the matter should be returned to the commission for further hearing. That the petitioner in this case was neglected by the employer for the period of at least two weeks after his injury is a conceded fact, and that during said period of time, no proper medical treatment, and in fact no proper treatment of any kind was given the petitioner, and that under such circumstances, as the act provides, the petitioner was justified in obtaining treatment.

[1] The findings and conclusion of the commission appear to be based upon the following letter written by Dr. Harbaugh, M. D., in response to a memorandum previously submitted by the commission:

"San Francisco, Oct. 26, 1927.

"Attention, Mr. Campbell.
"Subject: Gilman F. O'Neill—Claim No. 23616.

"In answer to your memorandum of October 25th, I would state that in my opinion the man's refusal to accept the treatment tendered by the insurance company is unreasonable and should be so interpreted by the Industrial Accident Commission. I do not believe that at this time we should enter into any discussion as to whether he has been benefited by the treatment of the chiropractor. I believe it would be unfair to the insurance carrier and, in my opinion, against the best interests of the man to make any other decision in the case.

"R. W. Harbaugh, M. D.,
"RWH:LD Asst. Medical Director."

While this letter was proper to be considered by the commission, the conclusion therein stated, or the opinion expressed, or the direction as to how the act of the petitioner should be interpreted, must be read in the light of the record. Dr. Harbaugh's letter, to the effect that "the man's refusal to accept the treatment tendered by the insurance company is unreasonable," can only be given weight by assuming that the insurance carrier had tendered some treatment. As we have stated, however, the record shows without any question that the insurance carrier never tendered the petitioner any treatment whatever. An agent of the insurance carrier did have a conversation with certain relatives of the petitioner, but information concerning the same was never conveyed to the petitioner. The record shows that the petitioner was over 23 years of age, and nothing appears in the record showing why he might not have been individually consulted or the tender made to him personally. At the time of the hearing in October, 1927, and the taking of testimony in relation to the application filed by the insurance carrier, the record discloses that the referee had some conversation with the injured man which, however, constituted no tender on the part of the insurance carrier, as will appear by the following excerpts which we set forth:

> (By the Referee): "Mr. O'Neill, what is your attitude in the event that the insurance company should tender you the names of three physicians, approved by the commission, or recognized by the commission, as qualified to treat your particular injury, for your spine, and a neurologist, who are capable of treatment of the spinal cord or nerve injury, and hospitalization in a hospital in San Francisco, under the belief that by such hospitalization and under the care of those capable of treatment of your condition, would you reject such treatment?"

To which the injured man replied:

> "Well, now, you mean the way I feel like now, the way I am progressing, at the present state of progress I would not.
> "Q. What you mean is that you would rather continue in your present treatments so long as you are actually improving? A. Yes.
> "Q. My question is assuming the tender of three, three under the law, if you are dissatisfied with the physician treating you, you are entitled to ask for three, so assuming all these qualifications to be established, would you or would you not accept? A. Well, it is a hard question to answer, because if I continue to improve, I don't see why I should have a change.
> "Referee: The first question is as to whether he would or would not accept. Now there is this weakness in the situation, that a tender according to the terms I have outlined has not been made."

After some conversation as to the fact that no tender had actually been made by the employer or the insurance company, the referee asked the injured man the following question:

> "Am I to understand, Mr. O'Neill, from your statement, that your refusal of medical treatment of the type indicated is subject to revision in the event that diagnostic examination would indicate that your improvement was not an actuality as far as the spinal condition is concerned—your feeling on the matter to the contrary notwithstanding? Have I made myself clear? A. Well I will repeat. You mean if this tender, this offer, which I refused, if it wasn't proved to me that the condition hadn't improved?
> "Q. If it were shown. What is your answer? A. Well, now, if it could be shown it had not been improved, why certainly the treatment would be changed in that case."

Here follows some testimony in relation to the X-ray pictures which it was stipulated should be submitted to Dr. Harbaugh for examination and report thereon.

Under the state of the record in this case, as shown by the foregoing, the question of whether the petitioner was or was not receiving proper treatment, or whether chiropractic treatment for the employee's injury to the spine was or was not proper under the circumstances or such as should have been given, or whether a surgical operation should have been performed becomes wholly immaterial in view of the fact that no tender of medical or surgical treatment was ever made by either the employer or insurance carrier, for the injured man to refuse, and therefore the opinion of Dr. Harbaugh, "That the man's refusal to accept the treatment tendered by the insurance company is unreasonable," has absolutely nothing upon which to rest.

[2] No contention is made by the petitioner that he is entitled to recover his costs and expenses incurred for the services rendered by the chiropractor, but that he is entitled to compensation for the services performed by his nurse and also for the medical treatment given him by Dr. Dawson, which contention, under the facts disclosed by the record, should have been sustained. As we have stated, the record showing that nothing else was tendered, we cannot escape the conclusion that there is nothing in the record to support the last sentence of finding No. 3 of the commission, which reads:

> "On said date [referring to September 23, 1927], the employee unreasonably refused medical treatment tendered him by the insurance company, and is not entitled to be reimbursed for any expenses thereafter incurred."

Nor is there any testimony in the record to support finding No. 4 of the commission, which reads:

> "The failure of the employee to submit to hospitalization and medical care in San Francisco and his insistence upon chiropractic treatments is unreasonable, and the insurance carrier is not liable for such portion of disability or death caused, continued or aggravated by such refusal of medical treatment."

We may also add that there is nothing in the record which indicates that the employee would not submit readily to an examination as provided for in section 16 of the Compensation Act for the purpose of ascertaining whether his condition is being improved, or what other or different treatment should be given, if any, or whether any surgical operations should be performed.

[3] It was contended upon the argument that by reason of neglect on the part of the employer and the failure to make tender by the insurance carrier of proper medical treatment until after the petitioner had secured treatment for himself, that the right of the insurance carrier now to make such tender and present to the commission proof of what treatment should be given, is barred. We do not, however, think that this is a correct interpretation of the Compensation Act. The intent and purpose of the section to which we have referred, and also of section 9 and subdivision E of section 11 would lead to the conclusion that at any time during the continuance of the injury, the insurance carrier might tender additional medical services, ask for an examination, and present to the commission the facts, if such facts exist, showing the necessity for a change in treatment or what treatment should have been given, which, if refused, would relieve the insurance carrier from liability under subdivision E of section 11 if so found by the commission.

It follows from what we have said that the findings of the commission and the award based thereon must be set aside, save and except as to the allowance to the petitioner of $16.17 weekly benefits and $25 attorney's fee, and the cause remanded for further proceeding, and it is so ordered.

We concur: HART, Acting P. J.; JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

CONAWAY et al. v. YOLO WATER & POWER CO. (Sac. 3822.) ★

Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1928.

Rehearing Denied May 28, 1928.

1. Eminent domain ⇨69—Corporation, though possessing power of eminent domain, must make adequate compensation for taking or damaging private property (Const. art. 1, § 14).

Corporation, though possessing power of eminent domain, cannot, under Const. art. 1, § 14, take or damage private property without first making adequate compensation.

2. Eminent domain ⇨79, 80—Right to compensation for taking or damaging private property under power of eminent domain may be waived by owner (Const. art. 1, § 14).

Right to require adequate compensation for taking of private property under power of eminent domain, pursuant to Const. art. 1, § 14, may be waived by owner, and, in order to prevent obstruction of progress, he must be held to diligence in asserting his right as against a corporation administering public use.

3. Eminent domain ⇨79, 80—Landowners permitting irrigation company for five years to divert water from another watershed for use in irrigation cannot thereafter enjoin diversion.

Where landowners permitted irrigation company for a period of five years to divert water from one watershed and distribute it to other landowners within watershed in which their land was situated without objection thereto, they cannot thereafter enjoin such diversion; there being an intervention of public use attaching at inception of right of diversion and existing until it had wrought its purpose requiring a system of drainage.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, of Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by B. F. Conaway and others against the Yolo Water & Power Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed and remanded.

Rehearing denied: CURTIS, J., voting for a rehearing.

Elmer W. Armfield and Arthur B. Eddy, both of Woodland, Frank Freeman, of Willows, and John S. Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Arthur C. Huston, Charles W. Thomas, Hurst & Hurst, and Grant & Bailey, all of Woodland, and Downey, Downey & Seymour, Downey, Brand, Seymour & Dunn and White, Miller, Needham & Harber, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an action by plaintiffs, owners of certain lands lying at the mouth of a water course situated in Yolo county, known as Willow slough, seeking to enjoin defendant Yolo Water & Power Company, a corporation, and about eighty other defendants, from unlawfully draining into said water course, after use for irrigation, water theretofore conducted into this watershed from Cache creek.

Appellants have presented a brief in three volumes, which with the appendix covers some 2,500 pages. We mention it because it is admirably arranged, indexed, and cross-indexed, and is worthy of imitation; besides, it contains a full presentation of the law respecting the many issues raised. But in our view the appeal is determined adversely to them by a rule of public policy in the nature of an estoppel specially pleaded by the defendants.

We are also of the view that the complaint on its face shows this want of equity: The issues made by it were not enlarged to any extent by the answer or otherwise. Defendants answered with general and certain special defenses, but asked no affirmative relief of any kind. It is proper, therefore, to consider the legal effect of the material allegations of the complaint, which, as summarized by appellants, are, in substance, as follows:

That the defendant Yolo Water & Power Company is now, and at all times herein mentioned has been, a public utility corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, and engaged, in the diversion, sale, and distribution of water for irrigation purposes. That plaintiffs at all times herein mentioned have been and now are the owners and in possession, and entitled to the possession of, all those certain lands situate, lying, and being in the county of Yolo, state of California (describing them). That said lands are agricultural lands, and have produced and now are producing valuable crops of rice, beans, and grain and other crops, and are adapted to the production thereof.

That Willow slough is now, and from time immemorial has been, an unnavigable natural water course, having its source in or near the foothills in the southwesterly part of Yolo county, state of California, and flowing thence in a general easterly direction, and through and terminating on plaintiffs' said lands. That plaintiffs' said lands are flat and comparatively level, and are all lower than the lands hereinafter mentioned and being cultivated, worked, operated, and irrigated, as herein alleged by the defendants. That a portion of plaintiffs' said lands are lower than the natural banks of said Willow slough.

That Willow slough, where it crosses the westerly boundary line of the plaintiffs' said lands, has a deep bed and high banks. That easterly of said westerly boundary the bed of the said Willow slough becomes more shallow and the banks thereof lower, until the said bed and banks lose their identity, and the water flowing therein spreads out over the adjoining lands of the plaintiffs hereinabove described.

That in the late spring and during the summer and fall months, and during the time crops are customarily planted, grown, and harvested on plaintiffs' said lands, the natural water falling or rising within the watershed of said Willow slough and its tributaries, which finds its way ultimately into the said Willow slough, is small in quantity, and does not at such seasons fill the banks of said Willow slough, or spread out over plaintiffs' said lands where the bed and banks of said Willow slough lose their identity, as aforesaid, or elsewhere.

That, but for the acts of all of the defendants hereinafter mentioned and complained of, all of the said lands of the plaintiffs at all times herein mentioned have been and now are susceptible of being cultivated and cropped and valuable crops of rice, beans, and grain have been planted and produced thereon. That the natural water falling or rising within the watershed of said Willow slough and its tributaries and which finds its way ultimately into said Willow slough and flows therein, has not prevented, nor does not now prevent, plaintiffs from successfully cultivating their said lands, planting the same to crops, and harvesting profitable crops therefrom during the late spring, summer, and fall months of the year.

That defendant Yolo Water & Power Company within five years last past has been and now is diverting large quantities of water flowing in Cache creek, a natural water course, and by means of a system of canals, laterals, and ditches has carried and now is carrying the said water so diverted into the watershed of the said Willow slough and its tributaries, and has sold or otherwise disposed of, and now is selling or otherwise disposing of, the said waters so diverted in large quantities to all of the other defendants for the purpose of flooding vast areas of land devoted to the cultivation of rice and other agricultural and horticultural products, and for irrigation generally. That the defendant Yolo Water & Power Company at all times knew and now well knows that the said waters so diverted and now being diverted by it from said Cache creek, as aforesaid, found and now find their way into the said Willow slough, and flowed and now flow therein and through the same to the plaintiffs' said lands, spreading thereover, and causing the injury to the plaintiffs' said lands and crops hereinafter complained of.

That the watershed of which said Cache creek is the natural drainage channel is foreign to and entirely different and removed from the watershed of which the said Willow slough and its tributaries are the natural drainage channels.

That all of the defendants within five years last past have been and now are engaged in agriculture and have purchased or otherwise obtained, and now are buying or otherwise obtaining, water from the said Yolo Water & Power Company, or from other sources, which they have used and are now using for irrigation upon lands which they either own, lease, operate, or manage, all of which are situated within the watershed of the said Willow slough and its tributaries and at a higher elevation than the plaintiffs' said lands. That the said water, which has been and is now being so used by all of the said defendants for irrigation, has not been, and is not now being absorbed by the soil, but has been and now is by all of the said defendants being drained into said Willow slough and its tributaries by means of waterways, natural depressions, artificial channels, and ditches, and by seepage.

That the quantity of said irrigation water so drained by all of said defendants from said lands either owned, leased, operated, or managed by them has been and now is very great, and has been and now is unnaturally flowing in the said Willow slough, and has found and now finds its way by force of gravity and by seepage to the said lands of the plaintiffs and spreads thereover, and during the said cropping seasons the said water so spreading over and flooding the plaintiffs' said lands saturates the ground and prevents the cultivation thereof and makes it impossible to gather such crops as might be grown thereon, and destroys the same. That the said water which has been and now is being so used has and now does become charged and saturated with alkali and other saline substances and materials present and existing in and on the lands being irrigated by the defendants, as aforesaid. That the said alkali and other saline substances and materials have been and now are being carried in solution in said irrigation water drained into said Willow slough and its tributaries, as aforesaid, to and upon the plaintiffs' said lands, thereby rendering the said lands unfit for agricultural purposes, and destroying the fertility and productivity thereof.

That all of said defendants either owning, leasing, operating or managing lands within the watershed of said Willow slough and its tributaries are now, by means of water developed by wells and pumps on their said lands and water purchased or otherwise obtained from the said defendant Yolo Water & Power Company, irrigating their said lands, as aforesaid. That the said defendants are continuing to develop water by means of said wells and pumps, and are continuing to purchase or otherwise obtain water from the said Yolo Water & Power Company and to use such water to irrigate said lands, as aforesaid, and all of said defendants continue and threaten and intend and will, unless restrained by an order of this court, drain all of the said water used for the irrigation of said lands, as aforesaid, into the said Willow slough and its tributaries, and discharge the same unnaturally, through said slough and its tributaries onto and over plaintiffs' said lands, and will by such acts continue to prevent the cultivation of plaintiffs' said lands and the operation thereof, and render impossible the harvesting of crops growing and standing thereon, and will destroy the same, and will injure the freehold, all to the great and irreparable damage and injury of these plaintiffs.

That the continuation by defendants of all of the acts herein complained of by plaintiffs will ripen into and constitute a right adverse to plaintiffs. That plaintiffs have no plain, speedy nor adequate remedy at law.

That, unless defendants are restrained, as plaintiffs hereinafter pray that they be, defendants will continue to drain said waters into said Willow slough and its tributaries and onto plaintiffs' said lands. That it will be impossible for plaintiffs to ascertain or determine the amount of damage or injury sustained by them by reason of each of the acts of defendants herein complained of. That, if defendants continue to do the acts and things herein complained of by plaintiffs, plaintiffs will be compelled to bring many actions against each of said defendants for the commission by each of them of the torts hereinabove complained of. That the bringing of such actions would be continuous, and would result in a multiplicity of actions.

[1, 2] It is perfectly true that not even a corporation possessing the power of eminent domain may under the Constitution (article 1, § 14) take or damage private property without first making adequate compensation. But this right may be waived by the owner, and, in order to prevent the obstruction of progress, he must be held to diligence in asserting his right as against a concern administering such a public use. If he allows his property right to be invaded and either taken or damaged for a public use, and the public right has so far intervened as to justify the belief that objection has been waived, then in law the property right so taken or damaged is to that extent dedicated to the public use.

"Where the complainant has stood by while the development was made for public use, and has suffered it to proceed at large expense to successful operation, having reasonable cause to believe it would affect his own water supply, the injunction should be refused and the party left to his action for such damages as he can prove. Fresno, etc., Co. v. Southern Pacific Co., 135 Cal. 202 [67 P. 773]; Southern California R. Co. v. Slauson, 138 Cal. 342 [71 P. 352, 94 Am. St. Rep. 58])." Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 136, 74 P. 766, 772 (64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35).

"So far as this company is concerned, the case comes within the rule established in Fresno, etc., Co. v. Southern Pacific Co., 135 Cal. 207, 67 P. 773, and followed in Southern C. R. Co. v. Slauson [6 Cal. Unrep. 874], 68 P. 107, and Crescent Canal Co. v. Montgomery, 143 Cal. 252, 76 P. 1032 [65 L. R. A. 940]: This rule briefly stated, is that where one whose property is taken for a public use has stood by without objection, knowing that it was so taken and applied, and has allowed the public use to be instituted and carried on at great expense, and has permitted the people benefited thereby to adapt themselves to the new conditions and avail themselves of the conveniences and advantages thereby afforded, he cannot thereafter maintain an action to enjoin the continuance of such public use or to recover possession of the property so taken, but will be relegated to an action for damages." Barton v. Riverside Water Co., 155 Cal. 509, 515, 101 P. 790, 792 (23 L. R. A. [N. S.] 331).

"It is plain to us that the facts of this case bring it squarely within the cases which hold that, where property is taken for a public use by a public service corporation and the owner of the property has not in an appropriate way objected to its being so taken, but has, by silence or quiescence, permitted the public use to be inaugurated and carried on for some period of time, he has thus waived or lost his right to proceed against such use of his property by ejectment or abatement. In such case, if he has suffered damage to his property by reason of such taking and use of his property, he is, of course, entitled to be compensated in damages. The Constitution expressly gives him this right (Const. art. 1, sec. 14), and such right in the plaintiff here is not denied by the respondent. But, in the case stated, the owner is restricted to the relief which is obtainable in an action for damages. The theory of the rule as above stated is that after property is taken for a public use by a public service corporation and has been devoted to that purpose, the public thereby and thereupon acquires rights in such public use which cannot be divested or destroyed at the behest of a private individual upon the ground or for the reason that his property will suffer damage or deteriorate in value, or even become valueless for the purposes to which it is peculiarly adapted and for which it has always been used, by reason of the act depriving him of such of his property rights as were necessary for the installation and prosecution of the public use." Reed v. Oakdale Irr. Dist., 46 Cal. App. 139, 142, 188 P. 832, 833.

"The plaintiff's predecessor in interest stood by while one million three hundred thousand dollars of the defendant's money was being expended in the erection of its dam, tunnel, and plant. He even assisted in some ways in the work by furnishing commodities which the defendant needed in the prosecution of its enterprise, and he sold part of his land to the defendant for a dam site. All this the plaintiff knew when he purchased the land, which he did while the defendant was in the midst of its work of building the dam and preparing to divert the waters of the river. It is impossible that he did not know that the purpose of this enterprise was for a public use; that the defendant was about to inaugurate a public service, and that the waters of the river when diverted would be used for the purposes to which it was afterwards put. In view of these facts, and of the fact that he waited four years after the public use began, and until thousands of people had become dependent upon it for light and power and necessary water for irrigation, his right to an injunction is barred by this intervening of the public interest." Holmes v. Snow Mountain W. & P. Co., 36 Cal. App. 394, 397, 172 P. 178, 180.

"In substance, the doctrine established by these decisions, tho not, strictly speaking, the doctrine of prescription, at least amounts to this: That where a person has suffered property belonging to him and under his control to be taken and devoted to a public use by one engaged in administering such use, and the matter has gone on so far that the beneficiaries thereof rely on its continuance and adjust their affairs accordingly, such owner having knowledge thereof and making no objection or protest, this conduct will be regarded by the courts as a dedication by such owner of the property to the particular public use, and he cannot thereafter interrupt nor prevent the same, his only remedy being to seek compensation for the property he has thus allowed to be taken, or as indicated in the Newport Case." Miller & Lux v. Enterprise Canal, etc., Co., 169 Cal. 415, 429, 147 P. 567, 573.

See, also, Gurnsey v. Northern Cal. Power Co., 160 Cal. 699, 711, 117 P. 906, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 185.

From the allegations of the complaint, it appears that defendant utility, in exercising a public use, has for approximately five years next prior to the filing of the complaint diverted water from one watershed into another, and distributed it to the other defendants, and the drainage from use has for all said period reached plaintiffs' lands through said slough, to their injury; that plaintiffs have made no objection thereto in any way, but have silently borne the injuries; that defendants intend to continue this use of the said waters to the continued detriment of plaintiffs. But no allegation is found charging defendants or any of them with an intention to enlarge the diversion or distribution of said water nor to increase the capacity of the diverting or transportation works. Nor is there any allegation of an intention on the part of any defendant to increase the amount of water to be used thereafter on any of his said lands, nor is there any allegation that an increase in the amount of drainage water is threatened. In other words, so far as alleged, there is no threat to increase the existing burden or drainage to plaintiffs' lands.

[3] Defendants pleaded in their answer the intervention of a public use, and called for an application of the above rule of estoppel. We can find no reason why it does not, as found by the court, fully operate in this case. Suit for this identical relief could have been instituted any day for approximately five years next preceding its actual commencement. Learned counsel for appellants contend that this rule is inapplicable because the public use in these waters spends its force on delivery to the rice grower at his premises, and that the drainage from the grower's lands is of no concern to the utility that furnishes the water, and that the private land proprietors are without power to invoke the rule. We cannot in this case subscribe to such limitation upon the doctrine.

The institution of this suit against both the utility and the water users argues strongly against the position, for, if this limitation be sound, then the utility is really not a necessary party to this litigation. If the rice growers purchased the water at the Cache creek diversion point, the public interest would cease there under this doctrine. Then, too, if the utility were to buy a drainage right from the plaintiffs it would be an ultra vires act under such doctrine. If the utility were to institute an action in eminent domain to acquire from plaintiffs a right of way or easement for the drainage of these waters, the action would fail for want of proof of exercise of a public use for such purpose. Irrigation without drainage is impossible. Rice growing without a large amount of drainage is impossible. The utility might not be able to sell water in this locality or even to exist without first providing a drainage system for its users. Drainage in some localities might be as important as the supply of water itself.

We think that under the allegations of this complaint the public use attaches at the inception of the right of diversion and exists until it has wrought its purpose, and in this case at least that point is not reached until a system of drainage is provided. The private owner, who stands by inactive, hesitating, or half-consenting until the burden to his land becomes a part of the public use, must content himself with legal as distinguished from equitable remedies for relief.

If we resort to the record, we find that the court, upon ample evidence, finds that the plaintiffs did not protest or object, but remained silent for more than five years; that they reconstructed and improved or manipulated the channel of this slough probably to better handle this drainage water, and for a season or two actually used this drainage in the growing of rice upon their own lands. The court also found that the use made of this drainage by the upper users on the watershed of the slough was such that plaintiffs could not at any time mentioned herein have been ignorant of the damage, if any, that these drainage waters have done or would or will do. The court further found that there was no other feasible method of drainage except through said slough and through plaintiffs' lands, and, so relying on this fact, the utility spent large sums of money to equip itself to divert and distribute these waters, and, too, that the rice growers spent large sums in preparing their lands for rice culture and to receive and apply their quota of these waters. Defendant utility has therefore acquired with the same effect as if it had sued in eminent domain the right or easement to burden the lands of plaintiffs to the extent alleged in the complaint and found by the court. The answers also make the following defenses: Laches, statute of limitations, irrevocable license, and some others. We deem it unnecessary and inadvisable, however, to discuss these additional special defenses, but we are not intending to have it inferred that we think they are all without merit.

So much of the judgment as denies plaintiffs an injunction is affirmed, but the cause is remanded, with permission to them to pursue herein, if so advised, any other remedy not inconsistent with the holding here announced.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

In the matter of the application of Herbert O. Reed, Frederick S. Shooter, and others to have titles to certain lots or parcels of land registered and certified, opposed by Helen T. Peairs. From a decree of registration as prayed for in the application, respondent appeals. Affirmed.

James W. Bell, of Los Angeles, and Earl A. Bagby, of Oakland, for appellant.

Wilson & Snow, of Los Angeles, S. Lackman, of Long Beach, and J. K. Wilson and C. E. Snow, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This proceeding had its inception in an application filed in the superior court, in and for the county of Los Angeles, by one Herbert O. Reed and ten other applicants, among whom was the respondent herein, Frederick S. Shooter, to have their and each of their respective titles to certain lots or parcels of land registered and certified under the provisions of the initiative law adopted by the people of the state of California at the general election held November 3, 1914, entitled, "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the certification of land titles and the simplification of the transfer of real estate,' approved March 17, 1897." St. 1915, p. 1932. Due notice having been given of said application, the appellant herein Helen T. Peairs, who was alleged in the application to claim some right or interest in one of the parcels of land described in said application, appeared to contest the title of the respondent to said parcel of land and his right to the registration thereof under said act. The trial court, when the issues were thus made up and the proceeding called for trial, made an order of reference to the official referee to take evidence and report to the court. The parties appeared before the referee, and a hearing was held by him without objection, during which such testimony and evidence as the respective parties wished to present were offered, and, the matter being submitted, the referee made his report embodying such evidence, together with his conclusions thereon; whereupon a further hearing was had in the trial court, during which the appellant herein presented her objections to the report of the referee and to certain evidence which had been offered and admitted before him. She did not, however, include among these any objection to the order appointing said referee or to the hearing had before him as such. The trial court overruled the appellant's objections and adopted the report of the referee as its findings in said proceeding, and upon the conclusions of law drawn therefrom found the title to the premises in question to be in the petitioner, and it thereupon made and entered its decree of registration as prayed for in said application. It is from said decree that this appeal has been taken.

[1] The first contention which the appellant urges upon this appeal is that the trial court was in error in ordering a reference in this proceeding, for the alleged reason that there is no express authority to be found in the Initiative Act under which this proceeding was instituted for the appointment of a general referee. We are of the opinion that this objection is without merit for two main reasons, the first of which is that the proceeding for registration of land titles under the said initiative law is in the nature of a special proceeding over which the superior court has been given jurisdiction under the provisions of that law, and is also in the nature of an equitable proceeding analogous to an action to quiet title, and hence is such a proceeding as comes within the contemplation of sections 638 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provide for references and trials by referees, and particularly section 639 thereof, which provides that:

> "When the parties do not consent, the court may, upon the application of either, or of its own motion, direct a reference in the following cases: * * * 4. When it is necessary for the information of the court in a special proceeding."

This subject was exhaustively considered by this court in the case of Frances Inv. Co. v. Superior Court, 189 Cal. 107, 208 P. 105, wherein it was definitely decided that a proceeding under the Torrens Land Title Act was in substance and effect an action to quiet title.

[2] The additional reason why the objection of the appellant herein to the order of reference made by the trial court is without merit is that no objection was made by the appellant to the making of said order, nor was any such objection urged by her before the trial court at the time of the hearing upon the report of the referee, nor at the time of making an entry of the decree of the trial court based thereon.

The appellant's next and main contention is that the conclusions of law and the judgment made and entered thereon, from which this appeal has been taken, is unsupported by the evidence in the case. A review of such evidence and of the rulings of the trial court made thereon becomes necessary in order to determine this contention. The title to the premises involved in this appeal was acquired by one Peter McMahon in the year 1887. He allowed the taxes assessed thereon to become delinquent through several years, as a result of which the property was sold to the state in 1902 and again in 1908. On April 26, 1910, Frederick S. Shooter, the respondent herein, redeemed said property from all previous tax sales, and thereupon received a redemption certificate in due form. It does not appear from this record by virtue of what right or interest in said premises Shooter exercised the privilege of paying said delinquent taxes or of receiving said redemption certificate. But, however, that may be, after the issuance thereof to him, and on the 28th day of June, 1910, Shooter by quitclaim deed conveyed all his right, title, and interest in the property in question to one John R. French, who shortly thereafter commenced an action in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles to quiet his title thereto, in which action the said Peter McMahon was made a party defendant and was personally served with process. He failed to appear or to answer, and his default was duly entered, and thereafter, and on December 8, 1910, after a hearing before said court, judgment was rendered and entered in said action in favor of said French and against said McMahon, and in which the court adjudged and decreed that said French was the owner of said property, and that the adverse claims of said McMahon and all other persons claiming or thereafter to claim said premises under him were declared to be invalid. The record discloses that just before the date of the commencement of said action said John R. French had made and signed a quitclaim deed of said property to said Frederick S. Shooter, and that he had handed said deed to one C. C. Grove, as his agent with instructions to deliver it to Mr. Shooter if and after a decree in favor of French was entered in said action.

[3] It is one of the contentions of the appellant that the said conveyance of French to Shooter, being a quitclaim deed, conveyed no other or further title to the latter than that which the grantor named therein had upon the date of the making and execution of said conveyance, and hence that whatever right or title in or to said premises was gained by the making and entry of the decree in his said action to quiet title against McMahon was in the nature of an after-acquired title, which did not pass to Shooter under the terms of said quitclaim deed. We are of the opinion, however, that the delivery of said deed to Grove, the agent of the grantor, with instructions to complete the delivery thereof by handing the same to Shooter after the entry of the said decree, was in the nature of an escrow, and that it was clearly not the intention of the grantor in said deed that the same should be operative as a present conveyance at the time of his delivery thereof in said escrow, and that, this being so, the doctrine of relation cannot be held to apply to such a conveyance, and that whatever title was intended thereby to be transferred by French to Shooter must be held to have become effective as such transfer at the time of the final delivery of said conveyance to the grantee named therein. This question seems also to be fully covered by our decision in the case of Whitney v. Sherman, 178 Cal. 435, 173 P. 931, wherein the provisions of section 1057 of the Civil Code are given application to such a case as this, and wherein it is held, in conformity with said section of the Code, that a grant in escrow upon condition takes effect upon the performance of such condition and upon its delivery by the depositary to the grantee. It follows that whatever right or title in and to said premises the plaintiff in said action to quiet title gained thereby as against the defendant McMahon and his successors in interest passed to the respondent herein upon the delivery of said quitclaim deed, and became, as against the latter, an absolute title when said judgment became final. Thereafter, and on February 7, 1912, one William J. Farrow received a quitclaim deed to said premises from said McMahon, which he recorded, and which deed forms the foundation of whatever right or title Helen T. Peairs, a subsequent grantee of said Farrow, has since asserted and now asserts to said premises. On September 14, 1921, Helen T. Peairs, as the grantee of said William J. Farrow, commenced an action in the superior court, in and for the county of Los Angeles, against Frederick S. Shooter, wherein she sought to have her title quieted and to have it declared that she was the owner in fee of said premises, and that said Shooter had no right, title, or interest therein.

This cause came on for trial in said court on January 30, 1923, and, after a full hearing thereon, the court made and entered its decree dated November 24, 1923, wherein it was declared and decreed that Helen T. Peairs "is not now and never was the owner or entitled to the possession of all or any portion of the premises involved in said action." No appeal having been taken from said judgment, it in due time became final. Upon the hearing of the instant proceeding before the referee, the records, respectively, of the two foregoing cases and of the judgments made and entered therein were offered in evidence in support of the title of said Shooter and in opposition to the claim of title of the appellant herein, and were admitted in evidence both upon said hearing and before the trial court upon the report of the referee, and apparently formed the basis of the findings and judgment of the trial court in this proceeding, to the effect that the applicant Shooter was the owner of the title in fee to said premises, and that Helen T. Peairs, the appellant herein, had no right, title, or interest therein.

[4] That these two judgments are conclusive upon the question of the ownership of the record title to said premises by the respondent Shooter, and of the total absence of any right or title of the appellant therein, we entertain no doubt. The appellant does not seem to seriously contend that said judgments are not final and conclusive in so far as they relate to any title which she might assert in said premises or any portion thereof as the successor in interest of said McMahon. Her contention at the final analysis seems to be that, since the record is silent as to the original source of the respondent's right to redeem the premises in question from the several tax sales to the state of California, the title to said premises still remains in the state, and hence that said Shooter has shown no right to the registration to said title in favor of himself as the owner of said premises. Whatever right, if any, the state might have asserted in said premises at any time would seem to be utterly immaterial. As between the plaintiff French in the aforesaid action to quiet title and said McMahon, and hence his successors in interest, the question of the foundation of the title of said Shooter and of his right to redeem said premises from the sales thereof to the state was finally set at rest by the terms of the judgment and decree in said action, and was again determined and set at rest in the subsequent suit to quiet title to the same premises instituted by Helen T. Peairs as the successor in interest of said McMahon against the respondent herein. By virtue of these two judgments, the appellant herein was fully and finally concluded from asserting any title in herself to said premises in the instant proceeding, and whatever the strength or weakness of the original right and title of the respondent Shooter, in and to said premises, it was sufficient to form the foundation of the judgment and decree of the court in the instant proceeding as against one who had been finally concluded by the foregoing judgments from asserting any right or title in or to said premises or any portion thereof.

The motion to dismiss the present appeal might well have been granted upon the ground that the appellant was not a party aggrieved by the judgment appealed from, but we have preferred to consider and decide this cause upon its merits.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCOTT v. BECK. (L. A. 8103.)

Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1928.

1. Quieting title 🔑44(4)—Evidence of actual possession by plaintiff and her grantor prima facie established ownership, in action to quiet title.

In action to quiet title, evidence of plaintiff's actual possession of entire tract claimed, and that grantor was in possession at time of transfer, held sufficient prima facie to establish ownership in plaintiff.

2. Taxation 🔑615—Law applicable at time of sale for delinquent taxes follows through all proceedings dependent thereon.

Law applicable when sale of property was made to state for delinquent taxes follows through all proceedings dependent upon the sale.

3. Taxation 🔑746, 789(1)—Tax collector may convey property sold for taxes directly to purchaser, and such deed is pertinent to prove title (Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771, 3785b, as amended and added by St. 1913, pp. 556–558, §§ 1, 2, 4, and § 3786, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1103, § 2).

Tax collector, selling property for delinquent taxes under Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771 (as amended by St. 1913, pp. 556, 557, §§ 1, 2), section 3785b (as added by St. 1913, p. 558, § 4), and section 3786, subd. 5 (as amended by St. 1911, p. 1103, § 2), is authorized to convey property to the purchaser without the formality of making a deed to the state in the first instance, and such deed is pertinent and permissible piece of proof in support of chain of title.

4. Taxation 🔑734(7)—Tax sale held not void for failure to include property in delinquent list, where tax for previous year had been paid and properly appeared in addenda list (Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771, 3785b, as amended and added by St. 1913, pp. 556–558, §§ 1, 2, 4, and § 3786, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1103, § 2).

Tax sale, under Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771 (as amended by St. 1913, pp. 556, 557, §§ 1, 2), section 3785b (as added by St. 1913, p. 558, § 4), and section 3786, subd. 5 (as amended by St. 1911, p. 1103, § 2), held not void for failure to include description of property in delinquent list for the year of sale, where the property appeared in the addenda list attached thereto and to the notice of sale, and could not have properly appeared in delinquent list on account of payment of taxes for previous year.

5. Taxation 🔑788(5)—Tax deed is prima facie evidence of due publication and mailing of delinquent notice (Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771, 3785b, as amended and added by St. 1913, pp. 556–558, §§ 1, 2, 4, and § 3786, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1103, § 2).

Tax deed under Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771 (as amended by St. 1913, pp. 556, 557, §§ 1, 2), section 3785b (as added by St. 1913, p. 558, § 4), and section 3786, subd. 5 (as amended by St. 1911, p. 1103, § 2), is prima facie evidence of due publication of delinquent notice, and of fact that copy of notice as published was mailed.

6. Taxation 🔑734(7)—Failure to prove mailing of notice held not to render tax deed void, where it did not appear address of person to whom land was last assessed was known, or appeared on tax roll (Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771, 3785b, as amended and added by St. 1913, pp. 556–558, §§ 1, 2, 4, and § 3786, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1103, § 2).

Tax deed under Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771 (as amended by St. 1913, pp. 556, 557, §§ 1, 2), section 3785b (as added by St. 1913, p. 558, § 4), and section 3786, subd. 5 (as amended by St. 1911, p. 1103, § 2), held not void for failure to prove mailing of notice of delinquency to party to whom land was last assessed, where it did not appear by stipulation or otherwise that the address of such party appeared on the assessment roll or was known to tax collector, and where it was not affirmatively shown that the required notice was not mailed; the tax deed being prima facie notice of mailing.

7. Taxation ⚷693—Courts assume delayed tax sale was commenced within time required, but was continued from day to day (Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771, 3785b, as amended and added by St. 1913, pp. 556–558, §§ 1, 2, 4, and § 3786, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1103, § 2).

In absence of contrary showing, courts assume that delayed tax sale under Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771 (as amended by St. 1913, pp. 556, 557, §§ 1, 2), section 3785b (as added by St. 1913, p. 558, § 4), and section 3786, subd. 5 (as amended by St. 1911, p. 1103, § 2), was commenced within time required, and that sale was continued from day to day until property was sold to highest bidder.

WASTE, C. J. Action to quiet title to lot 93 in tract No. 909, situate in the city of Los Angeles. The statement of the case, as here quoted, is taken from the decision of the First District Court of Appeal, Division 1, rendered prior to the order for hearing in this court, and is adopted as part of this decision:

"The complaint alleged title in the plaintiff with right to possession. The averments of the complaint were denied by defendant, who alleged title in himself through a tax deed from the state of California. Neither of the parties to the action was in actual possession of the lot, which was unimproved. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the allegations of the complaint and the conclusion of the trial court that defendant had no title to the property.

[1] "The plaintiff, in support of her complaint, introduced in evidence a deed dated October 16, 1911, executed by Clara G. Spring et al., which in terms transferred the tract mentioned to Lizzie J. Brent, a deed from the latter and her husband to Brent Investment Company, a corporation, conveying the same property, together with a deed from the corporation to plaintiff of the lot in question, the latter transfer being dated April 3, 1913. The testimony of an officer of the corporation sufficiently shows that Lizzie J. Brent was in actual possession of the entire tract, and that the corporation likewise was in possession at the time of the transfer to the plaintiff. This evidence was sufficient prima facie to establish ownership in the plaintiff. Holthoff v. Freudenthal, 22 N. M. 377, 162 P. 173; Mitchell v. Titus, 33 Colo. 1042, 80 P. 1042; Rockey v. Vieux, 179 Cal. 681, 178 P. 712; Bond v. Aickley, 168 Cal. 161, 141 P. 1188; Kilfoil v. Warden, 46 Cal. App. 502, 189 P. 303.

"Defendant claims title as grantee under a tax deed dated August 4, 1919, executed by the tax collector of Los Angeles county. The deed recited that the lot described was duly assessed for taxation in the year 1913 to Lizzie J. Brent, and was thereafter, on the 3d day of July, 1919, duly sold to S. Beck by W. O. Welch, tax collector of the county of Los Angeles, for nonpayment of delinquent taxes which had been legally levied in the year 1913, and were a lien thereon; further stating the total amount for which the same was sold, and that all taxes levied and assessed against the property prior to the year 1919 had been paid and discharged.

"It appears from the evidence that the lot was assessed to the plaintiff in the years 1916 to 1920, inclusive, and that the taxes levied thereon after the year 1913 to and including the first installment of the year 1921 were paid by her, with the exception of the second installment of 1919, which became delinquent, and the lot was again sold to the state in 1920. Defendant redeemed the property from the latter sale, and, after the year 1920, the taxes levied thereon, with the exception of the first installment of 1921, were paid by him. The proceedings leading to the sale to defendant on July 3, 1919, were conducted under the provisions of sections 3764 and 3771 of the Political Code as amended in 1913 (Stats. 1913, pp. 556, 557). In the addenda attached to the published tax list and notice of sale appeared the name of Lizzie J. Brent, the person to whom the lot which was therein described was assessed for the delinquent taxes of 1913. The name of the plaintiff, who was the record owner in the years 1918 and 1919, and to whom the property was last assessed next before the sale in question, did not appear in the list or in the notice mentioned above. Furthermore, it was not directly shown at the trial that the tax collector complied with the provisions of section 3771 of the Political Code by mailing a copy of the list or publication to the last known post office address of the plaintiff. It is contended by the plaintiff that it was essential to the validity of the published notice that her name, as the owner and the person to whom the property was last assessed next before the sale, be inserted therein, and that the evidence was insufficient to show a compliance with the statutory requirement of notice by mailing.

"It was provided by section 3764 of the Political Code (Stats. 1913, p. 556) that on or before the 5th day of June of each year the tax collector must publish the delinquent list, which must contain, among other things, 'the names of persons and a description of the property delinquent', and that before its publication the tax collector and auditor should jointly arrange the list so as to designate in some particular manner the property contained in the list which was sold to the state five years previous under the provisions of section 3771 of the Political Code.

"It was provided by section 3771 of the Political Code (Stats. 1913, p. 557) that the property contained in the advertised list, as provided by section 3764 of the Political Code, which had not been redeemed from the previous sale to the state, be sold by the tax collector at public auction, and further that within five days after the first publication of the list the tax collector should mail a copy of the list or publication, postage prepaid thereon and registered, to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before such sale at his last known post office address. It was further provided by section 3785b of the Political Code (Stats. 1913, p. 558) that the tax collector should execute to the purchaser a deed to the property sold, this deed to contain certain recitals, those here material being as follows: That the property was duly assessed for taxation, the year assessed and the name of the person to whom assessed being stated, and was thereafter, on the date of the sale, duly sold by the tax collector to the grantee named for nonpayment of the delinquent taxes which had been legally levied in the year first mentioned, and were a lien on the property, no provision being made for a recital of the name of the owner or of the person to whom the property was last assessed next before the sale. It was also provided that no matters other than those stated in the section need be recited in the deed, which by subdivision 5 of section 3786 of the Political Code (Stats. 1911, p. 1103) was made primary evidence that 'at a proper time and place the property was sold as prescribed by law, and by the proper officer.'"

[2, 3] It must be kept in mind that we are dealing with, and speak of, the law as it was in July, 1914, when the sale of this property was made to the state for delinquent taxes of 1913. That law follows through all proceedings dependent upon that sale. Biaggi v. Ramont, 189 Cal. 675, 679, 209 P. 892. The sale in the instant case does not purport to have been made under sections 3897 and 3898 of the Political Code, which deal with the sale of delinquent property after a deed thereof has been made to the state, and a subsequent sale made to a purchaser. This sale was made under the provisions of sections 3764, 3771, and 3785b, supra, which must be construed together, and which comprise a complete plan for the sale of property for nonpayment of taxes. While the rule appears to be different if a sale is made under sections 3897 and 3898, if the sale is made to a purchaser under sections 3771 and 3785b, no provision is made for a deed to the state. The tax collector is authorized to convey the property directly to the purchaser without the formality of making a deed to the state in the first instance. Jacoby v. Wolff, 198 Cal. 667, 678, 682, 247 P. 195. His deed is a pertinent and permissible piece of proof in support of the defendant's chain of title. Jacoby v. Wolff, supra, page 684 (247 P. 195). See, also, Bernhard v. Wall, 184 Cal. 612, 623, 194 P. 1040.

[4] A description of the property in question was not included in the delinquent list for the year 1919, but did appear in the addenda list attached to the delinquent list and notice of sale. It could not properly appear in the delinquent list, for the tax for the previous year had been paid, and therefore was not delinquent. We are of the view that the publication was sufficient.

[5, 6] The respondent contends that the appellant has not established the validity of his title because he did not prove, or offer to prove, that notice was mailed to the party to whom the land was last assessed. The rule of law making the mailing of a copy of the delinquent list a jurisdictional prerequisite to the making of a valid tax deed by the tax collector has been limited by the more recent decisions of this court to cases where the last known post office address of the landowner was upon the assessment roll from the date of the delinquent assessment down to the assessment last made before the sale. Jacoby v. Wolff, supra, page 681 (247 P. 195); Kehlet v. Bergman, 162 Cal. 217, 218, 121 P. 918. It was stipulated in the court below that the real property was assessed in the name of the respondent on the 1918 tax roll, but it does not appear, by stipulation or otherwise, that the address of the respondent also appeared on the roll. The record is also silent as to whether or not the address was known to the tax collector from any other source. The only evidence on the subject of notice was a question propounded to the respondent by her own counsel as to whether or not she had ever received "any notice from" the appellant "that he had purchased the property." It does not in any way appear that the required notice was not mailed. The tax deed was prima facie evidence of the due publication of the delinquent notice and of the fact that a copy of the notice as published was mailed. Bell v. Brigance, 74 Cal. App. 322, 327, 240 P. 50. We are therefore unable to say that the deed was void for failure to mail notice. See Campbell v. Shafer, 162 Cal. 206, 213, 121 P. 737.

[7] Respondent contends that the sale to appellant was void because made more than 28 days from the time of the first publication of the notice. In the absence of a contrary showing, we may assume that the sale commenced within the time required, not less than 21 days, and not more than 28 days, after June 5th, the date of the first publication of the notice, and that the sale was continued from day to day until July 3d, when the property was sold to the highest bidder. Bell v. Brigance, supra.

CITTI v. BAVA. (S. F. 11363.)

Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1170(7)—In action by guest against automobile driver for personal injuries sustained in collision, admitting evidence of defendant's insurance carrier's settlement with motorist struck held reversible error (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In action by guest against automobile driver for personal injuries sustained in collision with car driven by A., admitting evidence of defendant's insurance carrier's settlement with A., not connected with act or admission of defendant, and concerning which he had nothing to do, held reversible error, despite Const. art. 6, § 4½.

2. Trial 🔑127—Examination of witnesses which suggests to jury that defendant is indemnified against judgment for damages is improper and prejudicial.

Line of examination of witnesses which suggests to jury that defendant is indemnified against any judgment for damages against him is improper, and prejudicial to defendant's rights.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1053(1)—In action by guest against motorist for injuries, striking out evidence that defendant's insurance carrier made settlement with driver of car struck did not cure error in admitting evidence.

In action by guest against automobile driver for personal injury sustained in collision of defendant's car with car driven by A., striking out evidence relating to settlement of defendant's insurance carrier with A. held not to cure error in admitting such evidence, especially where instructions to disregard testimony stricken did not extend to that portion which referred to defendant's indemnification.

4. Appeal and error 🔑977(1)—Trial court's conclusion on motion for new trial is not conclusive on appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 963, as amended by St. 1915, p. 209).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, as amended by St. 1915, p. 209, taking away right of appeal from an order denying motion for new trial, conclusion of trial court on motion for new trial, while entitled to much consideration, is not conclusive on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by F. Citti against Pietro Bava for damages for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal, 254 P. 299.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and J. E. Reardon, all of San Francisco, and H. A. Gabriel, of San Jose, for appellant.

R. V. Bressani and D. T. Jenkins, both of San Jose, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment on a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in an action for damages for personal injuries resulting from an automobile accident.

On the evening of September 26, 1922, the defendant was driving his six-passenger Haynes automobile from San Jose to San Francisco for the purpose of attending a wrestling match to take place the same evening. With him in the car as his guests were the plaintiff herein, R. Dei, who is the plaintiff in a case decided concurrently herewith, and two other men. The defendant drove his car through Cupertino, and arrived at the intersection of the highway with Fremont avenue at a point about 10 miles north of San Jose, at which intersection the defendant's car collided with a Ford car driven by one Louis Aftergut. The plaintiff and Dei were injured, and thereafter brought separate actions, based on the alleged negligence of the defendant in the operation of the car at the time of the accident. The evidence was sharply conflicting as to the speed of the defendant's car at the time. According to the plaintiff's witnesses, the defendant's car was traveling at a speed of 55 or 60 miles per hour. According to the defendant's witnesses, the speed of said car was from 15 to 25 miles per hour. The way in which the car overturned immediately after the impact indicates that the speed of the car was somewhere between the two estimates, but not necessarily at an excessive speed under the circumstances shown. Whether the defendant's car ran into the Ford or the Ford ran into the defendant's car was also involved in a conflict of the evidence. The plaintiff and Dei were seated in the rear seat of the defendant's car, and they testified that they admonished the defendant to slow down his car just before the accident. The defendant and the two other occupants of the car testified that no such admonition was given, and that there was no reason for any one to complain of the way the defendant was then driving his car. The contributory negligence of the plaintiff was pleaded, and was an issue at the trial.

[1, 2] The plaintiff called Louis Aftergut as one of his witnesses. Plaintiff's counsel, over the repeated and insistent objections of the defendant, interrogated this witness at length concerning a compromise and settlement which had been made with him by the Olds & Stoller Inter-Exchange under an insurance policy, which company plaintiff's counsel was particular to bring out was not a company in which Aftergut had a policy of insurance. The plaintiff also called as his witness one Curtaz, who, the record shows, was acting on behalf of the insurance carrier, and elicited from him the information that he was the person who negotiated the settlement with Aftergut, and that he was identified with the defense in the action.

The defendant is correct in his contention that it was error to admit evidence of the compromise and settlement. The record does not show any admission of the defendant of his liability independent of the settlement. Nor does it appear that the defendant himself made any offer of compromise to Aftergut or conducted any settlement negotiations with him. In fact, the record discloses that the defendant had never had any dealings with Aftergut, and that the settlement with the latter had been made by the insurance company. The evident purpose of counsel for the plaintiff was to prove the fact of the compromise and settlement with Aftergut by the insurance carrier of the defendant as an admission of liability on the part of the defendant and to get before the jury the fact that the defendant was indemnified by a policy of insurance. Independent of the fact of settlement, there was no endeavor to prove an admission of liability by the defendant in connection with the compromise. The evidence of the settlement, alone, not connected up with any act or admission of the defendant, and concerning which he had nothing to do, was clearly inadmissible in evidence. The error in admitting it might not in and of itself require a reversal, but, coupled with the avowed purpose and successful attempt of plaintiff's counsel to get before the jury, not only the fact of the settlement, but also that the settlement was made by the insurance carrier of the defendant, puts the case in a position where section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution will not save the judgment. The natural tendency of a line of examination that suggests to the jury that the defendant is indemnified against any judgment for damages against him is highly prejudicial to his rights, especially in a closely balanced case where the evidence otherwise would be easily sufficient on appeal to support a verdict either for the plaintiff or for the defendant. Such attempts on the part of counsel have frequently been held to be improper and prejudicial. Roche v. Llewellyn Iron Works, 140 Cal. 563, 74 P. 147; Pierce v. Mutual Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 P. 700; Dameron v. Ansbro, 39 Cal. App. 289, 178 P. 874; Arnold v. California Portland C. Co., 41 Cal. App. 420, 183 P. 171.

From an examination of the record in this case it is impossible for us to state that the jury would not have found a different verdict had the objectionable examination not taken place and the evidence not been admitted.

[3] The court granted the motion of the defendant to strike out the testimony with reference to the settlement with Aftergut, and instructed the jury to disregard the matter so stricken out. The plaintiff insists that this action of the court had the effect of curing whatever prejudice might have theretofore existed by reason of the presence of such testimony in the record. We are satisfied that the nature of said evidence was such and the purpose of its injection into the record so apparent as not to have been effaced by the granting of the motion and the admonition of the court. Furthermore, the instruction of the court to disregard the testimony stricken out related to that portion which referred "to the settlement," and did not extend to that portion which referred to the defendant's indemnification. This fact furnishes an additional reason why it cannot be said that the objectionable evidence with reference to the insurance company had no prejudicial effect on the minds of the jurors. What the verdict would have been in the absence of this "false quantity" so introduced into the case is not possible of definite or even proximate ascertainment. See Keena v. United Railroads, 197 Cal. 148, 158, 239 P. 1061; Wright v. Broadway Department Store, 199 Cal. 562, 250 P. 572.

The defendant complains of numerous instructions given by the court. They have been examined, and are found to be free from just criticism with the exception of instruction No. 12. In this instruction it is not made sufficiently clear that, in order for the plaintiff to recover, he must be free from contributory negligence on his part.

[4] Finally, the plaintiff contends that, as a motion for a new trial was denied, the court must have concluded that the defendant suffered no prejudice by reason of the reception of the objectionable evidence, and that the decision of the trial court is controlling in the premises, citing Lafargue v. United Railroads Co., 183 Cal. 720, 192 P. 538. The case relied on did not go to the length contended for by the plaintiff. That case merely decided that, under the facts there presented, the conclusion of the trial court on the motion for a new trial should not be disturbed by the appellate tribunal. That such was the fact is accentuated by the dissenting opinion, a portion of which was quoted with approval in the case of Keena v. United Railroads, supra, at page 159 (239 P. 1061). While it is true that the conclusion of the trial court on the motion for a new trial is entitled to much consideration, its decision thereon is not conclusive on appeal. Indeed, by the amendment of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 209) taking away the right of appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the right to have a review of such order on an appeal from the judgment was preserved. Wilcox v. Hardisty, 177 Cal. 752, 171 P. 947; 2 Cal. Jur. p. 828.

The judgment is reversed.

SIMPSON v. NEW YORK HARDWARE TRADING CO. (Civ. 3505.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 23, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 21, 1928.

1. Injunction 🔑130—Where lease would have been meaningless without extrinsic evidence relative to location of partition, meaning of lease was not solely law question.

In action by landlord to restrain first floor tenant from removing canopy from building and erecting a sign, where plaintiff alleged such removal and erection would interfere with rights of tenant of second story, meaning of the lease was not solely a question of law, where, due to use of words "as now partitioned off," extrinsic evidence was necessary to prevent lease from being meaningless, in that such evidence was required to show location of partition.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Trial court's finding on fact question held conclusive on appeal, where supported by substantial evidence.

Trial court's finding on question of fact as to meaning of lease held conclusive on appeal, where there was substantial evidence in the record to sustain such finding.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑37—Lease should be construed according to terms as a whole.

A lease should be construed according to its terms as a whole; the scope, purpose, and effect of the entire lease being looked to for its interpretation, rather than resort being had to any individual clause.

4. Trial 🔑404(1)—Findings are to be liberally construed in support of judgment.

Findings are to be liberally construed in support of judgment and, if possible, are to be reconciled so as to prevent any conflict upon material points.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1071(1)—Judgment will not be reversed on ground of conflict in findings unless conflict is clear and findings are incapable of being harmoniously construed.

A judgment will not be reversed on the ground of a conflict in the findings unless the conflict is clear and the findings are incapable of being harmoniously construed.

6. New trial 🔑70—Motions for new trial, based on insufficiency of evidence, are addressed to trial court's sound discretion.

Motions for new trial, based upon the insufficiency of evidence, are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court.

7. Appeal and error 🔑979(1)—Trial court's exercise of discretion in ruling on motion for new trial on ground of insufficiency of evidence to support findings will not be disturbed unless record shows abuse.

Trial court's exercise of discretion in granting or refusing a new trial upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings will not be disturbed on appeal unless the record shows an abuse of discretion.

8. New trial 🔑70—In landlord's action against tenant to restrain removal of canopy and installation of sign, denying defendant's motion for new trial because of insufficiency of evidence to support findings held not abuse of discretion.

In landlord's action against tenant to restrain removal of canopy and installation of sign, trial court held not to have abused discretion in denying defendant's motion for a new trial on ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support findings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Frank Simpson against the New York Hardware Trading Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from such judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Marcus L. Roberts, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank M. Bering and Victor Koenig, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. This action was brought by respondent for the purpose of obtaining a perpetual injunction against appellant, enjoining it from removing an ornamental iron marquee over the entrance of certain premises in the city of Los Angeles, and from erecting or placing a sign over the entrance to said premises. A decree was entered granting said injunction, and appellant now appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

The facts of the case may be briefly summarized as follows:

On November 12, 1925, respondent and appellant entered into and executed a lease containing the following provisions, to wit:

> "The lessor hereby leases to lessee, and lessee hereby hires and takes of and from lessor, those certain premises in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California, more particularly described as follows:
> "That certain storeroom known as 625 South Hill street, Los Angeles, Cal., together with the basement immediately thereunder, and the yard running to the alley immediately in the rear of said storeroom; said storeroom being the northerly half of the ground floor and basement as now partitioned off.
> "Lessee shall have the privilege, at its own expense, of constructing a one-story addition to the rear of said storeroom running as far as the alley.
> "No signs or other advertising matter shall be placed, installed, or maintained in or about the demised premises except as follows:
> "Such lettering on the windows as may be desired by the lessee, and one sign over the front of the leased premises below the level of the second story floor.
> "It is agreed that the lessee may alter the store front, said store front as altered to be the property of the lessor and such alterations to be at the expense of the lessee."

And a rider to said lease contained the following:

> "The conditions in the lease of October 1, 1925, from Frank Simpson to Frank Balzano appertaining to the front and rear stairway and the right of ingress and egress to and from the second floor of the building in which the demised premises are located are as follows:
>
> "The second floor of the building known as 625–627 South Hill street, together with the present stairway about five feet in width running to said second floor from the present doorway at the foot of said stairway, and the right of ingress and egress over a space five feet in width from Hill street to said doorway, and the right of ingress and egress from the rear of said second floor down the present stairway over a space four feet in width through the yard in the rear of said building as now being used by the 'Victor Hugo.'
> "It is agreed that if the permission granted to the lessee to construct an addition to said storeroom is exercised, that such additional construction shall during the life of this lease be subject to the easements and rights contained in the Balzano lease above mentioned and shall be for the benefit of the second floor of said building whether the Balzano lease shall terminate or not."

At the time said lease was executed, respondent was the owner of a two-story building and lot on South Hill street, Los Angeles, Cal. The ground floor of said building is divided by a solid wall (running east and west) into two rooms or stores. The northerly half of said premises is known as 625 South Hill street, and this is the portion with which we are here concerned. The entire second floor is occupied by a restaurant and is commonly known as 623½ South Hill street, and is referred to in the said lease as 625–627 South Hill street. Access is obtained to the same by means of a stairway in the front thereof, and one in the rear thereof. The front stairway abuts upon the north wall of the said building, and on the south side it is separated from the premises leased by a solid wall, which extends some four feet beyond the point where said stairs commence. From this end of said wall the north side of appellant's show window extends to the sidewalk line. The entrance to the premises in the second story is some six feet in width, but on account of the angle at which said window is constructed, it narrows down to some four feet at the point where it joins said wall. The length of said glass window is some six feet. Over the entrance to the second story of said premises is an ornamental metal marquee, more commonly known as a canopy, extending some eight feet over the sidewalk abutting upon said entrance, and being about six feet in width. The said premises on the second floor were leased on October 1, 1925, to one Balzano as a restaurant, and were occupied for that purpose at the time the lease in question was executed.

It will be seen that the said entrance way to said restaurant was entirely separated from the remainder of the store leased to appellant, by means of said wall and said north side of appellant's show window.

After the execution of said lease between the parties hereto, appellant commenced to alter its store front, and in so doing threatened to remove said marquee and to use the portion of the premises to which it was attached for placing, installing, and maintaining a sign, and the purpose of the suit was to enjoin such action so far as the marquee and sign were concerned.

The grounds for both appeals are the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and there is also an additional contention that the findings fail to support the judgment.

The only issue presented to the trial court for determination was based upon paragraph XIII of the complaint, which reads as follows:

"That the hallway and stairway hereinbefore described are not part of the premises demised to defendant."

Not only are the issues thus limited by the pleadings, but this is the position taken by defendant at the trial, as is clearly shown by the following colloquy between court and defendant's counsel:

"The Court: It seems to me that if you have the right to change that window, you would not have the right to change the sign over the entranceway. That is the real contention here; that is what you are contending about.

"Mr. Roberts: We contend this to be a part of our store front, and that we have the right to alterations, which would mean we have the right to remove.

"The Court: Am I stating the problem correctly?

"Mr. Roberts: Yes."

The findings of the court which are attacked are:

"Finding XV. The court further finds that said marquee extends out from and is attached to the store front of the premises leased by defendant, and is not so located as to prevent the alteration of said store front.

"Finding XVI. The court further finds that it is not necessary, in order to enable defendant to make the proper and necessary alterations permitted by said lease, to remove said marquee, and it has no right under said lease so to do.

"Finding XI. The court further finds that unless defendant is restrained from removing said marquee and from placing a sign over the entrance to said hallway, plaintiff will suffer irreparable injury which cannot be compensated in money damages.

"Finding XII. The court further finds that the hallway and stairway hereinbefore described are no part of the premises demised to defendant.

"Finding XIII. The court further finds that the description of the property leased to defendant is as hereinbefore described, and is not the northerly half of the ground floor and basement of the building owned by plaintiff, as divided from the southerly half by the partition now existing and dividing the same, subject to the rights of Frank Balzano herein under that certain lease agreement dated October 1, 1925, from Frank Simpson, the plaintiff, to Frank Balzano, to wit. 'The second floor of the building known as 625–627 South Hill street, together with the present stairway about five feet in width running to said second floor from the present doorway at the feet of said stairway, and the right of ingress and egress over a space five feet in width from Hill street to said doorway, and the right of ingress and egress from the rear of said second floor down the present stairway over a space four feet in width through the yard in the rear of said building as now being used by the "Victor Hugo."'

"Finding XIV. The court further finds that the building owned by plaintiff was, at the time of the execution of said lease, partitioned off by solid wall dividing the ground floor and basement of said building into the northerly and southerly half, and that the northerly portion of said northerly half was also partitioned off, so as not to include the entrance or stairway to the premises commonly known as 623½ South Hill street, Los Angeles, Cal.; that the premises leased to defendant by plaintiff, includes the northerly half of the basement and the ground floor of said building, except the space on the ground floor occupied by the stairway leading from the ground floor to the second floor, and except said space occupied by the entrance to said stairway from the floor of the building to the door at the foot of the stairway, which said door is approximately six feet in from the front line of said building."

The evidence before the trial court was the lease between the parties, and photographs and a blueprint showing the floor plans of the buildings. One of the photographs showed the buildings during the progress of alterations which appellant was making. These documents disclosed the situation very clearly, and the statement of facts is largely predicated upon them. The oral evidence before the court was extremely brief. The respondent, Simpson, testified that he was the owner of the premises; that it was a two-story building, the first floor being divided into two stores and the second into one; that the property known as 625 South Hill street is a part of the building. This was the only witness for respondent. Witness Spooner, for appellant, testified that the partition on one side of the stairway ended at the front of the glass (show window). He was a director of appellant corporation. The other witness for appellant, Guerrant, testified that he was president of appellant and that he executed the lease for the corporation.

The position of appellant is that it was entitled to remove said marquee and to use the portion of the premises above the entrance described, supra, for the reason that its lease covered that particular portion of the building. The purported authority for so doing is based upon the provision of the lease which refers to the premises demised as "being the northerly half of the ground floor and basement as now partitioned off." The question as to just what property was covered by the lease thus becomes one of fact for the determination of the trial court upon the evidence adduced at the trial, and extrinsic evidence was introduced for that purpose. The photographs and the blueprint delineate the partition. It is contended that, because a portion of the "partition" is composed of glass, therefore, no partition existed. We are not aware of any definition which restricts the word "partition" to any particular substance. It need only to partition, that is to say, to separate one space from another, and if it does that it is unquestionably a partition, regardless of the materials of which it is constructed.

[1, 2] The question is not one solely of law, as contended for by appellant. The lease would be meaningless unless evidence was introduced to show the extent of the demised premises "as now partitioned off." The court having found adversely to the contention of appellant on this question of fact, and there being substantial evidence in the record to sustain this finding, the inquiry, so far as this court is concerned, is ended, and we cannot disturb the conclusion reached in respect thereto. Taylor v. U. S. Fid. & Guar. Co. (Cal. App.) 260 P. 898; Gjurich v. Fieg, 164 Cal. 429, 129 P. 464, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 111.

It is claimed that the court erred in the construction of the lease in respect to certain reservation made in favor of the lessee of the second story The "rider" attached to the lease made the same subject to certain easements and rights contained in a lease between respondent and the said lessee of the second story. The easements referred to are those of ingress and egress over a space between the foot of the stairs leading to the second story and Hill street, said space being five feet in width on Hill street. Appellant contends that this clause indicated an intention on the part of his lessor to lease him the said entranceway subject only to said easement.

[3] It is no doubt the rule, as appellant states, that:

> "The scope, purpose, and effect of the lease must be determined from a consideration of it as a whole, rather than by a resort to any individual clause thereof." Lang v. Pacific Brewing Co., 44 Cal. App. 618, 187 P. 81.

Another clause in the lease described the property "as now partitioned off," and, as we have pointed out, the court located the partition by extrinsic evidence, and thus definitely settled the matter, which was purely a matter of fact, and not open for further consideration here.

[4, 5] In connection with the objection made by appellant that the findings fail to support the judgment, it is pointed out that one of the findings made by the trial court is as follows:

> "That said marquee extends out from and is attached to the store front of the premises leased by defendant" (Clk. Tr. p. 45), —and appellant contends that this finding justifies this court in directing the trial court to enter a judgment in its favor. As the court expressly found "that the hallway and stairway were no part of the leased premises and that appellant has no right under said lease to remove said marquee," the finding attacked might well be construed as referring merely to the fact that the marquee is attached to the building of which the leased portion is a part. The other findings leave no doubt as to the position and determination of the trial court on this question, nor has appellant taken the position that the said findings cannot be harmoniously construed. "Findings are to be liberally construed in support of a judgment and, if possible, are to be reconciled so as to prevent any conflict upon material points, and unless the conflict is clear, and the findings are incapable of being harmoniously construed, a judgment will not be reversed upon the ground of a conflict in the findings." Goodwin v. Snyder, 70 Cal. App. 98, 232 P. 763. We see no merit in this contention.

[6-8] The motion for new trial was made upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and this question has been fully covered. Motions of this character, based upon the insufficiency of evidence, are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be disturbed unless the record shows an abuse of such discretion. Waltz v. Silveria, 25 Cal. App. 717, 145 P. 169; Colusa R. R. v. Glenn, 25 Cal. App. 634, 144 P. 993. We cannot say that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion.

We are satisfied that the judgment of the trial court was in all respects just and correct.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

DAVIS v. SCHNEIDER. (Civ. 5815.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 21, 1928.

Appeal and error ⚷543—Trial court properly made minute order permitting substitution of copy of notice of appeal, in lieu of original, which was lost (Code Civ. Proc. § 1045).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1045, providing that, if original pleading or paper be lost, court may authorize copy thereof to be filed and used instead of original, trial court was justified in making minute order of April 7, 1925, permitting substitution of copy of notice of appeal, where original was in fact filed on June 24, 1924, but was lost.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Action by Mary Davis against George H. Schneider, administrator de bonis non of the estate of James Kinley, deceased, and George H. mitting the filing of a copy of plaintiff's notice of appeal to be used in lieu of the original. Notice of the entry of judgment in favor of defendants was served on April 26, 1924. Stipulations were filed whereby plaintiff was given to July 2, 1924, in which to prepare, serve, and file her bill of exceptions. A proposed bill of exceptions was served on July 2, 1924, and amendments thereto were proposed on July 10, 1924, most of which were accepted, leaving certain matters for settlement by the court. These matters appear from the record without recourse to the affidavit of Kimball Fletcher, one of plaintiff's attorneys. In this affidavit it is set forth that the affiant, in November, 1924, telephoned to Mr. Williams, one of the attorneys for the defendants, and asked Mr. Williams if he was ready to propose his amendments, to which Mr. Williams replied that he had lately inspected the files, and, not finding any record of a notice of appeal, concluded that the appeal had been abandoned. Thereupon Mr. Fletcher, according to the affidavit, caused a search to be made in the office of the county clerk, but could find no notice of appeal or record of its filing in the register of actions. Affiant states positively that he had in fact filed the notice of appeal on June 24, 1924, and details the circumstances surrounding the filing. In explanation of his delay in presenting a motion for a substitution of a copy in lieu of the original notice of appeal, affiant mentions certain work in which he was engrossed, including that of chairman of the committee of the Los Angeles Bar Association on the subject of bills to create the municipal court. Mr. Williams did not file an affidavit denying Mr. Fletcher's statement concerning the conversation by telephone in November.

The trial court was justified in making its minute order of April 7, 1925, permitting a substitution of a copy of the notice of appeal. Section 1045 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "If an original pleading or paper be lost, the court may authorize a copy thereof to be filed and used instead of the original."

In Knowlton v. Mackenzie, 110 Cal. 183, 42 P. 580, a motion was made in the Supreme Court to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the transcript failed to show that the notice of appeal had been served on the respondent. In reply to the motion, the appellant caused to be filed a certified copy of certain proceedings in the superior court, from which, quoting from the opinion, "it appears that the original notice of appeal has been lost * * * and that the said notice of appeal was on the same day filed in the office of the clerk of that court; and that the court thereupon made an order directing that a copy of said notice of appeal, together with the affidavit showing its original filing and service, be filed nunc pro tunc, and that the same has been so filed." In denying the motion to dismiss, the Supreme Court used this language:

> "Upon the order of the court made in the present case, the substituted papers are entitled to the same weight as would be the originals."

The order is affirmed.

Action by Robert G. Taylor, a minor, etc., against Thomas J. De Vaughn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals therefrom and from an order denying a new trial. Judgment affirmed, and appeal from an order denying a new trial dismissed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: TYLER, Justice pro tem., dissenting.

See, also, 266 P. 963.

John C. Miles, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Munson T. Case and Carleton R. Bainbridge, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant for $850 damages and costs of suit on account of the alleged malpractice of defendant, a physician and surgeon. Plaintiff had suffered a transverse fracture of the middle third of his left femur; defendant reduced the fracture, and the trial court held that he failed to give plaintiff the usual and necessary surgical care and attention after the reduction, which failure made necessary an operation upon the broken limb and a resetting of the bone, to plaintiff's damage.

[1] Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and he appeals from the order denying the motion and from the judgment. The order denying the new trial is not appealable (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

The record shows without controversy, except as below specially mentioned, and the court found, the following facts:

Plaintiff was a little less than 8 years old when his injury occurred; defendant was employed by plaintiff's mother to reduce the fracture and care for the injured boy afterwards; the boy was taken to the Corby Hospital at Huntington Park, where defendant, assisted by a Dr. Preston, reduced the fracture, exercising reasonable care and skill in so doing, and in applying splints, plaster of paris cast, and extension of the limb with weights; the boy was kept in bed and the endeavor was to have him lie on his back, but about three days after the fracture was reduced he turned over on his side or on his face, which may have caused the ends of the broken bone to lose their proper positions; prior to the reduction of the fracture defendant took X-ray pictures of the limb, but took no other such pictures until about 15 days thereafter; very soon after the boy turned over the mother requested defendant to have X-ray pictures taken to determine whether the ends of the broken bone had lost their apposition thereby, but defendant said that it was not necessary; the mother was a working woman and was delayed in raising money with which to pay the hospital and doctors' charges, and eight days after the limb was set and pursuant to defendant's consent, she moved the boy from the hospital, but defendant gave her no instructions as to his care; she took him to her own home and a short time later moved him to another private house, and he was kept in bed with weights attached to his limb (there is a conflict in the evidence as to whether defendant consented that the boy be removed to any place other than another hospital); while being so moved the boy was carried in arms several times, which might have caused the broken bone ends to move out of place; after the boy was taken from the hospital the mother observed that he suffered cramps in his injured limb, and so advised defendant; on the thirteenth day after the limb was set defendant again examined the boy, he was asked by the mother to have X-ray pictures of the limb taken, and he said it was not necessary as the boy was getting along all right, but two days later defendant had such pictures taken and they disclosed that the ends of the broken bone were misplaced and had slipped past each other, shortening the leg about 2½ inches; and on the nineteenth day after the fracture was set one Dr. Nelson, who was employed by the mother, operated on the limb. He opened it and he found very firm callouses over the ends of the bone at the place of fracture and connecting the broken portions of the bone, the callouses being of the character which required two or four weeks' time to form, and he found it necessary to chisel away the callouses, to pry the broken portions of the bone apart and to reset the broken bone. This operation was very dangerous but necessary.

⊂⊃For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

Defendant and Dr. Preston testified that shortly after the boy had turned over they measured both his legs with steel tape, measuring from the anterior superior spine to the internal malleolus (ankle joint) and found the legs the same length, the foot in proper position, and the injured limb straight, and that thereafter, while the boy was in the hospital, he suffered little pain; and defendant further testified that he refrained from taking X-ray pictures after he reduced the fracture for fear of injury to the boy.

Other surgeons testified that such measurement of the limbs is not a sufficient guide to determine whether there has been a slipping or side movement of the broken bone ends and that there may be a difference of one-half inch to one inch in the lengths of the two limbs which will not be discovered by measurement alone, as the tipping of the pelvis may mislead; that the only sure way to determine whether such a fracture has been properly reduced is to follow with X-ray pictures, and that such is the only sure practice and is the general practice among skillful physicians in Los Angeles county, Cal., where the occurrences herein mentioned took place; and that when the X-ray is properly used for that purpose there is no danger to the patient. Dr. Nelson also testified that the splints and plaster cast which had been originally placed on the limb would not have prevented movement of the limb or a slipping of the broken bone ends.

The court also found that defendant was negligent and failed to exercise reasonable skill in the following particulars: He failed to take X-ray pictures to ascertain whether the fracture had been properly reduced, or after the boy turned over or after the boy was moved to determine whether any injury had been done by the turning or moving; he failed to give instructions to lessen the danger of displacing the fractured bone by the moving of the boy from the hospital; he failed to give the boy his personal attention between the moving and his visit to the boy five days later; and he did not have such pictures taken until repeated demands and requests had been made by the mother therefor and not by reason of correct or reasonably careful diagnosis.

The principal contentions made by appellant are that the evidence is insufficient to support any findings or judgment predicated upon negligence on the part of defendant, and that it does not appear that any damage was suffered by plaintiff from the acts of defendant which the court found constituted negligence on his part.

The main questions for consideration are whether the relation of surgeon and patient existed between defendant and plaintiff at the time subsequent to the reduction of the fracture when the broken ends of the bone lost their apposition or for any period following that time, and, if the relation continued, whether defendant exercised that degree of care of the boy required of him as a surgeon following the reduction.

[2-5] The general rules covering those questions are announced in Hopkins v. Heller, 59 Cal. App. 447, 452, 210 P. 975, Dimock v. Miller (Cal. App.) 256 P. 236, and in Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 441, 443, 181 P. 642. In the Hopkins Case the court announced that:

> "When the physician takes charge of a case and is employed to attend a patient, his employment, as well as the relation of physician and patient, continues until ended by the consent of the parties, or revoked by the dismissal of the physician, or until his services are no longer needed. For example, when a surgeon performs an operation, not only must he use reasonable and ordinary care and skill in its performance, but also in the subsequent treatment of the case. It is his duty to give the patient such attention after the operation as the necessity of the case demands, in the absence of any special agreement limiting the service or reasonable notice to the patient."

In the Dimock Case the court said that:

> "Evidence of what is not 'good surgery' or of what is 'bad technic' does not prove negligence on the part of a physician within the rule of the authorities in this state. In cases of this character it is required that the physician or surgeon in the practice of his profession shall possess and use 'that degree of care and skill ordinarily possessed and used by physicians and surgeons in good standing practicing in the same locality.'"

And in the Perkins Case the court said that:

> "'The difficulties and uncertainties in the practice of medicine and surgery are such that no practitioner can be required to guarantee results and all the law demands is that he bring and apply to the case in hand that degree of skill, care, knowledge and attention ordinarily possessed and exercised by practitioners of the medical profession under like circumstances.' * * * 'Negligence on the part of a physician consists in his doing something which he should not have done, or in omitting to do something which he should have done.' * * * That as to what is or is not proper practice in examination and treatment, or the usual practice and treatment, is a question for experts, and can be established only by their testimony."

Counsel cite a large number of decisions from other jurisdictions, but as, in general, they merely adhere to or elaborate upon the foregoing rules announced by our own courts, they are not cited in this opinion.

[6] Applying the rules above announced to the facts in this case, it satisfactorily appears that the relation of surgeon and patient existed between defendant and plaintiff until two or three days before Dr. Nelson operated and found the callouses, which were 14 to 30 days old, and that the broken portions of the bone had lost their apposition and slipped by each other at least 10 days before defendant was discharged from the case, and, as testified by several reputable surgeons, that good surgeons practicing in Los Angeles county invariably use the X-ray to verify their work in reducing fractures, and particularly when reducing a fracture of the femur they take X-ray pictures from time to time thereafter until union occurs, to determine whether any slipping at the fracture has occurred, and that the necessities of such cases require the use of the X-ray.

[7] The findings of the trial court have ample support in the evidence. Defendant was remiss in his duty to plaintiff in failing to verify his work by the use of the X-ray after he reduced the fracture, and in failing to give the boy that degree of attention which the conditions required. There is substantial evidence sustaining the view that the operation performed by Dr. Nelson would not have been necessary had defendant exercised that degree of care and skill ordinarily used by surgeons in Los Angeles county. Plaintiff suffered damage by reason of the negligence of defendant.

Other contentions, are made by appellant, to the effect that the findings of negligence are not supported by any sufficient allegations of negligence in plaintiff's second amended complaint, and that the court erroneously admitted and rejected evidence. None of these contentions have merit. Plaintiff's pleading alleges the acts of negligence fairly and clearly, and the court committed no prejudicial error in receiving or rejecting evidence.

The judgment is affirmed. The appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Cora M. Taylor and another against Thomas J. De Vaughn. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals therefrom, and from an order denying a new trial. Judgment affirmed, and appeal from order denying a new trial dismissed.

John C. Miles, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Munson T. Case and C. R. Bainbridge, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. [1] Defendant appeals from a judgment against him and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The order denying the new trial is not appealable (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

Plaintiffs sued as parents of their minor son, and they alleged that they were damaged by reason of malpractice on the part of defendant, a physician and surgeon, in failing to give the minor the usual and necessary surgical care after he reduced a fracture of the minor's left femur.

A companion action was brought against defendant by the minor for damages he alleged he suffered by reason of the alleged malpractice. Counsel for the respective parties in their briefs state that the action by the minor was consolidated and tried with this action in the trial court pursuant to a stipulation and order of court thereon providing for the consolidation and that the evidence received should be used in each case so far as applicable. Separate findings and judgment were given in each action. Defendant appealed separately from the judgment and from the order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial in the action by the minor. That appeal is entitled Robert G. Taylor v. De Vaughn, and is numbered Civil No. 4777, 266 P. 960.

[2] The only portions of the record certified to this court in this appeal are those set out in the typewritten clerk's transcript, which contains the judgment roll, defendant's notice of intention to move for a new trial, and order denying the motion, notice to the clerk to prepare a transcript as provided in section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, notice of appeal and an ex parte order of the trial court to the effect that the action by the minor be consolidated with this action for the purposes of appeal so that both appeals may be considered together.

A typewritten reporter's transcript of the phonographic report of the trial was filed in the appeal in the minor's case, and appellant requests this court to consider that transcript as the reporter's transcript in this appeal, but neither appellant nor respondents printed in their briefs or in any supplement thereto any part of the record as required by section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. Therefore there is nothing before us to show error on the part of the trial court. Dahlberg v. Dahlberg (Cal. Sup.) 260 P. 290, and cases therein cited.

[3, 4] The order of the trial court that the appeals in the two actions should be considered together is ineffective for the reason that the appeals divested that court of further jurisdiction except as to matters not affected by the judgments or orders appealed from (Estate of Waters, 181 Cal. 584, 185 P. 951; Hennessy v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 368, 228 P. 862); and the trial court is without authority to govern the procedure in a court of appeal.

[5] It also appears that a separate motion for a new trial was made in each action, separate notices of appeal were filed, and a separate transcript of the record or of portions of it was made in each appeal, and there is no stipulation that the transcript on appeal in the minor's action should be considered in this appeal. Therefore this court cannot consider that transcript on this appeal even though the two cases were consolidated and tried together in the lower court. Harmon v. San Francisco & S. R. R. R. Co., 86 Cal. 617, 25 P. 124; Soule Co. v. Severtson, 68 Cal. App. 46, 48, 225 P. 351.

It appears from appellant's briefs on this appeal that he relies mainly upon the transcript of the phonographic report of the trial filed in the appeal in the minor's case. This court has just given its opinion in that appeal affirming the judgment in favor of the minor. There is nothing in that transcript which would authorize this court to reverse the judgment.

[6] As an incomplete transcript was filed, this appeal should be and has been considered on the merits. Oberkotter v. Spreckels, 63 Cal. App. 683, 219 P. 1010.

The judgment is affirmed. The appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed.

WIXON v. RAISCH IMPROVEMENT CO. et al. (Civ. 6073.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 19, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 18, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚷628(1)—Delay in filing transcript due to congestion in printing office held not fatal, where transcript was filed after interval of one and one-half working days after receipt from printer.

Failure to file transcript within time prescribed by rules of Supreme Court held not to require dismissal of appeal, where delay was occasioned by unusually heavy run of printing business, and transcript was filed on third day after its receipt; one and one-half days of intervening time being holidays.

2. Automobiles ⚷170(8)—Motorcyclist, entering apparently clear intersection, had right to assume no car from opposite direction would collide with him after he passed medial line of intersecting street.

In action for injuries resulting from collision at street intersection, motorcycle driver might rely on presumption that others using highway would use reasonable care and prudence, and would obey traffic laws, and would not be guilty of contributory negligence in acting on such presumption, where there was no warning of danger.

6. Appeal and error ⟹301—Alleged excessiveness of damages was not considered on appeal, where not urged on motion for new trial.

Question of excessiveness of damages awarded in action for injuries was not considered on appeal, where not argued in trial court on motion for new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by Bruce Wixon against the Raisch Improvement Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, and C. W. Davison and James P. Sex, both of San Jose, for appellants.

Harry Houser, of San Jose (W. A. Beasly, of Berkeley, of counsel), for respondent.

MURPHEY, Justice pro tem. In this case the respondent interposed a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the transcript was not filed within the time prescribed by the rules of the Supreme Court. The transcript was filed on the forty-fourth day after the bill of exceptions had been settled and filed in the office of the county clerk of Santa Clara county. On the forty-second day after the settlement and filing of the bill of exceptions, respondent served his motion to dismiss the appeal, accompanied by affidavits sufficient in form and substance. On the date of the hearing, in the absence of any affirmative showing by the appellants, the appeal should have been dismissed, but on that date appellant asked, and was granted, time to file affidavits in support of his application then made to be relieved from default. Several affidavits were filed by the respective parties, and the matter was set for hearing and heard on the 19th day of March, 1928.

[1] The printer, who had in charge the printing of the transcript in this case, stated in his affidavit as follows:

> "At said time" (referring to the dates of the settlement and the filing of the bill of exceptions and the forty-day period thereafter) "the firm of Pernau-Walsh had an unusually heavy run of business and a very large amount of printing to be done and said judgment (roll) could not be set up, for the reason that all of its linotype machines and operators were busy, and it was impossible to have the transcript completed and ready for delivery until about 3 o'clock p. m. on December 11, 1925."

The delivery was made to Lasher B. Gallagher, the attorney for the appellants. This, of course, was a matter over which appellants had no control, and for which they may not be held responsible. The 11th of December was the forty-first day after the settlement and filing of the transcript on appeal, and, of course, was not within the time prescribed by the rules of the Supreme Court. After receiving the printed transcript, it was necessary to have the same certified and filed in the office of the county clerk of Santa Clara county, and we are disposed to think, in view of the fact that between the 11th day of December, 1925, and the 14th day of December, 1925, the date on which the transcript was filed, one and one-half days of the time were holidays, that the appellants did all that might be reasonably expected of them to have the said transcript certified and filed in the office of the county clerk of Santa Clara county and thereafter in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court of this state. The affidavits, with respect to the activities of the several parties between the afternoon of December 11th and the 14th of December, are quite contradictory in character, but, on the whole, we are disposed to think that the showing made by the appellants is sufficient, and the motion to dismiss the appeal will now be denied.

We will now take up and consider the appeal on its merits.

Judgment in the trial court was in favor of the plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

In this action the plaintiff sues to recover damages as the result of a collision between a motorcycle driven and operated by plaintiff and a truck owned by the defendant Raisch Improvement Company driven and operated by the defendant Walker. The accident occurred at the intersection of North Thirteenth and Jackson streets in the city of San Jose. The plaintiff was driving south on North Thirteenth street. It is the contention of the plaintiff that the collision occurred a few feet south of the medial line of Jackson street, and under the following circumstances: He testified that, when he arrived at the property line of Jackson street, he looked to the left and right, and that there were absolutely no machines or vehicles of any kind within the boundary lines of the four corners of the curb lines; that the intersection was entirely clear; that he probably saw the truck of the defendants, but, if he did, it was south of the south curb line of Jackson street; that he proceeded into the intersection at a speed of from 8 to 10 miles per hour; that, after he crossed the medial line of Jackson street, he heard the whir of the engine of the truck, and was immediately struck; that he did not see the truck in the intersection until it was immediately upon him; that, as he entered the intersection, he observed the car on his right approaching on Jackson street; that this car slowed down and he proceeded to cross the intersection. This statement of facts, in our judgment, is fully corroborated, not only by relatives of plaintiff, but by disinterested witnesses produced in his behalf.

It was the contention of the appellants that, because of the inherent inconsistencies and contradictions in the testimony, this evidence should have been disregarded and a nonsuit granted. In this behalf, appellants enter into an elaborate analysis of the evidence covering some 65 pages of their brief. We do not feel disposed to follow the appellants in this exhaustive analysis of the evidence. They had an opportunity to fully discuss and present their views on this matter to the jury and to the trial court, and, having failed to convince either, they cannot expect this court to go over the same ground. After a careful reading of the entire record, we are satisfied that there is no merit in this contention of the appellants and, had the trial court granted a nonsuit, its ruling would have been clearly erroneous.

[2, 3] The point more earnestly presented by the appellants is that it was the duty of the plaintiff, after entering the intersection, to have again looked in the direction of the approaching truck, and his failure to do so constituted contributory negligence as a matter of law. Under the facts above set out, and they are the facts as found by the jury and approved by the trial court, this contention cannot be sustained. If the intersection was clear at the time the plaintiff entered, he had a right to assume that no car would enter the intersection from the south and collide with him south of the medial line of Jackson street, or, in fact, attempt to cross his line of traffic at any point in the intersection, unless the crossing could be safely made. Ordinary prudence and common sense would dictate this if there were no law on the subject. We are inclined to believe that, even had the plaintiff looked again in the direction of the truck, and observed the driver indicating an intention to turn into Jackson street, he might still have assumed that the truck driver would not have cut in on his line of traffic, unless he could do so with safety. Motor Vehicle Act, § 129 (Stats. 1923, p. 517).

The conduct of the plaintiff in this action places him in a more favorable aspect than that of the plaintiff in the case of Simonsen v. L. J. Christopher Co., 186 Cal. 786, 200 P. 615. We quote:

> "In this case, according to the plaintiffs' evidence, the plaintiffs had passed beyond the center of the street-crossing without accident and were presumably out of the zone of danger from any vehicle approaching from the east. We do not think they can be held guilty of negligence as a matter of law or under their version of the facts because they failed to keep further watch for defendant's truck. It is claimed that they did not keep a sufficient lookout while entering upon the street-crossing and that they were driving beyond the prescribed speed limit, but obviously neither of these circumstances contributed to the accident, as the collision did not occur on the side of the street in defendant's line of travel, and the greater speed at which they made the crossing lessened the danger of their being overtaken by defendant's truck."

To the same effect is Towne v. Godeau, 70 Cal. App. 148, 232 P. 1010. We quote:

> "It is now contended by appellants that the evidence conclusively shows that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The jury, in returning a verdict for the plaintiff, and the court, in denying a motion for a new trial, impliedly found in favor of the plaintiff upon that issue. The burden of proof was on the defendants to show contributory negligence. To sustain such burden and to overcome the implied finding of the jury and of the trial court would require very clear proof. * * *
> "While nearing and entering the intersection, ordinary care required plaintiff to look to the left for approaching vehicles. Having satisfied himself of the absence of danger from that direction, it was natural for him to look to the right for eastbound vehicles. He had the right to assume that no vehicle would approach him from the left beyond the medial line of the intersecting street. Of course, this does not mean that he had the right to proceed blindly, in reckless disregard of obvious danger, for it was his duty to exercise ordinary care, even though the negligence of another caused the danger. In this connection the court instructed the jury that the plaintiff 'had a right to assume that any person driving from the south on Eldorado street and desiring to turn to the left or west on Poplar street would obey the law and run beyond the center of the intersection of said streets passing to the right thereof, before making such turn.' Appellant contends that the effect of this instruction upon the minds of the jurors was 'that the plaintiff did not and was not required to see that which he could have seen with the exercise of ordinary care.' There is no merit in the contention."

[4] We quote the foregoing instruction because of its applicability to objections made by appellant in this case to an instruction given by the trial court. Appellant complains of the instructions of the trial court, and in this connection makes objection to approximately every instruction given. At the oral argument counsel contented himself with calling the attention of the court to only two of the instructions complained of by him. One of these instructions as given by the court reads as follows:

> "I further instruct you that it was the duty of the driver of the truck in question before turning such vehicle from Thirteenth street into Jackson street to first see that said movement could be made in safety, and if it could not be made in safety then it was his duty to stop until he could make such turn in safety."

Appellants object to the use of the word "stop" in this connection. When considered in connection with the context, this objection does not appear to warrant any argument whatever. Counsel states that there is nothing in the law making it the duty of the operator of a motor vehicle to "stop." There is something in the law requiring him to "wait" and the difference in the meaning of the words—in the connection in which they are used—is infinitesimal.

It certainly was Walker's duty before making this turn with his truck "to see that it could be made in safety, and, if it could not be made in safety, wait until it could be made in safety." Lexicographers define the word "wait": "To rest patiently in expectation; remain inactive or stay in one place in anticipation of an arrival or an event, or until the proper time comes for action." Webster. Among the definitions by the same author of the word "stop" we find: "To bring from motion to rest; arrest the course, progress, or movement." Applied to the facts of the instant case we are of the opinion that the trial court, in using the word "stop," did not go beyond the clear import of the law as laid down in the Motor Vehicle Act, and that the appellants' objection thereto is without merit.

[5] The next instruction which the appellant calls especially to the court's attention, as already above set out, was as follows:

> "I instruct you that, if the plaintiff here was at and immediately prior to the time of the accident in question riding his motorcycle across the intersection of Thirteenth and Jackson street in a lawful and proper manner, and there was nothing in the situation then present to warn him as a reasonably prudent person of an impending danger, he might rely upon the presumption that others using the public highway would use reasonable care and prudence, and would obey the traffic laws, in their use of the highways, and he would not be guilty of contributory negligence under such circumstances in acting on such presumption."

This instruction is criticized as in effect stating to the jury that the plaintiff could close his eyes in crossing the intersection, and could rely upon the presumption that defendants would use reasonable care and prudence, and would obey the traffic laws. We think that this instruction is not susceptible in any respect to the objection made to it by the appellants, and that the citation hereinbefore made in the case of Towne v. Godeau is applicable to the present situation.

In the case of Simonsen v. L. J. Christopher Co., supra, the Supreme Court says:

> "As has been frequently said by this court and the district courts of appeal, a person crossing a street in front of an approaching vehicle cannot close his eyes to threatening danger, relying upon the presumption that the other party will use reasonable care and prudence and obey the traffic laws, but if there is nothing in the situation to warn him of impending danger, he is not guilty of negligence in relying upon such assumption. McPhee v. Lavin, 183 Cal. 264 (191 P. 23); Commonwealth Bonding & C. Ins. Co. v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 42 Cal. App. 573 (184 P. 29); Baker v. Western Auto Stage Co. [48] Cal. App. [283] 192 P. 73; Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55 (Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, 161 P. 1155)."

We have examined all of the instructions given on behalf of the respective parties by the trial court in this case, and are of the opinion that they fully and fairly instruct the jury upon the law applicable to the facts disclosed by the record.

[6] Some contention is made that the damages awarded by the jury in this case are excessive. In view of the fact that it is disclosed by the record that this question was not argued in the trial court on the motion for a new trial, we do not feel disposed to enter upon a discussion of the same in this opinion. Williams v. A. R. G. Bus Co., 47 Cal. App. 568, 190 P. 1036.

The judgment is affirmed.

BALESTRERE v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5871.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 18, 1928.

1. Admiralty ⚷21—Commerce ⚷22—Claim for death of fisherman drowned in Monterey Bay held within Workmen's Compensation Act, employment not involving interstate or foreign commerce; application of state Compensation Act to seamen employed in local commerce held not violative of federal Constitution giving federal courts admiralty jurisdiction (Workmen's Compensation Act; Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2).

Claim for death of seaman, drowned while engaged in fish-catching employment in Monterey Bay and adjacent waters, held within scope of Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended), and taking of jurisdiction under such act not violative of Const. U. S., art. 3, § 2, where the employment did not involve interstate or foreign commerce, although it was of a maritime nature.

2. Master and servant ⚷417(7)—Dependency of employee's parents held fact question for commission (Workmen's Compensation Act).

In a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended), question of dependency of deceased employee's parents held a question of fact for the commission.

Application by Manuel Balestrere for certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Marie Recoy Prego and Andrew Prego, represented by their guardian ad litem, John Thompson, for the death of their son, Antonio Prego. Award affirmed.

Robert D. Duke and Lawrence A. Cowen, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. The petitioner seeks by this proceeding in certiorari to have reviewed and annulled an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission directing the payment of the sum of $630 to the father and mother of Antonio Prego, who was drowned in the harbor of Monterey while attempting to moor a lighter.

The following are the facts: Prego was employed as seaman and fisherman on a small vessel engaged in the business of catching fish in the waters of Monterey Bay and those adjacent thereto. On the day of the accident, the vessel returned to Monterey with a load of sardines which it had discharged into the lighter. Prego and another man were in a skiff carrying a line from the lighter to the end of a cable anchored 50 or 100 feet from shore, to which the lighter was about to be fastened and the fish then hoisted in the bucket and conveyed by means of a trolley to the end of the pier for delivery to a cannery. Prego was rowing the skiff, and the other man holding the line, and, as they neared the end of the cable, a heavy sea capsized the skiff, and Prego was drowned.

[1] Petitioner contends that, on account of the character of Prego's employment and the nature of the services he was performing at the time he was drowned, any claim arising out of his death came exclusively within the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts, and that consequently the attempted application of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended) was in violation of section 2 of article 3 of the federal Constitution.

The Supreme Court of this state has had occasion recently, in two proceedings of this kind, to deal with the very questions here presented, wherein the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon which petitioner herein relies as supporting his contentions were reviewed and summarized. In the first proceeding, Alaska Packers' Association v. Industrial Accident Commission, 200 Cal. 579, 253 P. 926, it was held that, notwithstanding a contract of employment may be maritime in its nature, still, as to certain local matters, regulation of which will work no material prejudice to the general maritime law, or interfere with the proper harmony or uniformity of that law in its international or interstate relations, the rules of the maritime law may be modified or supplemented by state regulation, and that, when a compensation act supersedes other state laws touching a liability for damages which depended upon the common law and state statutes, it does not come into conflict with any superior maritime law. In the second proceeding, London Guarantee & Accident Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 263 P. 196, an apprentice navigator employed by a company engaged in the business of operating a small fleet of fishing vessels from Santa Monica to the ocean fishing grounds, for the accommodation of the public seeking recreation in deep sea fishing, was drowned while on his way in a small boat from the pier to one of the larger boats which had gone adrift, for the purpose of returning her to her anchorage. After again reviewing the federal cases and restating the rule, it was held that, inasmuch as the employment had no such direct relation to interstate or foreign commerce or navigation, the Industrial Accident Commission was not deprived of jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim.

It will be observed that the facts of the latter case are almost identical with those of the present one, for here the evidence shows, in addition to the facts already set forth, that both employer and employee were residents of Monterey, that Prego's employment did not involve interstate or foreign commerce, and that neither the employment nor the vessel on which the decedent was employed had any connection with the carrier of interstate or foreign commerce; moreover, as stated, the accident occurred within the waters of this state and within 100 feet of shore. We are of the opinion, therefore, that, under the authority of the recently adjudicated cases above cited, and for the reasons therein given, the claim for compensation arising out of Prego's death came properly within the scope of the Workmen's Compensation Act of this state.

[2] The question of the dependency of Prego's parents was one of fact to be determined by the commission, and there is sufficient evidence in the record to support its finding on such issue.

The award is affirmed.

RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 684 v. EAST BAY MUNICIPAL UTILITY DIST.★

(Civ. 3352.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 19, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 18, 1928.

1. Constitutional law ⇐70(1)—Courts cannot read into statute what Legislature has apparently purposely omitted relative to levying special assessments against municipal property (Const. art. 13, § 1).

The judicial branch cannot read into the law what the legislative branch has apparently purposely and deliberately omitted in Const. art. 13, § 1, relative to exemption of municipally owned property from levy of special assessments.

2. Drains ⇐70—Property of municipal corporation is exempt from special assessments only if it is actually devoted to public use.

The property of a municipal corporation is exempt from special assessments only where such property is actually devoted to a public use.

3. Drains ⇐70—Assessment by reclamation district of property of municipal utility district lying within reclamation district held invalid, in absence of showing utility district property was not devoted to public use (St. 1921, p. 245).

In proceeding by reclamation district to compel a municipal utility district, founded pursuant to St. 1921, p. 245, whose property lay within reclamation district, to pay special assessments levied for reclamation district purposes, assessment by reclamation district of municipal utility district's property lying within reclamation district held invalid, in absence of showing that utility district's property was not devoted to a public use.

Application by Reclamation District No. 684 for writ of mandate, prayed to be directed to East Bay Municipal Utility District, to compel payment of a claim for assessment for reclamation purposes. Writ denied.

Case & Forslund, of Stockton, for petitioner.

T. P. Wittschen, of Oakland (L. W. Irving, of San Francisco, and Harold Raines, of Berkeley, of counsel), for relator.

PULLEN, Justice pro tem. The East Bay Municipal Utility District comprises nine cities on the easterly side of San Francisco bay, and was organized to perform certain municipal functions, one of which was to bring a publicly owned water supply from the Mokelumne river in Amador county to the utility district for the use of the district and its inhabitants. It was founded pursuant to the provisions of the Municipal Utility District Act (Stats. 1921, p. 245), and it is conceded by the parties to this proceeding that it is a public agency. The utility district has lands within Reclamation District No. 684, upon which its pipe, conduits and other works are constructed for the purpose of conveying water to the East Bay cities.

Long prior to the acquisition of the lands above mentioned by the utility district in Reclamation District No. 684, the district was organized and was existing by virtue of certain reclamation district laws of the state of California. It embraced within its exterior boundaries approximately 10,000 acres, all lying from 6 to 14 feet below the level of the waters flowing in the adjacent San Joaquin river and its tributaries. The lands within the district were formerly what is known as swamp and overflowed lands consisting of vast wastes of tule and other water grasses. Owing to its elevation with reference to the adjacent water, levees were constructed and are maintained at great expense, and by reason of the rainfall, surface and irrigation waters, it is necessary to maintain drainage canals and pumps to conduct the surplus waters off of the lands and back into the river.

To obtain funds necessary to protect the lands within the district, assessments are duly and lawfully levied upon such lands pursuant to law, and it will be necessary to continue to do so in the future. After the utility district acquired the land within the district, and while still the owner thereof, an assessment in proportion to the benefits was levied by the reclamation district and spread upon all lands in the reclamation district, including those of the utility district.

A claim for its proportion of this amount was presented to the board of directors of the utility district and payment refused; thereafter this action was brought to compel by writ of mandate the allowance of the claim of the reclamation district by the utility district.

To the petition of the reclamation district

the utility district filed both a demurrer and answer, which by its terms admits practically all of the allegations of the petition, except the allegations to the effect that without the reclamation works maintained by the district the lands would be useless for the purposes for which the utility district seeks to use its right of way; and while traversing this allegation, it is admitted that the reclamation has benefited the utility district, in that it can more cheaply and conveniently maintain its work under existing conditions than the same could be maintained if the lands were permitted to revert to their natural condition.

The only issue here raised is to the validity of the assessment as applied to the lands of the utility district, the district contending that its property being actually used for a public purpose is exempt from such assessment as here attempted to be levied.

Respondent contends that it is the general rule of the state to exempt publicly owned property from taxation, and, that being true, the general principles, which exempt publicly owned property from taxation, also exempt the same from an assessment, where the property is actually being put to use by the public body for a public use.

The Constitution of 1849 contained no express exemption of public property from general taxation, but by judicial construction it early became a recognized principle of taxation. The Constitution (article 11, § 13) provided: "Taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state. All property in this state shall be taxed, * * *" etc. The Supreme Court, through Mr. Justice Rhodes, said in the case of People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 432, in construing this section:

> "The meaning of taxation must be kept in view, and that is: A charge levied by the sovereign power upon the property of its subject. It is not a charge upon its own property, nor upon property over which it has no dominion. This excludes the property of the State. * * *"

In the Constitution of 1879, section 1, art. 13, provided:

> "All property in the state * * * shall be taxed * * * provided, that * * * property used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, this state, or to any county or municipal corporation within this state, shall be exempt from taxation."

Thus stood the law in 1913 when the city of San Francisco filed a petition for a writ of mandate to compel certain officers of the county of Tuolumne to cancel an assessment for taxes levied by Tuolumne county upon certain property belonging to the city of San Francisco, lying in the county of Tuolumne, the property having been acquired for its purpose of constructing and operating a municipal waterworks and supply for the benefit of the city of San Francisco and the inhabitants thereof. Upon the hearing of said writ, the trial court directed that the writ issue, and in affirming the order this court held in San Francisco v. McGovern, 28 Cal. App. 491, 152 P. 980, that the constitutional provision exempting municipally-owned property was plain and unambiguous and therefore was not subject to judicial interpretation.

To remedy this apparent injustice, section 1 of article 13 was amended in 1914, by adding the following:

> "All property in the state except as otherwise in this Constitution provided, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law, or as hereinafter provided. The word 'property,' as used in this article and section, is hereby declared to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal, and mixed, capable of private ownership; provided, that a mortgage, deed of trust, contract, or other obligation by which a debt is secured when land is pledged as security for the payment thereof, together with the money represented by such debt, shall not be considered property subject to taxation; and further provided, that property used for free public libraries and free museums, growing crops, property used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, this state, or to any county, city and county, or municipal corporation within this state shall be exempt from taxation, except such lands and the improvements thereon located outside of the county, city and county, or municipal corporation owning the same as were subject to taxation at the time of the acquisition of the same by said county, city and county, or municipal corporation; provided, that no improvements of any character whatever constructed by any county, city and county, or municipal corporation shall be subject to taxation. All lands or improvements thereon, belonging to any county, city and county, or municipal corporation, not exempt from taxation, shall be assessed by the assessor of the county, city and county, or municipal corporation in which said lands or improvements are located, and said assessment shall be subject to review, equalization and adjustment by the state board of equalization. The Legislature may provide, except in the case of credits secured by mortgage or trust deed, for a deduction from credits of debts due to bona fide residents of this state."

It will be noted that the proviso relates only to taxation, and upon examination of the Constitution we find no provision pertaining to assessments, as distinguished from taxation, although such distinction has long been clearly and definitely pointed out. In an early California case, Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 241, the court said:

> "It is not a power to tax all the property within the corporation for general purposes, but a power to tax specific property for a specific purpose. It is not a power to tax property generally founded upon the benefits supposed to be derived from the organization of a government for the protection of life, liberty, and property, but a power to tax specific property founded upon the benefits supposed to be derived by the property itself from the expenditure of the tax in its immediate vicinity."

[1] This court having before it the plain distinction pointed out in the many opinions of the courts of California, and the appropriate use of the words "taxation" and "assessments," as used by the Legislature itself in the various laws it had enacted pertaining to those respective subjects, we cannot say that it deliberately and intentionally omitted assessment from the exceptions contained in section 1 of article 13 of the Constitution, and the judicial branch cannot read into the law what the legislative branch has, apparently, purposely and deliberately omitted.

It is true that our cities have grown in population and that questions of acquiring property for water supply, sewage disposal, light and power, playgrounds, cemetery sites, and airplane fields are becoming increasingly prominent, and, as time goes on, the development of these municipal interests, as well as others, will tend more and more to cause cities to seek beyond the confines of their corporate limits for such benefits; but such questions must be addressed to the Legislature and not to the courts.

Petitioner recognizes that the utility district here affected is a public corporation engaged in a municipal function, and that there is no direct constitutional provision in point, but it attempts to distinguish the cases relating to the question, upon the ground that if a special assessment is levied for the improvement of property the public agency is not liable, but if for the actual preservation of the property it is liable, and attempts to establish as the rule of law that publicly owned and used property is exempt from assessment where the assessment benefits the entire public and not alone the particular public entity that owns the property. We do not believe that such a rule can be formulated, or that the cases bear out such conclusion as petitioner contends.

[2, 3] The question seems to be whether or not the property of the governmental agency is actually devoted to a public use; if so, it is exempt, otherwise not. Perhaps the leading case announcing this principle is that of City of San Diego v. Linda Vista Irrigation Dist., 108 Cal. 189, 41 P. 291, decided in 1895, and several years prior to the amendment of section 1 of article 13 of the Constitution. That was a case where the city of San Diego owned certain public lands. These were included within an irrigation district. The question before the court was the liability of the lands of the city to pay the irrigation district assessments. The complaint described the nature of the lands and alleged the facts that they were not used for any public purpose, but were "dry, vacant, unoccupied, and uncultivated agricultural lands." In the course of its opinion the court pointed out that the assessment of the irrigation district was not a tax, that the city could not claim exemption by virtue of the provisions of section 1 of article 13; that, on the contrary, section 1 of article 13 dealt with exemption from taxation and had no application to an assessment which was for the immediate benefit of the property. After citing cases showing the difference between a tax and an assessment, the court concluded that the lands in question, not being held for any public or municipal purpose, were liable to assessment.

The next case which arose was Witter v. Mission School Dist., 121 Cal. 350, 53 P. 905, 66 Am. St. Rep. 33, decided in 1898, also long prior to the constitutional amendment referred to. This was a case of a street assessment. The complaint did not specifically allege that the property which it was sought to subject to the lien of the assessment was not used for public purposes. After discussing the Linda Vista Case and pointing out the difference between a tax and an assessment, the court said:

> "So far as shown the lots in question may have school buildings upon them and may be used and occupied exclusively for school purposes, in which case we do not think this action could be maintained. As a private owner, however, of land not used exclusively for school purposes, but held as an investment or from which to derive rentals, as property of an individual is held and owned, we see no reason why the lands of a school district should not be assessed for improvements the same as those of any other private owner. But we think, as land belonging to school districts is liable for such assessments only when it is not used for school purposes, the complaint should allege the facts necessary to bring the case within the exception."

Accordingly, because of the fact that it did not clearly appear in the complaint that the land was not used for public school purposes, the ruling of the court below sustaining the demurrer to the complaint was affirmed.

The next case to consider the question is City Street Imp. Co. v. Regents of the University of Cal., 153 Cal. 776, 96 P. 801, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 451, decided in 1908, and several years prior to the constitutional amendment before referred to. It was sought in this case to impress a street assessment lien against certain real property, the legal title to which stood in the name of the Regents of the State University. The court, through Mr. Justice Henshaw, in the course of its opinion, cited with approval the cases of San Diego v. Linda Vista Irr. Dist., supra, and Witter v. Mission School Dist., supra, and reaffirmed the rule of those cases, and held that the complaint stated a cause of action because the property in question was not used for any public purpose.

Subsequently, in the case of Raisch v. Regent of the U. of C., 37 Cal. App. 697, 174 P. 943, and upon the authority of the cases above cited, it was held that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, and that the land in question being used in part for a public purpose was not subject to assessment.

The latest case on the subject is City of Fresno v. Fresno Irrig. Dist., 72 Cal. App. 503, 237 P. 772. The city of Fresno owned a sewer farm, which was outside the limits of the city and within the boundaries of the Fresno irrigation district. Upon this land the defendant irrigation district levied an assessment for irrigation district purposes and was about to sell the property of the city to satisfy the lien of that assessment. The action was brought to enjoin such sale and to quiet the title of plaintiff to the lands in question. After reviewing the previous cases, the court said, quoting from the case of City Street Imp. Co. v. Regent, supra:

> "The rule in this state is, as above indicated, that such property when actually devoted to the public use is exempt; otherwise not."

The above authorities appear decisive on the question, and it is ordered that the writ of mandate commanding the utility district to pay to the proper authorities an amount sufficient to discharge the assessment levied by the reclamation district be hereby denied.

PEOPLE v. BRYAN et al. (Cr. 1020.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 21, 1928.

1. Criminal law ⇨622(2)—Court held not to have abused discretion in refusing separate trial to defendant jointly charged with robbery (Pen. Code, § 1098).

Court held not to have abused discretion, exercised pursuant to Pen. Code, § 1098, in refusing separate trial to defendant jointly indicted with another for robbery.

2. Jury ⇨131(1)—Holding that questions propounded to jury by defendant's attorney were for court's determination and submission held not refusal to permit examination of prospective jurors by defendant's counsel (Pen. Code, § 1078, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039).

In prosecution for robbery, court's holding that certain questions propounded to the jury by defendant's attorney were questions of law to be determined by the court and submitted to the jury by way of instructions held, not a refusal by the court to permit, as required by Pen. Code, § 1078, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039, reasonable examination of the prospective jurors by defendant's counsel.

3. Criminal law ⇨696(7)—Striking answer to entire question whether witness knew defendant's general reputation for truth, honesty, integrity, peace, and quiet, where witness answered, "Very good," held proper, where reputation for truth had not been attacked.

In prosecution for robbery, court's striking answer as to entire question put by defendant's attorney to a witness whether witness knew the general reputation of defendant in the community in which he lived for truth, honesty, integrity, peace, and quiet, to which the witness had answered, "Very good," held proper, where defendant's reputation for truth had not been attacked.

4. Witnesses ⇨318—Witness' reputation for truth cannot, until attacked, be supported by evidence that it is good.

It is a well-recognized rule that the reputation of a witness for truth cannot be supported by evidence that it is good until it has been attacked.

5. Assault and battery ⇨96(1)—Refusing charge on assault held not error, where evidence conclusively showed defendant guilty of robbery, unless coerced (Pen. Code, § 26, subd. 8).

In prosecution for robbery, court's refusal to charge, as requested by defendant, on assault and possibility of finding defendant guilty of assault instead of robbery, held not error, where the evidence conclusively showed that defendant was guilty of robbery, unless it was found, as provided by Pen. Code, § 26, subd. 8, that he had participated in robbery through coercion.

6. Robbery ⇨27(5)—Where evidence tends to prove defendant, if guilty, is guilty of robbery, court may instruct that verdict should be guilty or not guilty.

Where, in prosecution for robbery, the evidence all tends to prove that defendant, if guilty at all, is guilty of robbery, the jury may be instructed that their verdict should be guilty or not guilty.

7. Criminal law ⇨719(1)—Refusing to permit counsel to argue question of defendant's insanity held not error, where plea of not guilty by reason of insanity was not made, and there was no evidence of insanity.

In prosecution for robbery, court's refusing to permit defendant's attorney to argue to jury the question of defendant's insanity held not error, where no plea of not guilty by reason of insanity had been made by defendant, and no evidence whatever that his mind was otherwise than normal had been produced.

8. Robbery ⇨24(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of robbery in second degree.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of defendant of robbery in second degree.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Harry A. Pierce, alias H. A. Rogers, was convicted of robbery in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Harry Donnelly, of Redding, Ernest Spagnoli, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem. Defendant and appellant Harry A. Pierce, alias H. A. Rogers, was jointly charged with Daniel Webster Bryan with the crime of robbery by an information filed by the district attorney of Shasta county, and upon their trial upon said charge Bryan was found guilty of robbery in the first degree, and Pierce was found guilty of robbery in the second degree. From the judgment rendered thereon, Pierce has appealed.

Briefly stated, the facts surrounding the said robbery are about as follows: On the evening of November 9, 1927, Aaron C. Benjamin spent a considerable part of his time in the pool room of Lee and McKee in Redding, engaging in card playing. During that time, and when he left for home, shortly after 1 o'clock a. m. on the 10th of November, he had several hundred dollars on his person, at least a portion of which was open to the view of the people collected in said pool room.

Benjamin, accompanied by a neighbor named Fish, left said pool room shortly after 1 o'clock on the morning of November 10, 1927, and, after getting a lunch in a nearby café they left Redding, traveling north on a public road known as the Pacific Highway, Benjamin in front in his own car and Fish following in a car of his own. When Benjamin had traveled about eight miles from Redding on said highway, he was overtaken by defendants, who were traveling in a Pontiac coupé. Defendants were each armed with a revolver, and, after compelling Benjamin to stop his car, they forced him out of it, and proceeded to rob him of his purse and keys. They did not succeed in getting the bulk of his money, for the reason that the moment he realized that he was about to be robbed, he threw it out on the roadside, and it escaped their search.

Defendants, believing that the purse they had taken from Benjamin contained all his money, permitted him, after a short delay, to proceed on his way. Fish, who was following Benjamin, passed the defendants and Benjamin just after they had stopped Benjamin, and, as he passed, saw one of the defendants pointing a revolver at him. Fish did not stop, but continued on to his home about two miles from the scene of the holdup. When defendants permitted Benjamin to depart, he went on to the home of Fish, and he and Fish telephoned Sheriff Sublett at Redding the facts of the holdup, giving him the number of the car defendants were using. Sublett immediately got in touch with his Deputy Stevenson, and together they began a search for defendants.

About 2 o'clock on the morning of November 10, 1927, they discovered defendants, who had stopped the car in an alley in Redding. When approached by the officers, Bryan had a revolver in his hand, and, upon command of the sheriff, and after some hesitation, he dropped it and surrendered. The officers arrested both of the defendants, and later in the day appellant made a confession to the sheriff in which he admitted that he and Bryan had both participated in the robbery of Benjamin, and were each armed with a revolver. Benjamin identified Bryan as the one who pointed the gun at him and told him to get out of the car. He did not recognize Pierce, but said that this one whom he did not recognize had a gun, but did not point it at him. However, he was the one who took the purse from Benjamin.

Appellant was sworn as a witness, and testified, in substance, that he first met his codefendant Bryan in Salinas about September 15, 1927, where appellant was working, that on November 6th he and Bryan left Salinas, traveling in a Pontiac coupé owned by appellant, and, after stopping at several places looking for work, finally arrived at Redding in the evening of November 9th.

At Bryan's suggestion they went to the pool room of Lee and McKee, and, after remaining there an hour or so, Bryan called appellant outside, and told him to go back in the pool room and watch a certain man whom they had seen playing cards in there, and who appellant later learned was Benjamin, until he "cashed in," as he, Bryan, wanted to borrow money from him. Appellant did as required, and, after Benjamin "cashed in," appellant returned to Bryan, and informed him that Benjamin had $400 or $500; that Bryan thereupon informed appellant that he had not intended to try to borrow any money from Benjamin, but did intend to follow and rob him, and that appellant must drive him and follow Benjamin so that he (Bryan) could rob him.

Appellant stated that he refused to do this for a long time, but that, after Bryan insisted and made threats, he finally consented, but with the intention of not overtaking Benjamin or taking any part in the robbery; that he and Bryan followed Fish and Benjamin in appellant's car, appellant driving, and, when they had gone about a mile, appellant stopped his car, and said he was out of gas; that Bryan got out of the car, and looked at the gas register, and then got back in the car, and shoved a gun against appellant's body and threatened to shoot him, and thereby forced appellant to speed up and overtake Benjamin, and that thereafter everything he did in assisting in said robbery was done through the fears excited by the threats of Bryan.

[1] The first point urged by appellant for a reversal of this case is that the court abused its discretion in refusing his demand for a separate trial.

Section 1098 of the Penal Code provides that, when two or more defendants are jointly charged with the commission of a crime they must be tried jointly, unless the court orders separate trials, and that in its discretion the court may order a separate trial for one or more of the defendants.

We cannot see from the showing made by the appellant that there was any abuse of discretion by the trial court in refusing appellant a separate trial.

[2] The next point raised by appellant was that the trial court refused to allow counsel to examine talesman. Section 1078 of the Penal Code, as amended by act of the Legislature in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1039), reads as follows:

> "It shall be the duty of the trial court to examine the prospective jurors to select a fair and impartial jury. He shall permit reasonable examination of prospective jurors by counsel for the people and for the defendant."

It does not appear that the trial court refused to permit Mr. Spagnoli, the attorney for appellant, to examine prospective jurors. The court merely held that some two or three questions propounded to the jury by Mr. Spagnoli were questions of law to be determined by the court and submitted to the jury by way of instructions.

Appellant's next contention is that the trial court erred in the admission and rejection of evidence. He calls attention to the alleged refusal of the court to permit appellant, when testifying as a witness in his own behalf, to state whether or not he followed Benjamin with the intention of committing a robbery. An inspection of the reporter's transcript shows that the court did not so rule, but, on the contrary, shows that appellant was permitted to answer the question. We find no error in the admission or rejection of testimony.

[3] Appellant assigns as error the refusal of the court to permit appellant to prove that his character for truth, honesty, and integrity was good. C. W. Edmindsen, a witness for defendant, testified that he had known appellant for the past ten years. He was then asked by Mr. Spagnoli, appellant's attorney, if he knew the general reputation of appellant in the community in which he lived for truth, honesty, integrity, peace, and quiet. The witness answered, "Very good." The court struck out this answer, and stated that a witness is presumed to speak the truth, that this presumption goes with him until it is attacked by the other side to show that his reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity is bad; when so attacked, he may rebut it, but that appellant has the right to show his reputation for peace and quiet.

[4] The question propounded by plaintiff to said witness was objectionable, in that it included truth with the other traits of character. It is a well-recognized rule that the reputation of a witness for truth cannot be supported by evidence that it is good until it has been attacked. People v. Cowgill, 93 Cal. 596, 29 P. 228. Had the character for truth been eliminated from the question, the trial court would have erred in refusing to permit the witness to answer it.

[5, 6] It is claimed that the court erred in refusing certain instructions requested by appellant defining assault; that assault is included in a charge of robbery; and that the jury could find appellant guilty of assault. The evidence in this case conclusively shows that appellant was guilty of robbery, unless it was found that appellant participated in said robbery through coercion as provided by subdivision 8 of section 26 of the Penal Code. Where the evidence all tends to prove that the defendant, if guilty at all, is guilty of robbery, the jury may be instructed that their verdict should be guilty or not guilty. People v. O'Brien, 88 Cal. 483, 26 P. 362.

[7] There certainly was no error in the refusal of the court to permit the attorney for appellant to argue to the jury the question of appellant's sanity. No plea of not guilty by reason of insanity had been made by appellant, and no evidence whatever that his mind was otherwise than normal had been produced. Appellant admitted that he participated in the robbery with a loaded pistol in his hand. His only defense was that he did this by reason of the threats and menaces of his codefendant, which caused him to believe that his life would be endangered if he refused. He testified at the trial that, when his codefendant said to him that he was going to rob Benjamin, and that appellant must drive him to where he could commit the robbery, appellant refused for a long time, but that he finally consented, after his codefendant had insisted and made threats. When asked what threats were made, he said "he didn't know, that he would get him later and stuff like that." In his affidavit filed with motion for a separate trial, he did not make any mention of any threats when his codefendant insisted upon his taking his car and following Benjamin for the purpose of robbing him. Appellant there stated "that at his (codefendant's) insistent request I finally consented to drive him out and follow Benjamin and intended not to overtake Benjamin's car if I could do so." Nor did appellant, when he made the confession to the sheriff, just after his arrest, make any mention of his later claim that he had been coerced into assisting in said robbery.

[8] We are of the opinion that the appellant had a fair trial, and that the evidence was amply sufficient to justify the jury in returning a verdict of guilty against him.

The judgment is affirmed.

DEAN v. McNERNEY et al. (Civ. 3500.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 23, 1928.

Rehearing Denied May 23, 1928. Hearing denied by Supreme Court June 21, 1928.

1. Contracts ⚷138(6)—Where defendant does not set up defense of illegality of contract, but evidence shows illegality, court must refuse to entertain action.

Where defendant does not set up defense of illegality of contract, but case made by plaintiff or defendant shows illegality, it becomes duty of the court sua sponte to refuse to entertain action.

2. Contracts ⚷138(6)—Where testimony showing alleged illegality of contract appeared in record, it was court's duty to pass on it as though refused amended answer was filed and testimony again admitted into record.

In action by administrator to recover money alleged to belong to deceased, but deposited in bank in defendant's name, in which defendant claimed that transaction by which money came into her possession was illegal, where testimony alleged to show illegality and which defendant sought to reintroduce in connection with her amended answer, which court refused her permission to file, appeared in record, it was duty of court to pass on it just as though amended answer had been filed, and testimony in relation thereto again admitted into record.

3. Appeal and error ⚷1041(3)—Where evidence showing alleged illegality of transaction whereby defendant obtained money from deceased was in record, refusal to permit amended answer alleging illegality held harmless.

In suit by administrator to recover money which it was alleged belonged to deceased's estate, but which was deposited in bank in defendant's name, where defendant's evidence regarding illegality of transaction by which money came into her possession was in record, refusal to permit filing of an amended answer pleading facts showing illegality held not prejudicial, since, if case presents one of illegality of contract, it must be considered by court, whether pleaded or not.

4. Appeal and error ⚷1042(2)—Striking out part of testimony regarding alleged illegal transaction whereby defendant obtained money sued for held not reversible error.

In suit by administrator to recover money which it was alleged belonged to deceased, but which was deposited in bank in name of defendant, court's granting of motion striking out part of evidence relating to defense of alleged illegality of transaction whereby defendant obtained money held not reversible error, where trial court had before it all of testimony claimed to show illegality of transaction.

5. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Court's finding on conflicting evidence being supported by evidence, judgment must be affirmed.

Court's finding that money sued for was placed in defendant's custody for purposes of safe-keeping only, being supported by evidence, judgment for plaintiff must be affirmed, even though evidence was sufficient to support gift to defendant, and also sufficient to show illegality of whole transaction.

On Petition for Rehearing.

6. Appeal and error ⚷662(4)—Final ruling and findings of fact in transcript, and not statements of judge to counsel, held controlling on appeal.

Final ruling of court and findings of fact as set forth in transcript held determinative on appeal; what trial judge may have said in colloquy with counsel not being controlling.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action for money on deposit by P. M. Dean, as administrator of the estate of Peter W. Dean, also known as P. W. Dean, and also known as Peter Dean, deceased, against Nell McNerney, also known as Mrs. G. W. McNerney, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Fred B. Mellman and Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, all of Oakland, for appellant.

Philip M. Carey, of Oakland (Marvin B. Sherwin, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. On the 27th day of January, 1925, Peter W. Dean died intestate in the city of Oakland, leaving an estate of the value of about $8,000. This estate consisted of certain jewelry and also of the sum of $7,720.66 on deposit with the American Bank in the city of Oakland. This deposit, at the time of the death of said Peter W. Dean, was standing in the name of appellant, Nell McNerney. After the death of said Peter W. Dean, P. M. Dean was appointed the administrator of his estate, and after such appointment the appellant, who then had possession of the jewelry referred to, delivered possession of the same to the plaintiff, but refused to deliver to the plaintiff or to turn over to the plaintiff the passbooks in which was entered the sum of money referred to as on deposit with the American Bank. The plaintiff had judgment for the sum above mentioned, and the defendant Nell McNerney appeals.

The appellant interposed two defenses to the plaintiff's action: First, that the money on deposit with the American Bank was what was left of the sum of $8,000 theretofore given to the appellant by the deceased, Peter W. Dean; and, second, that the transaction by which the money came into the possession of the appellant, Nell McNerney, was illegal, and that therefore the court would leave the parties where it found them and would grant no relief to the plaintiff herein.

[1, 2] The original answer of the appellant did not plead illegality of the transaction, but, after certain testimony had been admitted tending to support such defense, appellant asked leave to file an amended answer pleading, in substance, the facts shown by the testimony as establishing the illegality of the transaction. The trial court refused permission to file such amended answer, and this action is assigned as error. The trial court also refused the appellant permission to reintroduce testimony which the record shows in substance and effect to be the same as the testimony that had already been introduced into the record. This testimony was sought to be introduced in support of the allegations of the amended answer as tendered to the court. The trial court found that there was no gift made by Peter W. Dean, deceased, to the appellant of the $8,000 mentioned in the record, and also found against the contention of the illegality of the contract. Upon this appeal it is conceded by the appellant that there is sufficient testimony in the record to support the finding of the court that there was no gift, while at the same time insisting that the record shows sufficient testimony to support a gift, in the event that the court had accepted such testimony as true. Upon this appeal we have only to do with the question of illegality of the contract. The law is very well settled that, where the defendant does not set up the defense of illegality, but that the case made by the plaintiff or the defendant shows illegality, it becomes the duty of the court sua sponte to refuse to entertain the action. 6 Cal. Jur. p. 162, § 111, and cases there cited. The testimony in this case which the appellant claims to show illegality and which the appellant sought to reintroduce in connection with her amended answer, appearing in the record, it was the duty of the court to pass upon it just the same as though the amended answer had been filed and the testimony in relation thereto again admitted into the record. The finding of the court in relation to the transaction is as follows:

> "That on the 15th day of October, 1922, said Peter W. Dean, deceased, delivered to the defendant Nell McNerney in trust for safe-keeping, and for no other purpose, the sum of $8,000.66, and that said defendant Nell McNerney promised to repay said sum to the said Peter W. Dean, deceased, upon his request or demand; that there remained on January 27, 1925, in the possession of the defendant Nell McNerney from the said sum of $8,000.66 the sum of $7,720.66, which amount is now on deposit with the defendant the American Bank, a corporation, in the name of and to the credit of the defendant Nell McNerney, together with interest thereon at 4 per cent. per annum from January 1, 1925."

This finding is to the effect that the money in question was delivered by the deceased to the appellant for safe-keeping, and for no other purpose, and therefore was not delivered in accordance with the claim of the appellant that it was for the purpose of protecting her as a house owner consenting to the use of the premises belonging to her, for illegal purposes. The record shows that prior to the delivery of the $8,000 by Peter W. Dean, deceased, to the appellant on August 15, 1922, the deceased had previously intrusted with the appellant the custody of a sum of money aggregating $4,264.19; that this money had all been deposited in the Hibernia Bank of San Francisco by the appellant in her own name, and the account representing such money was all the time carried in the name of the appellant.

[3] The record also contains the testimony of a number of witnesses, which, if believed by the trial court, tended to show, if not to establish beyond controversy, that the claim of the appellant in this case that the money was either given to her outright or was given to her for the purposes of protection was an afterthought. The testimony of these witnesses, if believed by the trial court, necessitated the setting aside and absolute disregarding of all the testimony of the appellant as to there ever having been any gift of the money to her by Peter W. Dean, deceased, or having been placed in her care, custody, and control for any other purpose than for safe-keeping, just as moneys had previously been placed in her care, custody, and control by the deceased. It being admitted by the appellant that the testimony is sufficient to support the judgment of the trial court, it only remains for us to consider the alleged error in the ruling of the court in relation to the amended answer and the testimony sought to be introduced thereunder. As we have said, if the case presents one of illegality of the contract, it must be considered by the court, whether pleaded or unpleaded. Hence the refusal of the trial court to permit the filing of an amended answer could work no prejudice to the appellant.

[4] Before going further into the question as to the testimony stricken out by the trial court and not allowed to stand in support of the amended answer, we may state that the record shows that the deceased, Peter W. Dean, was for a considerable period of time engaged in the business of bootlegging; that he had stored liquors in a garage situate on the premises belonging to the appellant, and later on stored some of the liquors used by him in his business as a bootlegger in one of the rooms in the residence occupied by the appellant. The proposed amended answer recites the use of the garage by the deceased for storing liquors, and, further, that some time during the latter part of the month of July or the early part of the month of August, 1922, the appellant, upon returning to her home, discovered that the deceased had stored some of the illicit liquors in one of the rooms in the dwelling house occupied by the appellant; that the appellant spoke to the deceased concerning the same, and the deceased stated to the appellant that he would see that she would suffer no loss by reason of his use of her premises for the purpose of storing said liquors, and would see that she was protected; that thereafter, and on the 15th day of August, 1922, said deceased delivered to the appellant $8,000.66; that said deceased paid said sum of money to said appellant for the purpose of protecting the appellant against any loss by reason of the use of her premises for the storing of liquors; and that said deceased continued thereafter, until the 27th day of January, 1925, to store illicit liquors on premises belonging to the appellant. When the testimony was sought to be reintroduced by the appellant in relation to the defense so tendered, a short colloquy ensued between the trial court and counsel for appellant as to just what was claimed by the appellant in relation to the transaction. In this colloquy we find the direct questions and answers:

> "By the Court: Do you claim he paid it to her for running a bootlegging establishment?
> "Mr. Mellman (counsel for appellant): We do not. We rest on two propositions, you might say a gift of money, he made her a gift of the money; that he intended and actually did transfer the title to it; that he was moved by certain considerations."

These considerations it would appear were claimed to be protection of the appellant. The trial court then heard the testimony of the appellant in relation to the claim of illegality, but, so far as the record shows, it can only be determined that the following portion of such testimony was stricken out. It is the answer of the appellant which is in the following words:

> "I was afraid, when I saw the liquor, to have it in the house. I said, 'Pete, I don't want liquor in the house.' I didn't mean when I saw it in the garage; I didn't want it in the house. He said to me, Pete said, 'You don't need to worry; you haven't the evidence. Don't think for a minute that I will put your home or yourself in a bad position to hurt you. I will see that you are taken care of.'"

A motion to strike out this answer was interposed by counsel for the plaintiff, and appears to be the only motion granted in relation to the testimony. The question then arises, Did the court commit reversible error by granting this motion? A reference to the record shows that the following testimony was introduced and allowed to remain therein after the character of the business in which the deceased had been engaged had been established (testimony by the appellant; questions by counsel for appellant):

> "Q. Was he at that time (referring to the deceased) engaged in the bootlegging business? A. Yes.
> "Q. You remember at that time he stored liquor in your house? A. Yes.
> "Q. Was he at that time storing liquor in your garage? A. Yes.
> "Q. Did he ever, at any time, state to you what his reason was for protecting you? A. Yes.
> "Q. At any time before this did he state to you anything about it? A. Only one day I said —I began to get nervous on account of the liquor in the house, and I said, 'Pete, I don't want you to put liquor in the house; I am afraid they will take my home if I get caught.' And he said, 'Don't worry; I will show you I will take care of you.'
> "Q. How many days before the day he actually gave you this money was this? A. He said it to me at different times.
> "Q. When was the last conversation before he gave you the money or check on that subject? A. The night I came home and found the liquor stored there.
> "Q. When was that? A. Maybe a week before that, one week before that.
> "Q. When did Dean give you the money? A. He gave it to me on the morning I deposited it.
> "Q. Who was present besides you and Peter Dean? A. Nobody.
> "Q. What did he say to you? A. 'Nell, take this; put it in the bank for yourself for your protection, and if anything happens to me, and in case I am knocked over, it will help bail me out.' That is a slang phrase of saying it.
> "Q. In case I am knocked over, this was to help bail me out? A. Not all of it. If he, personally, in case I am knocked over, use it that way.
> "Q. By knocked over, what did you understand it to mean? A. If arrested.
> "Q. For bootlegging? A. Yes."

[5] It is thus apparent that the trial court had before it all of the testimony claimed to show the illegality of the transaction, and the purpose for which it is claimed the $8,000 was given by the deceased to the appellant. The court found that the money was placed in the custody of the appellant for purposes of safe-keeping, and for no other purpose, which directly contradicts the theory that the money was paid to the appellant for her protection, and the statement of counsel is direct to the effect that no claim is made that the money was paid by the deceased to the appellant for permission to run a bootlegging establishment on the premises belonging to her.

Had the court found in accordance with the testimony of the appellant as it appears in the record, it may be admitted that the testimony is sufficient to support a gift, and also sufficient to show illegality of the whole transaction; but, as the finding of the trial court to the contrary is sufficiently supported, the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PER CURIAM. [6] The final ruling of the court and the findings of fact as set forth in the transcript are determinative upon this appeal. What the trial judge may have said in a somewhat extended colloquy with counsel is not controlling.

BULLOCK v. WESTERN WHOLESALE DRUG CO. et al. (two cases).★
(Civ. 5101.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 26, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 25, 1928.

Automobiles 🔑245(91)—In action for damages resulting from automobile collision at street intersection, evidence as to last clear chance presented question for jury.

In action for damages for personal injuries resulting from collision, at street intersection, of plaintiffs' automobile with defendant's truck, approaching from left, evidence as to last clear chance held sufficient to present question of fact as to liability of defendants, and court erred in directing verdict for defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Actions for damages for personal injuries by W. P. Bullock and by Dora Bullock against the Western Wholesale Drug Company and another. The cases were consolidated for trial by stipulation, and, from a judgment for defendants in each case, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Arnold Praeger, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. These two actions were brought by husband and wife for damages resulting from an automobile accident. The facts are further stated in the opinion. The two cases were consolidated for trial by stipulation.

At the conclusion of the taking of testimony, the trial court, upon motion of defendants, directed the jury to find a verdict for defendants, and, from the judgment entered upon such verdict in each case, the plaintiffs take this appeal.

The appellants contend that the proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of the defendant Crittenden, who was driving the truck which belonged to the defendant Western Wholesale Drug Company.

The defendants pleaded contributory negligence, and, at the close of the trial made the motion for an instructed verdict on the following grounds:

"Mr. Jennings: If the court please, on behalf of the defendants we move for an instructed verdict, and move that the court instruct the jury to return a verdict for the defendants in each of these cases, on the ground that the evidence shows as a matter of law that the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence proximately causing the accident, and that that negligence was continuing, concurrent, and contemporaneous with any negligence, if any, on the part of the defendant, and on the further ground that the doctrine of the last clear chance, which has been put forward as an excuse why the case should go to the jury, has no application in this case,"

—which the court granted.

The appellants assign as error on the part of the court: (1) In refusing to permit said cases to be submitted to the jury on the doctrine of the last clear chance; (2) in granting the motion of the defendants for an instructed verdict; (3) in instructing the jury to bring in a verdict for the defendants in each of said cases.

It appears from the evidence that on the 6th day of November, 1923, at about 1:30 o'clock p. m., the plaintiff W. P. Bullock was driving his Lexington automobile easterly on Second street in the city of Los Angeles, and that the plaintiff Dora Bullock, his wife, was sitting beside him on his right side; that, as they approached the intersection of Second street and Beaudry avenue, proceeding easterly on the southerly side of Second street at about 10 or 12 miles an hour, they both looked to the right up the hill on Beaudry avenue, and did not look to the left until their machine was opposite the button or the center of the point of intersection of Second street and Beaudry avenue, when for the first time they looked to the left and saw the truck approaching, and at the same place the rear end of their machine was struck by the Ford truck driven by the defendant Crittenden, who was driving south on Beaudry avenue. Crittenden and other witnesses testified that he was sounding his horn before he entered the intersection.

We will consider appellants' second and third points first, and, as they are closely interrelated, we may consider them together.

Respondents state that they do not claim that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a finding that the defendant Crittenden was guilty of negligence, but do contend that the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The plaintiff W. P. Bullock, on cross-examination testified:

"Q. Now you never saw this truck, as I understand you, until you were about in the middle of Beaudry? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. As I understand you, you said that when you got to the intersection you looked up the hill to the south? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And saw that there was nothing coming down there? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Well, now, that hill to the south was to your right as you approached the intersection, wasn't it? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you did not look to the left until you got out there into the center of Beaudry? A. That is right.

"Q. That is correct? A. Yes, sir."

The plaintiff Dora Bullock, on cross-examination, testified as follows:

"Q. Did you look to the right when you got to Beaudry street, to see if any machine was coming down that hill there? A. I think I did. I looked to the right and then to the left.

---

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

"Q. And when was the first time that you looked to the left? A. After looking to the right.

"Q. You looked to the right first, and saw there was no machine coming down the hill, did you? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And then looked to the left? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How far out into Beaudry street had you gotten at that time, when you looked to the left? A. About the center.

"Q. That is the first time you looked to the left? A. Yes, sir."

The testimony of both Mr. and Mrs. Bullock is substantially the same on the conditions and happenings preceding and at the time of the accident. He testified that he was going 10 miles an hour; that his brakes were in good condition; that he could have stopped within 15 feet; that he did not see defendants' truck until he reached the center of Beaudry avenue, when he looked to the left for the first time; that his car was about 16 feet long.

Respondents cite many authorities on the proposition that, even if the defendant Crittenden was guilty of negligence in failing to observe the right of way rule in entering the intersection, it does not excuse the plaintiffs for their contributory negligence.

There is conflicting testimony on various other points, but without further discussion we think the above, in connection with what is stated later in this opinion, shows the material facts which the trial court felt justified its conclusion that there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs as matter of law. Respondents, among other authorities, cite Gary South Coast Agency v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 56 Cal. App. 469, 472, 205 P. 883, Finkle v. Tait, 55 Cal. App. 425, 203 P. 1031, and Moss v. H. R. Boynton Co., 44 Cal. App. 474, 186 P. 631, in which case the court says:

> "It was a duty devolving upon plaintiff, as the act of an ordinarily prudent man, immediately before placing himself in a position of danger, to look in the direction from which danger was to be anticipated. This was a continuing duty and was not met by looking once and then looking away."

In the instant case both plaintiffs admitted that they did not look to the left at all, until they reached about the center of the intersection, which was the direction from which the danger was to be anticipated. Admitting, for the sake of argument, but without deciding, that the trial court may have been justified in its conclusion that the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, we will consider the remaining contention of appellants that, however this may be, and if Bullock is chargeable with contributory negligence, nevertheless it appears from the evidence that the defendant Crittenden had the last clear chance to avoid the accident.

Appellants and respondents both agree that, where the negligence of the plaintiff continues to the moment of the accident, the doctrine of the last clear chance does not apply. Rowe v. So. Cal. Ry. Co., 4 Cal. App. 1, 87 P. 220. But the evidence is conflicting on this point, and as to how far from the intersection defendant Crittenden was when he first saw Bullock's car, and the interval which elapsed before the impact. Crittenden testified:

> "I was coming down Beaudry. I saw Mr. Bullock's car just in the neighborhood of the curb line, and I attempted to stop. My foot brake would not work; it had not worked. I used my reverse and that slowed me down some, and used my emergency brake, and also threw it in low. I turned my car to the right as much as possible. If I had turned to the left I would have hit them amidships or in the front end of the car. I turned as much as I could to turn in behind them."

Mrs. Bullock testified as follows:

"Q. When you got to the crossing of Beaudry, you did not see the truck until you were out in the center of the street, as I understand it? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Is that right? A. I said, 'Yes, sir.'

"Q. And it was then, according to your recollection, about 100 feet away? A. Yes."

Mr. Bullock testified as follows:

"Q. (by Mr. Praeger): Where were you, Mr Bullock, when you first noticed this truck? A I was about the middle of Beaudry.

"Q. Well, now, what part of your car was about in the middle of Beaudry? A. Well, my seat was right about in the center, as near as I know.

"Q. And where was the truck driver? A. He was 100 feet back, about.

"Q. And how fast do you think he was going? A. About 30 miles an hour.

"Q. The Court: Locate that truck, 100 feet back there. What does that mean?

"Q. (by Mr. Praeger): You say that the truck was about here (indicating). Where was he with respect to the center line of Beaudry avenue? A. About the center of the street —of Beaudry.

"Q. That would be about here (indicating)? A. He was right in the center. That is not the center.

"Q. You say he was right in the center? A. Yes, sir.

"The Court: You mean north of Second street? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. (by Mr. Praeger): In which direction was he proceeding? A. He was coming south.

"Q. Now, then, tell me where you were when you first saw this truck? A. Well, I was in between the curb and sitting right alongside of the button, just about the middle of the street, of Beaudry.

"Q. Will you put that car where you say you were when you first saw the truck, Mr. Bullock? (Witness indicates.)"

On cross-examination he testified:

"Q. And you say, do you, and repeat now, that that truck was 100 feet away at the time you were in the position marked by the letter 'B' there on the blackboard? A. Yes, sir."

The diagram or map referred to appears in the transcript as a part of Mr. Bullock's testimony. The witness Eickmeyer testified that the truck was about 132 feet from the corner at the time the plaintiff's car was about 15 feet from the intersection, although he apparently had previously testified differently in a deposition.

We believe that the evidence, quoted and referred to in part above, was sufficient to present a question of fact, which of course should have gone to the jury, and that the trial court erred in directing a verdict for defendants.

Judgment reversed.

PRENTICE v. WEAVER et ux. (Civ. 5146.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 25, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Appellate court will not disturb trial court's findings on conflicting evidence.

Where evidence is strongly conflicting, appellate court, on appeal, will not disturb findings of trial court.

2. Contracts ⚷346(3)—Evidence in action for labor and services in building house relative to agreement held not inadmissible as proof of affirmative defense not pleaded (Code Civ. Proc. § 2055).

In action for money alleged due for labor and services in building of house, evidence relative to arrangement or verbal agreement for building of house, adduced after plaintiff had called defendant, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, for testimony relative to such conversation, held not inadmissible as in support of affirmative defense or new matter not pleaded; issue as to whether terms of verbal agreement were as alleged having been raised by original pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by A. S. Prentice against R. D. Weaver and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Thorne, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. C. De Garmo and H. B. Cornell, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. This is an action for money alleged to be due from defendants for certain labor and services in the building of a house by plaintiff's assignor. There was no written contract. The complaint contains three counts or alleged causes of action: (1) Upon an express contract for services rendered; (2) for the reasonable value of services rendered; and (3) for money had and received. The answer contains a specific denial of all the allegations of the complaint.

The plaintiff contended that defendants had agreed to pay plaintiff's assignor 10 per cent. of the agreed price of construction for his labor and services. Defendants contended that plaintiff's assignor had agreed to construct the house for the sum of $4,248, named by him. The court found for the defendants, and from the judgment entered thereon plaintiff takes this appeal.

Appellant specifies two grounds of appeal, viz.: First, that the findings of fact and judgment are not supported by the evidence; and second, that the court erred in permitting any evidence supporting an affirmative defense or new matter when said affirmative defense or new matter was not pleaded.

[1] The evidence is quoted at some length by both appellant and respondents. It seems unnecessary here to discuss it farther than to say that a careful examination of the transcript discloses that the evidence was strongly conflicting throughout, and that it is a well-settled rule that this court will not disturb the findings of the trial court under those circumstances.

[2] As to appellant's second point, an examination of the record discloses that the evidence which was admitted over plaintiff's objection was evidence as to the conversation between plaintiff and defendants, at which the arrangement or verbal agreement for the building of the house by plaintiff's assignor was made. Plaintiff had called defendant R. D. Weaver, under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, at the opening of his case, and he had then testified in part to this conversation, and he was later called and examined by his own counsel, but only as to the matters testified to by him on such examination; i. e., his previous examination by the adverse party under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. When we consider also that the issue raised by the pleadings was whether the terms of the verbal agreement were as alleged by the plaintiff, the defendant's testimony as to this conversation would have been material even if he had not been previously examined under section 2055. The evidence developed by respondents did not operate to prove an affirmative defense which was not alleged. It tended to show that the one contract pleaded in the complaint was never made, and the trial court was right in so considering it.

The findings of the trial court, based on all the testimony, are only that the allegations of the complaint are not true, and the judgment rendered was that plaintiff take nothing. No affirmative relief was asked by or granted to the defendants.

There is no merit in either of appellant's contentions.

Judgment affirmed.

HENNING v. AKIN et al. (Civ. 5811.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1. California. April 24, 1928.

1. Pledges 🔑46—Generally, on payment of debt, pledgee must return identical property pledged as collateral.

The general rule is that a pledgee must return, on payment of debt, the identical property pledged as collateral security.

2. Pledges 🔑28—Pledgee will be held as trustee for conduct relating to property pledged.

The relation between pledgor and pledgee of personal property is in nature of a trust relation, and pledgee will be held strictly to account as trustee for his conduct in relation to trust property.

3. Joint-stock companies and business trusts 🔑8—Pledgees of syndicate units would be liable to account for improperly selling units where they had no units of their own which could be delivered on payment of debt.

If pledgees of units in syndicate, pledged to secure loan note, sold units without pledgor's knowledge or authority and contrary to provisions of note authorizing sale only after maker's default, and were unable to show that at time of sale they had any units of their own which they could deliver to pledgor on payment of obligation, they would be liable to account to pledgor for excess of proceeds of sale over balance due on note, though they had subsequently purchased units in syndicate for sole purpose of delivery to pledgor.

4. Joint-stock companies and business trusts 🔑8—Pledgor, whose syndicate units pledged to secure loan were improperly sold, held entitled to sue for accounting.

Pledgor, whose syndicate units pledged to secure loan note were improperly sold by pledgees before pledgor was in default, held entitled to maintain action for accounting of excess of proceeds of sale over balance due on debt, as against contention that pledgor's remedy was for conversion; prayer for accounting being mere incident to purpose of action to recover money.

5. Usury 🔑52—Note bearing 1 per cent. interest monthly, plus commission or bonus, held usurious.

Note for $4,120, representing $4,000 actually received by borrower and $120 bonus or commission, and bearing 1 per cent. interest per month, held usurious, and judgment thereon, which included interest and bonus for commission, was therefore erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Louis Henning against Charles C. Akin and another, copartners doing business under the fictitious name of the Akin-Lambert Company. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

James L. Davis and James L. Allen, both of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Randall & Bartlett, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. It is alleged in the complaint in this action that on or about the 25th day of June, 1923, plaintiff borrowed from the defendants the sum of $4,000, evidencing this loan with his promissory note for said sum, payable in 30 days, with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month; that as security for the payment of said sum plaintiff indorsed and delivered to the defendants a certificate for 78.6 units of the White Star Oil Syndicate, the reasonable market value of which at that time was about $15,000. It is further alleged that on or about the 27th day of July, 1923, plaintiff arranged with defendants for a renewal of said loan for a period of 90 days, and executed a new note for the principal sum of $4,000, wherein interest was made payable at the rate of 1 per cent. per month; that, as security for said new note, the defendants retained the hereinabove referred to certificate for 78.6 units of the White Star Oil Syndicate.

The complaint then alleges, upon information and belief, that prior to the maturity of the said renewal note, the defendants sold the said White Star Oil Syndicate units for a sum considerably in excess of $4,000, the exact amount unknown to the plaintiff, that the defendants have not paid over to the plaintiff the excess received by them for the sale of said units over and above the indebtedness owing by plaintiff to the defendants, but that said defendants are still demanding of plaintiff the payment of the amount of said note. The prayer of the complaint is that defendants be required to make an accounting of the proceeds derived by them from the sale of said units, and that plaintiff have judgment for the excess amount received by the defendants from said sale over the indebtedness due on account of said promissory note, and for general relief.

The defendants in their answer admit the execution of the note and the receipt by them of the units of the White Star Oil Syndicate, but deny that the units were received by them only as collateral security, alleging in addition that they were to have the right to use and handle said units as provided in the note executed by plaintiff at the time that the loan was made. The answer further denied that the said units so delivered by plaintiff to the defendants, or any of them, were sold. It should be noted that there is no provision in the pledge agreement authorizing the defendants to sell the units except in the event of default on the part of the maker of the note.

Defendants in addition filed a cross-complaint alleging the execution of the note and the delivery by plaintiff to the defendants of the units of the White Star Oil Syndicate, but allege that the renewal note was for the principal sum of $4,120. The defendants further allege that the said note became due, and that, after maturity, they tendered to the plaintiff "78.6 units of the White Star Oil Syndicate No. 1," and demanded payment of the note, but that plaintiff failed and refused to pay the note or any part thereof; that defendants tendered into court 78.6 units of the White Star Oil Syndicate to be delivered to plaintiff upon payment of the sum due on the note. The prayer in the cross-complaint is for judgment for the full sum of $4,120, as principal, with interest thereon at the rate of 1 per cent. per month from July 27, 1923, and for attorneys' fees and costs.

The plaintiff, answering defendants' cross-complaint, denies that he has not paid the principal and interest of said promissory note, and denies further that there is any part thereof remaining unpaid or due. He admits that he refused to accept the tender of the units of the White Star Oil Syndicate, for the reason that they were not the same units which had been delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants. It is also alleged, in answer to the cross-complaint, that the note is usurious.

The note set up in the answer and cross-complaint is in the usual form exacted by brokers where clients purchase stock on margin. Among other things therein contained is the following provision:

> "It is further agreed that the above-named security or any part thereof may be loaned by the Akin-Lambert Company or may be pledged by it either separately or together with other securities, either for the sum loaned thereon, or for a lesser or greater sum, or may be used by it in making deliveries or making substitutions in its business, all without further notice to the undersigned. * * * The Akin-Lumber Company shall not be obliged, however, to return to the maker the specific collateral deposited, but may deliver in place thereof a like amount of the same securities."

Provision is made in the note for the sale of the units only in the event the maker is in default.

There seems to be no controversy over the fact, as testified to by plaintiff, that he actually received only $4,000 as a loan for which he executed the note for $4,120. When the note became due, defendants demanded payment, but plaintiff contended that the note had been paid by reason of the unauthorized sale by defendants of his oil units, the proceeds from which were retained by the defendants.

It also appears that, at some time between the date of delivery of the units by the plaintiff to the defendants and the date of the trial, defendants received as dividends declared upon the 78.6 units the sum of $1,222.58, which amount was credited upon the note.

When during the trial plaintiff undertook to elicit testimony in support of his allegation that the defendants had without authority sold his collateral units, defendants objected to this line of evidence, contending that it was wholly immaterial, for the reason that they were tendering into court the same number of units which they had received from the plaintiff as collateral. This objection was sustained by the court, and the plaintiff was refused an opportunity to offer any testimony on this issue.

Judgment was rendered against the plaintiff on his complaint and in favor of the defendants on their cross-complaint for the sum of $2,897.42, being the amount which the court found due and unpaid on account of the principal and interest of the note. The credit allowed was due to dividends paid to defendants on the units while held by them.

Two points are raised by appellant in seeking a reversal of the judgment:

First. That the court erred in sustaining the defendants' objections to plaintiff's offer of testimony to prove that the defendants had, prior to the maturity of the note and contrary to its provisions, sold the 78.6 units of the White Star Oil Syndicate, which the plaintiff had delivered to the defendant as collateral security for said note.

Second. That the contract being usurious, the court erred in including in its judgment the $120 which was added to the $4,000 actually loaned to constitute the principal of the note, and interest thereon at the rate of 1 per cent per month.

The first point involves the question as to whether or not the holder of a promissory not, with units or shares of a commercial enterprise pledged as collateral security, may, contrary to the terms of the pledge agreement, sell the units without the owner's consent and avoid the owner's subsequent demand for an accounting of the proceeds derived from such sale, by tendering to the owner other units of similar character. In considering this question we will regard the units herein involved as similar in character to the shares of stock of a corporation.

Although the answer denies that the units which were delivered by appellant as collateral security were sold, in the trial of the case, the defendants did not rest their case upon this allegation, but relied upon the proposition that the defendants had a right to sell the collateral, so long as they tendered back, when the note became due, the same number of units of the White Star Oil Syndicate as were originally pledged with them. This position respondents endeavor to maintain largely upon the authority of the case of Atkins v. Gamble, 42 Cal. 86, 10 Am. Rep. 282, and upon subsequent cases approving the rule as therein laid down.

[1] It is well established as a general proposition that a pledgee must return upon the payment of the debt the identical property pledged as collateral security. Hudgens v. Chamberlain, 161 Cal. 715, 120 P. 422; Atkins v. Gamble, 42 Cal. 86, 10 Am. Rep. 282. There is, however, an exception to this general rule where shares of stock of a corporation have been pledged as collateral and certain conditions exist, and also in cases where certain commodities are delivered in pledge, such as wheat, which in the handling becomes so mixed with other commodities of similar character that it may become impossible to return the identical commodity which was originally pledged. The case of Atkins v. Gamble is the earliest decision in this state noting the exception, and contains a rather extended discussion of the considerations involved in justifying the establishing and recognition of this exception to the general rule. We deem it important to have clearly in mind the facts in that case and the important considerations which form the basis for the court's conclusion.

Atkins, the plaintiff, was a stockholder in a mining company of which Gamble, the defendant, was the president and a large stock owner. Atkins borrowed some money from Gamble, and as collateral security for the payment of this obligation pledged with Gamble 6 certificates for a total of 33⅓ shares of the stock of the mining company in question. Gamble desired to sell 10 shares of his own stock to one Martin, and contracted to do so. Fearing that publicity of the fact that the president of the company was selling some of his stock might be injurious to the company's interests, he conceived the idea of avoiding this undesirable consequence by using one of Atkins' certificates of stock which he held as collateral for the purpose of making delivery to Martin. Subsequently plaintiff paid in full his indebtedness to the defendant, whereupon the defendant tendered back to him certificates for the full number of shares which were pledged, 10 shares of which were substituted out of defendants' own stock to take the place of the 10 shares transferred to Martin. When Atkins discovered that Gamble had used one of his certificates of stock in consummating a sale at a price considerably in excess of the market price of the stock at the time Gamble returned the collateral to him, Atkins brought suit to recover the amount which Gamble had received for the sale of the stock, on the theory that there had been a conversion by Gamble of the Atkins stock. The court, in considering this situation, and announcing, so far as California was concerned for the first time, an exception to the general rule, said:

> "Whilst stock in corporations is denominated personal property, and is subject to seizure and sale under execution, and whilst a particular certificate may be capable of complete identification, by its numbers or otherwise, the certificate is but the evidence that the holder of it is entitled to an undivided share in the assets and business of the corporation. The stockholders are the joint owners of the franchise and property of the corporation, each being entitled to an undivided share thereof, and the only office of the certificate is to furnish the evidence of the quantum of interest held by the owner of the certificate."

After discussing and considering a number of cases wherein a similar question was under consideration, the court says:

> "We hold, therefore, both upon reason and authority, that by the delivery to Martin of ten shares of the plaintiff's stock, the defendant, on the facts proved and found [italics ours], did not become responsible to the plaintiff for the proceeds of the sale. * * * The defendant was at all times able, and ready, and willing to transfer to the plaintiff the same number of shares of similar stock of the same company, and which had precisely the same value." (Italics ours.)

It will be noted that the court, in declaring its conclusion, deemed it important to preface it with the statement, "on the facts proved and found." These facts as stated clearly show:

First. That defendant at the time he used plaintiff's certificate for 10 shares and at all times thereafter was the owner and in control of more than 10 shares of stock of the mining company in question.

Second. That he intended to and did sell 10 shares of his own stock.

Third. That, in delivering one of plaintiff's certificates for 10 shares to Martin, he made use of this evidence of ownership of 10 shares as a mere convenience.

Fourth. That at all times he was ready and able to deliver to plaintiff a certificate evidencing the ownership of 10 shares of the same stock.

Following the Atkins v. Gamble decision, our Supreme Court next had occasion to express itself on this subject in Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 99. The court, in citing with approval the rule as laid down in Atkins v. Gamble, emphasizes as a necessary condition for the application of the rule that the pledgee be at all times ready and able to return upon demand shares of stock equal in number to those of the pledged stock used by him.

In the case of Hayward v. Rogers, 62 Cal. 348, it appears that the defendant had borrowed considerable sums of money from the plaintiff, and, as security for the payment of these sums, had pledged certain certificates of stock. Prior to the maturity of the obligation Hayward made several sales of stock of the corporation, certificates for shares of which he held as collateral to Rogers' note. In completing these sales, Hayward used several of Rogers' certificates of stock. Subsequently, the debt not being paid when due, Hayward brought action upon the notes, and Rogers set up in his defense the fact that Hayward had sold part of his pledged stock, and demanded that the proceeds derived from said sale be credited upon his indebtedness to Hayward. It appears that, at the time Hayward sold the stock, the market value was greatly in excess of the market value when the suit was brought. In relation to the question as to whether or not Hayward was liable to Rogers for the proceeds of the sale, the court instructed the jury that if Hayward, at the time that he used the certificates of stock belonging to Rogers, was actually intending to sell his own interest in the corporation, and had merely used Rogers' certificates for the purpose of conveying the same to the purchaser, and was at that time and at all times ready, able, and willing to deliver to Rogers an equal number of shares of stock, then Rogers was not injured by Hayward's act in using the pledged certificates, and the court instructed the jury further that, "if they found that Hayward had sold the identical 690 shares, and that he was not at the time of such sale able, willing, and ready to deliver to Rogers a similar number of shares," then Hayward would not be relieved from the obligation to make an accounting of the proceeds to Rogers. It is interesting to note that the court, in instructing the jury, in order to emphasize and make clear the line of demarcation between a pledgee's conduct with the pledged property that would require him to return the identical property pledged, and a situation where he could return other similar property, points out the case where a warehouseman takes wheat as a pledge security and commingles it with other wheat, owned and controlled by the warehouseman, of the same character. In such cases the court pointed out that the warehouseman is required to return, upon the payment of the debt, not the identical wheat he received in pledge, but he fulfills his obligation when he returns the same amount of wheat of similar quality. Upon appeal, our Supreme Court held these instructions correctly stated the rule applicable where pledged certificates of stock were used without authority by the pledgee.

In a later case, that of Bell v. Bank of California, 153 Cal. 234, 94 P. 889, the same considerations were pointed out in the following language:

> "It is true that, in the case of a pledge of shares of stock in a corporation, the identity of the particular certificates delivered and pledged is not important. Atkins v. Gamble, 42 Cal. 86, 10 Am. Rep. 282. A sale of these certificates will not constitute a conversion, if the pledgee has at all times had in his possession, ready for delivery to the pledgor upon redemption, similar certificates evidencing a right to the same number of shares. Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 99; Hayward v. Rogers, 62 Cal. 348. * * * But there is no presumption that the pledgee has such certificates," etc.

We have pointed out with some detail and at length the views of the court as expressed in the foregoing cases, for the purpose of making clear the line of demarcation, and more particularly to note that in all of these cases the courts have recognized the right of a pledgee of certificates of stock to use them only when he is in fact the owner of stock himself in the corporation and is attempting to make a sale of his own stock, using the pledgee's certificates merely as a convenience in consummating his own transaction. We have nowhere found this rule made applicable to a situation where the pledgee of corporate stock, not being the owner himself of shares of stock in the same corporation, makes a sale of such pledged stock, and subsequently, upon the maturity of the debt, repurchases a similar number of shares of stock for the purpose of returning them to the pledgor. To apply the rule to such a state of facts would be to undermine the well-established principles and considerations that are recognized as necessarily controlling the use by a trustee of the trust estate committed to him.

[2] It is well established that the relation existing between a pledgor and a pledgee of the personal property is in the nature of a trust relation. The responsibility of the pledgee is that of the trustee. He will be held strictly to account for his conduct in relation to the trust property. Hudgens v. Chamberlain, 161 Cal. 710, 120 P. 422.

[3] In the instant case the complaint directly charges the misuse by the pledgee of plaintiff's pledged stock by making a sale of it without plaintiff's knowledge or authority. The answer directly denies this charge. It thus became a material issue in the case. If plaintiff is able to support his allegation, the burden would then fall upon the defendants to show that they came within the exception rule; i. e., that, when they improperly used plaintiff's certificates, they were then and at all times thereafter ready, willing, and able to deliver to plaintiff on the payment of the obligation an equal number of units of the White Star Oil Syndicate. If the evidence would then disclose that at the time that the sale was made defendants had no units of their own, but subsequently purchased units for the sole purpose of making return to the plaintiff, defendants clearly would not come within the rule that entitled them to be relieved from making an accounting to the plaintiff, for, under such circumstances, it would appear that the defendants sold plaintiff's units, and immediately upon such sale plaintiff had a cause of action against the defendants to compel an accounting. It would then be well within the province of a court of equity to require the defendants, upon crediting the full amount remaining unpaid on the plaintiff's indebtedness to them, to pay over the excess proceeds to the plaintiff.

Another pertinent question arises in the instant case from the fact that dividends were declared by the syndicate upon the various units. It appears that plaintiff himself received some of these dividends, and the defendants also received dividends. Defendants testified that they had credited upon plaintiff's note all the dividends they received, but it nowhere appears in the record that the dividends which the defendants did receive and those which the plaintiff received constituted all of the dividends that were declared upon the units of the syndicate between the time that plaintiff pledged his units with the defendants and the date of the trial. If, forsooth, several weeks or months elapsed between the time of sale and transfer of the pledged units by the defendants, and the time when they repurchased units to return to the plaintiff, dividends had been declared by the syndicate, none of such dividends would have been paid to the defendants, for the reason that during such interim the dividends would have been paid to the actual owner or holder of the 78.6 units which had been sold.

[4] Respondents urge that, even if there is merit in appellant's contention that under his offer of proof evidence might have been adduced that would entitle him to recover by reason of the unauthorized sale, he may not do so in this case, for the reason that his remedy under such circumstances would be in an action for conversion; that the instant action is one for an accounting and not for conversion. We can see no merit in this contention. Plaintiff clearly had a right of action to recover from the defendants, if he could show that defendants had unlawfully used his property, and that he had been damaged thereby. Whether we call the action one in conversion or one in assumpsit is of little consequence. The prayer for an accounting is a mere incident to the main purpose of the action; namely, the recovery of money. The effect of the action is that plaintiff ratifies the sale made by defendants of his stock, and demands that the proceeds be applied on his indebtedness. He was well within his rights in filing the instant action. Bell v. Bank of California, 153 Cal. 243, 94 P. 889.

[5] The second point raised by appellant, that the note in question is usurious and that therefore the court erred in rendering a judgment that included the interest and the bonus or commission included in the principal of the note, must be sustained.

Respondents in their brief virtually concede appellant's contention. It is not denied that appellant received but $4,000, for which he executed a note for $4,120. The only conclusion that can be drawn from the evidence is that the $120 was in the nature of a bonus or commission to respondents. The note in addition provides for 1 per cent. per month interest. This clearly stamps the document as a usurious note. Wallace v. Zinman, 200 Cal. 585, 254 P. 946; Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., 200 Cal. 609, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805; Blodgett v. Rheinschild, 56 Cal. App. 728, 206 P. 674.

Judgment is reversed.

FILMER v. DAVIS. (Civ. 6296.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 23, 1928.

Rehearing Denied May 23, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 21, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚷757(1)—Appellant must print in brief enough of record to enable reviewing court to determine appeal on merits without examination of transcript (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

Appellant, under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, requiring printing in brief of "such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court," must print enough of the record to enable the appellate court to determine the merits of the appeal without examination of the transcript, except possibly where dispute arises as to contents of official record.

2. Appeal and error ⚷757(1)—Where respondent prints some of record or challenges appellant's statements concerning it, appellant should print in brief matters relied on to overcome respondent's contentions (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

If respondent prints some of the record in support of the judgment, or challenges appellant's statements concerning the record, appellant should, under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, print what he relies on to overcome the contentions of his adversary.

3. Appeal and error ⚷901—Burden of showing error is on appellant (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

Burden of showing error is on appellant, even where appeal is taken under the alternative method, under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c.

4. Appeal and error ⚷766—Failure of appellant to print in brief portions of record essential to merits of controversy after challenge to sufficiency of brief required affirmance of judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

appellant's brief to set out essential portions of testimony in first instance, or after filing of respondent's brief, which challenged sufficiency of matters set out, held to require affirmance of judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, requiring printing of such portions of record as appellant desires to call to court's attention; matters raised in appellant's brief relating only to form of action, and not to merits.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by William P. Filmer against George M. Davis. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On motion to affirm the judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c. Motion granted, and judgment affirmed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John H. Crabbe and Bradford Webster, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Respondent made a motion herein to affirm the judgment appealed from upon the ground that appellant has failed to comply with the requirements of Code of Civil Procedure section 953c, by failing to print in his brief or in a supplement thereto "such portions of the record as they desire (he desires) to call to the attention of the court." Pearson v. Parsons, 173 Cal. 331, 159 P. 1171; Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 233 P. 330; Jeffords v. Young, 197 Cal. 224, 239 P. 1054, and other cases are cited and relied on by respondent. In the last-cited case the Supreme Court's opinion contains the following:

> "It has been reiterated approximately one hundred times in the decisions of this court and of the district courts of appeal that it is incumbent upon an appellant who relies upon a typewritten transcript to print in his brief or in a printed supplement thereto sufficient of the record to justify a reversal of the judgment or order appealed from. 2 Cal. Jur. 643 et seq. Furthermore, as we pointed out some months ago (Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 233 P. 330), since the 1923 amendment to the section last cited, an appellant who fails to do this incurs thereby the risk that the order or judgment appealed from may be affirmed upon motion."

In Dahlberg v. Dahlberg (Cal. Sup.) 260 P. 290, a motion to affirm for failure to comply with section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, was granted.

[1] While the precise wording of the section requires the appellant to print such parts of the record as he desires to call attention to, the decisions above referred to, as well as the very nature of the matter, require that appellant print enough of the record to enable the appellate court to determine the merits of the appeal without examination of the typewritten transcript, except perhaps in case of a dispute developed in the briefs as to what the official record actually contains.

In this case appellant has printed a small part of the testimony and only of that part which is favorable to his contention. He prints none of the pleadings, findings, or judgment. Respondent's brief challenges the sufficiency of the printed matter of appellant's brief, and specifies that certain evidence omitted from appellant's brief supports the judgment. This brief was filed October 16, 1926. Appellant's time to reply has expired, and he has filed no reply brief nor made any attempt to amplify the printed part of the record. He rather assumes that his statements of the record are unchallenged. This is true with respect to some parts, but, with respect to the vital points in the case, respondent is not so complaisant.

Although this appeal has not yet been reached in the regular course so as to be put upon the calendar for argument and submission upon its merits, this motion requires us to examine the briefs and the subject-matter of the appeal in order to ascertain whether the motion should be granted or denied.

John C. Colburn held an option on a large block of shares of the capital stock of the General Research Company, a corporation, which held patents supposed to be essential to the wireless telephone. Colburn interested appellant, Davis, in the project. Davis, through friendship and fraternal ties, induced several friends to put up money for stock in the company. Colburn's option expired, the company forfeited its charter, and the whole project was a failure. The respondent is the assignee of the friends who, together with himself, put up sums of money aggregating $5,000, and this action was brought to recover the money.

We will refer to the plaintiff in the plural number to indicate the plaintiff and his assignors.

The complaint, not printed, contains two counts for each of the plaintiffs. One count is in debt for money had and received which defendant is alleged to have promised in writing to repay and one count is for debt upon an account stated which defendant is alleged to have promised in writing to repay. The findings and judgment, also not printed, were in favor of the plaintiffs upon the counts for money received, but not upon the counts upon an account stated.

Appellant's points on appeal are that the evidence shows that Colburn, and not Davis, received the money, and for that reason an action for money received will not lie against Davis, even though he were proved guilty of fraud. When it came time for plaintiffs to pay over the money, Davis had them sign a written contract, which was a contract for the purchase and sale of shares of capital stock in the General Research Company. This contract, also not printed, names Colburn instead of Davis as the seller and the party of the first part. Appellant relies on this contract, together with some small excerpts of testimony of Davis and Filmer, and other testimony not printed but simply referred to by citing the page of the typewritten transcript, to show that the money was not paid to Davis in such a way to support a judgment upon a complaint for money received.

Respondent's brief first attacks the sufficiency of the certification of the transcript on the ground that more than one-half is not certified, but this is not involved upon this motion. The following facts are said by respondent to be disclosed by the typewritten record supporting the judgment as for money received: That the company was defunct, and not authorized to issue stock in California, and cites facts in this connection showing fraud upon the part of defendant in obtaining the money; that in each case the money or checks were paid or delivered to Davis; that none of the plaintiffs knew Colburn; that they were not informed that he was interested in the matter until Davis declared at the time the contract was signed that it was made in the name of Colburn purely for convenience; that Davis and Colburn had a secret agreement to equally divide the proceeds of the entire transaction between themselves; that a form of receipt prepared by Davis was made in his own name as his personal receipt and as his personal agreement to deliver the shares of stock for the money; that plaintiffs' dealings were with Davis alone; that Davis gave to Colburn a part of the money without authority from plaintiffs, and in direct violation of his assurances and promises that he would personally account to plaintiffs therefor; that no share of stock was received in exchange for the money; that Davis assigned his one-fifth interest in a $55,000 estate to his wife; that two letters were written by Davis in which he acknowledges his responsibility to plaintiffs, although he calls it a moral responsibility, and in which letters he acknowledges and declares that the plaintiffs parted with their money upon his credit, personality, and promises, and not upon those of Colburn; that other facts in the record show that Davis received the money for the purpose of buying shares of stock, but converted it by giving most of it to Colburn without receiving any stock therefor; that letters from Davis to respondent's counsel refer to an offer by appellant to give an unsecured promissory note for the amount advanced by plaintiffs; that Davis had testified that he would discharge his moral obligation by paying back the $5,000 if he got in a position to do so; that he was now able to pay all his debts, including any judgment in this case; that he nevertheless now refused to repay. Respondent prints some of the documentary evidence, but most of the facts claimed by him are merely stated with page references to the reporter's transcript.

Having thus outlined the evidence as it is claimed by the respective parties, it is apparent that this court is not able to decide this appeal upon its merits from such fragmentary portions of the record as have been printed. Granting all of appellant's contentions of law, nevertheless, if only certain parts of the evidence claimed by respondent was before the trial court, the duty devolves upon this court to determine whether the judgment is supported by the evidence. The facts as claimed by respondent when examined may show a conversion or misappropriation of the money for which an action for money would lie. 41 Cor. Jur. § 45. Despite the form of the contract naming Colburn as the party of the first part, there is still a question to be determined only from the evidence, whether Davis received the money under such circumstances that he should be answerable in an action for money received as distinguished from an action for damages for fraud and deceit. For example, did Davis receive the money from the plaintiffs for a purpose which became impossible of performance because the stock could not issue? Gray v. Ellis, 164 Cal. 481, at page 485, 129 P. 791; Hallidie v. Enginger, 175 Cal. 505, at page 508, 166 P. 1.

[2, 3] It may no doubt be difficult in some cases for an appellant to know just how much of the record he should print in his opening brief, where he claims an absence of evidence on certain issues of fact; but, where counsel for appellant has gone through the trial of the case, it should be quite seldom that he is unable to anticipate what evidence respondent relies upon. At any rate, and at the latest, appellant should be able to know this after reading respondent's brief. If respondent prints some of the record in support of the judgment, or challenges appellant's statements concerning the record, appellant should then print what he relies upon to overcome the contentions of his adversary. Failing to do so, he has not complied with the requirement of the Code of Civil Procedure, § 953c. The burden of showing error is on the appellant, even where the appeal is taken under the alternative method.

[4] Some hesitancy is frequently and properly expressed by courts in disposing of an appeal upon a motion not involving the real merits of the controversy. In this case, however, no reason exists for this attitude. The appellant's position before this court is, not that he should in no event be required to pay plaintiffs the amount of money sued for, but only that the form of action should be other than the one set up in the complaint.

It is therefore ordered that the motion be, and the same is hereby, granted, and the said judgment is affirmed.

COMMERCIAL CASUALTY INS. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5967.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 25, 1928.

1. Master and servant ⚷417(7)—In reviewing decision of Industrial Accident commission, appellate court cannot weigh conflicting evidence (Workmen's Compensation Law).

Under Workmen's Compensation Law (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended), in reviewing decision of Industrial Accident Commission, appellate court has no power to weigh conflicting evidence for purpose of determining on which side preponderance lies.

2. Insurance ⚷665(3)—Evidence supported Industrial Accident Commission's finding that employer did not take partner after issuance of policy and before employee was injured, without assignment of policy or consent of insurer.

Evidence held to support finding of Industrial Accident Commission that employer had not taken partner into business after issuance of liability policy and before employee was injured without assignment of policy or consent of insurance carrier to change so as to relieve insurance carrier from liability for employee's injuries.

3. Insurance ⚷435—Workmen's compensation policy held to cover business operations at other place than that specified in policy.

Workmen's compensation insurance policy, containing provision that it should apply to injuries sustained by reason of business operation described, whether conducted at work place described, or else in connection with, or in relation to, such work places, held to cover accident during business operations at place other than that specified in policy.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Law by Antonio Solis, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, Thomas Solis, and others for compensation for injuries, opposed by Joe Uribe, employer, and Commercial Casualty Insurance Company, insurance carrier. The Industrial Accident Commission made an award against the insurance carrier and in favor of applicant, dismissed the employer from the case, and the insurance carrier brings certiorari. Affirmed, and writ discharged.

Harry D. Parker, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. This proceeding brings before us on a writ of review a decision of the Industrial Accident Commission. The case was brought before that commission by Antonio Solis, who filed an application stating that he was in the employ of American Cleaners & Dyers; that he had sustained injuries arising out of his employment; and that the petitioner was the insurance carrier of his employer. Petitioner filed an answer admitting that it had issued a policy to one Joe Uribe, but denying that he was the applicant's employer, and denying generally that it was the insurance carrier of such employer, and alleging that the policy issued by it did not cover the place where the injuries to the applicant occurred. After a hearing, the Industrial Accident Commission found against petitioner on both of these defenses, and made an award against it in favor of the applicant, dismissing the employer from the case. The petitioner now claims that the findings above mentioned are without support in the evidence.

[1, 2] On the first point, it was conceded that on November 4, 1926, petitioner had issued to Joe Uribe, doing business as American Cleaners & Dyers, a policy insuring him under the Workmen's Compensation Law (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended). The applicant was injured on April 21, 1927, and petitioner's contention is that, after the issuance of the policy, and before the applicant was injured, Joe Uribe had taken a partner named Beldon; that at the date of the injuries the business formerly carried on by Uribe alone was being carried on by Uribe and Beldon as partners, but under the same fictitious name as before; that no assignment of the policy or consent of petitioner to such change was shown; and that the necessary conclusion from these facts is that, at the time of the applicant's injuries, petitioner was not the insurance carrier for the employer.

The evidence on this point was given by Uribe alone. He testified, in substance, that Beldon was with him from the first of the year following the issuance of the policy, but working on commission; that in February Beldon was a partner; and that the place where the applicant was injured was operated by himself and Beldon in partnership. He further testified as follows:

"Q. You went into partnership with him on January 1st? A. Well, in February we talked about partnership, but we never sign no agreement. He was there and left in April. We didn't really sign nothing because we couldn't come to an agreement, so he just left.

"Q. So you never did come to an agreement on partnership? A. No, sir.

"Q. But you talked about a partnership? A. Yes.

"Q. And then in April he left, did he? A. Yes; trouble came up; there was too much trouble.

"Q. By trouble you mean when this man got hurt? A. Sure.

"Q. And the place got burned down? A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. And in talking with Mr. Beldon about going into partnership with you, was the talk that he would go into partnership in the cleaning business, in just the part of the business of cleaning, or was he to go into partners with you? A. In the two businesses.

"Q. Both businesses together? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. But that was never finished up? A. That wasn't finished."

He also testified that the funds of the business were kept at all times in a bank in his own name; that he had a lot of machinery in one of the places of business; and that Beldon was not drawing any salary from February, but got one-half of the profits of the business from that time until the place was burned up (which happened at the same time that applicant was injured).

From this evidence we think conflicting inferences may be drawn. The division of the profits between Uribe and Beldon is one of the indicia of a partnership, but, on the other hand, it appears that the plant used in the business was owned by Uribe, and apparently Beldon had contributed nothing to it, and that, when disaster came, Beldon simply stepped out without the necessity of any settlement of partnership accounts between them. Negativing the existence of a partnership is also Uribe's testimony that they talked about a partnership, but never came to an agreement about it. It is true that he also testified in so many words that they were partners, but this general statement was not conclusive against his testimony of circumstances from which a contrary inference could be drawn. In reviewing the decisions of the Industrial Accident Commission, we have no power to weigh conflicting evidence for the purpose of determining on which side the preponderance lies. If, on any reasonable view that can be taken of the evidence, we find its decision supported by substantial evidence, even though there may be evidence in conflict therewith, our inquiry is at an end. In this case we discover such support for the finding under consideration.

[3] Petitioner's other point is based on the fact that the place of business at which the applicant was injured was not that specified in the policy, although the policy declared as one of its conditions that the employer was conducting business operations at no other place than that so specified. But the policy also contained a provision that it should apply to injuries sustained by reason of the business operations described, whether conducted at the work places described "or elsewhere in connection with, or in relation to, such work places," and in its description of the business operations covered by it, which immediately follows the specification of the place of business, it includes "operations not on the premises." This question is decided against the petitioner in Associated Theatres v. Ind. Acc. Com., 57 Cal. App. 105, 206 P. 665, where it was held that a policy identical in terms with that now under consideration covered business operations at other places than that specified in the policy.

The award is affirmed, and the writ is discharged.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; YORK, J.

CAMPBELL v. SUMMAR. (Civ. 4692.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 25, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Trial court's failure to find on defendant's counterclaims, where there was evidence to support them, held prejudicial error.

In action on counts for money had and received and on promise to pay stated sum, wherein defendant filed counterclaims, trial court's failure to make any finding on the issues presented in defendant's answer held prejudicial error, where reporter's transcript showed that evidence was produced by the defendant tending to support his counterclaims.

2. Evidence 🔑450(12)—Written instrument, merely receipt on its face, but stating money was borrowed, held sufficiently doubtful to warrant evidence to determine parties' intention.

In suit on written instrument, which was merely a receipt on its face, and which read in part, "Received of C. $716 borrowed money and office money," the words "borrowed money" held to make the meaning of the instrument sufficiently doubtful to warrant reception of evidence to determine intention of parties, and particularly of signer of instrument, at time of execution.

3. Contracts 🔑175(3)—Evidence held not to support finding that defendant, by writing sued on, promised to pay plaintiff stated sum.

In suit on written instrument reading in part, "Received of C. $716 borrowed money and office money," wherein plaintiff alleged that instrument was written promise and agreement by defendant to pay plaintiff the sum of $716, evidence held not sufficient to support the finding that defendant, by such writing, promised and agreed to pay plaintiff the stated sum.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth M. Campbell against C. S. Summar, in which defendant filed counterclaims. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Holcomb & Holcomb, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Seth B. Smith and Lucas F. Smith, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. In this action the plaintiff's complaint contains two counts, the first for money had and received by the defendant in the sum of $716, and the second alleging a written promise and agreement by defendant to pay the plaintiff the sum of $716. The answer, in addition to denying the material allegations of the complaint, asks affirmative relief by way of two counterclaims, one for $125 and the other for $253.95. It also alleges the existence of a partnership between the parties, and asks for an accounting by the plaintiff. Judgment was given for the full sum demanded, $716.

[1] The trial court made but one finding, which was:

> "That on or about November 1, 1921, defendant made his certain instrument in writing, whereby he promised and agreed to pay to plaintiff the sum of seven hundred and sixteen ($716) dollars; that no part of said sum has been paid to plaintiff."

The court, probably inadvertently, failed to make any finding upon the issues presented in the defendant's answer; but, since an examination of the reporter's transcript shows that evidence was produced by the defendant tending to support his counterclaims, the failure to find thereon was erroneous, and prejudicially so.

[2, 3] The instrument executed on November 1, 1921, by the defendant and by which the court finds that the defendant promised to pay the plaintiff the sum of $716, reads as follows:

> "C. S. Summar Co., Real Estate.
> "1705 So. Vermont Ave., Los Angeles.
> "Received of Elizabeth M. Campbell $716 borrowed money and office money.
> "[Signed] C. S. Summar."

This writing, on its face, is a mere receipt. However, since the words "borrowed money" are used, it is of sufficiently doubtful meaning to warrant the reception of evidence to determine the intention of the parties, and particularly of the signer of the instrument at the time he executed it. Yet, from the testimony offered in that behalf most favorable to the plaintiff and respondent, it cannot be said that the intent was to promise to pay Mrs. Campbell the entire $716 at any time. She said in her testimony that $440 of the $716, which she claimed was given by her to Summar, was to erect a building. When asked if she loaned this money she said: "I did not loan it to him." "I put it up for a half for my son-in-law, Mr. F. A. Ryker." "It was to be half of what the building cost, and he was to put up a like sum." She then detailed the business relations of the parties; her claim concerning the $440 being that she had advanced it under an arrangement by which her son-in-law was to become a partner of the defendant, and the money was to be used to construct a building, which the defendant never built. From this statement it is apparent that the evidence does not support the finding that the defendant by this writing promised and agreed to pay the plaintiff $716. As to the amount not included in the $440, it may be that the writing was so intended.

The judgment is reversed.

CASSOU v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 6360.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 24, 1928.

1. Depositions ⚷56(4)—Court may shorten notice for deposition on oral interrogatories, after notice of motion to have deposition taken on written interrogatories (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1005, 2025, 2025½).

Where plaintiff gave notice of motion for permission to take deposition in foreign state on written interrogatories, and defendant moved to have deposition taken on oral interrogatories after giving one day's notice of such motion, held, that court had power to order deposition taken on oral interrogatories, under provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1005, empowering court to shorten time in which notices must be given, notwithstanding provisions of sections 2025, 2025½, prescribing two and three days' notices, respectively, in such event.

2. Depositions ⚷39—Opposite party need not elect to have deposition taken on oral interrogatories before date specified in notice to have deposition taken on written interrogatories (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2025, 2025½).

Where notice of motion to have deposition taken on written interrogatories is made, opposite party need not make election to have deposition taken on an oral interrogatory before date specified in original notice of motion, since neither Code Civ. Proc. § 2025, nor section 2025½, contains language which creates such strict limitations, but they simply require either two or three days' notice, and do not specify that it cannot be given after date specified in original notice of motion, if that motion is continued for hearing by court to another day.

Petition for writ of mandate by Celine Cassou, to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and Hon. Thomas F. Graham, Judge, to require respondents to issue commission to take a deposition. Denied.

George D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for petitioner.

a deposition in a foreign state upon written interrogatories, instead of upon oral interrogatories as ordered by the court. The petitioner is plaintiff in a divorce action pending in said superior court. She gave to the defendant in that action five days' written notice of motion to take the deposition of a witness in the state of Illinois upon written interrogatories. The verified petition filed in this court stated:

> "That thereafter, and on the hearing of the petitioner's motion in said action for the issuance of the said commission upon said written interrogatories, the said defendant did not propose any cross-interrogatories, but instead and without giving your petitioner three days' notice in writing, or any other notice, of his election so to do, applied to said superior court * * * for an order directing that said deposition be taken on interrogatories to be propounded to the witness orally."

The court, over the objection of the petitioner, ordered the deposition to be taken on oral interrogatories. The objections which the court thus overruled, besides specifying the inconvenience of taking the deposition orally, specified that the defendant had not given petitioner three days' notice of his election to have the deposition taken orally in accordance with section 2025½, Code of Civil Procedure.

The answer of respondent, filed on the return date of the alternative writ issued herein, set up the fact that the petitioner was in fact given notice by the defendant in said action of his motion to have the said deposition taken orally. A certified copy of said notice of motion was filed in this court on the argument. The notice was served one day before the day to which the hearing of petitioner's original motion had been continued, and the notice was accompanied by an order of said superior court, shortening the time for the service of the same to one day.

It is now the contention of the petitioner that defendant's one-day notice was ineffectual to give the court power to order the deposition to be taken orally. Petitioner contends that the case is governed by the provisions of section 2025½, Code of Civil Procedure, wherein is found the following expression:

> "(Or where notice shall have been given that a commission to take the testimony of nonresident witness will be applied for, the opposite party, upon giving the other three days' notice in writing of his election so to do), may have a commission * * * orally."

Petitioner recognizes a conflict, as he must, between this section and section 2025 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides the method of obtaining a commission to take the deposition of a nonresident witness upon written interrogatories and concludes with the following expression:

> "When the parties agree to that mode, or the court on the application of either party, after a hearing had upon two days' notice to the opposite party, so directs, the examination must be without written interrogatories."

Petitioner, in attempting to reconcile these two sections, claims that the three days' notice provision of section 2025½ is applicable exclusively to where the proceedings to obtain a commission for a deposition is inaugurated by a notice of motion to take the same upon written interrogatories. She contends that the two days' notice of motion mentioned in section 2025 is applicable only where the proceedings are inaugurated by a notice to take an oral deposition. With this we cannot agree. If the original notice specified oral interrogatories, there would be no need for the opposing party to give two days' notice that he also wished the deposition to be taken orally. If petitioner means to contend that a proceeding for an oral deposition may be commenced by giving only a two days' notice, under section 2025 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that construction would conflict with section 2024 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires five days' notice of motion for a commission to take a deposition of a nonresident witness, and which last-named section, in the absence of any words of limitation, applies both to oral and written depositions.

This contention, however, does not seem to us to be very material in this proceeding, for, aside from the difference between two and three days, we can see little difference between the language of section 2025½ of the Code of Civil Procedure, prescribing three days' notice of election, and the language of section 2025, "after hearing had upon two days' notice to the opposite party." In this case the defendant gave neither a three days' nor a two days' notice, but only a one day's notice, together with an order shortening time to one day.

[1, 2] The only point involved in this proceeding, therefore, is whether the superior court has power to shorten the time of the notice which the opposite party is required to give in case he wishes to have the deposition taken orally, whether it be two days or three days. No authorities are cited on this point, but no reason has been suggested, and we can think of none, why the provisions of section 1005 of the Code of Civil Procedure do not give the court the power to prescribe a shorter time. This section deals with all written notices of motion. It prescribes the time in which notices must be given and concludes with the expression, "but in all cases the court, or a judge thereof, may prescribe a shorter time." It has been held that the required five days' notice of motion to take a deposition may be shortened by an order of court. Dambmann v. White, 48 Cal. 439 at 451. If this five days' time may be shortened by an order of court then it must necessarily follow that the two or three days' time which is given the opposite party to make a counter motion can also be shortened. Normally and in general these two or three days are embraced within the five days following the original notice of motion to take a deposition. If the five days is considerably shortened by an order of court, in many cases there would not be sufficient time left for the opposite party to give the two or three days' notice of his counter motion.

We see no force to petitioner's claim that the opposite party must make an election before the date specified in the original notice of motion. Neither section 2025 nor section 2025½ of the Code of Civil Procedure contains any language which could create such a strict limitation. They simply require either a two days' or three days' notice, and do not specify in any way that it cannot be given after the date specified in the original notice of motion, if that motion is continued for hearing by the court to another day.

We conclude that the trial court was not without power to order the deposition to be taken upon oral interrogatories, and that it had the power to decide upon the hearing, according to the evidence and its sound discretion, whether written or oral interrogatories should be used in the taking of the deposition.

A peremptory writ of mandate is therefore denied, and the proceeding dismissed.

GLOBE INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
(Civ. 5988.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 26, 1928.

Master and servant ⚿419—Industrial Commission could, seven months after denying rehearing, amend original award by awarding continuing compensation indemnity and medical care (Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 20, subd. d).

Under Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 20, subd. d (St. 1917, p. 850), enlarging the continuing jurisdiction of Industrial Accident Commission beyond that theretofore existing, the commission had jurisdiction seven months after denying petition for rehearing to amend original award and make award for continuing compensation indemnity and for hospital and medical care.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Albert Leo, employee, opposed by the Globe Indemnity Company, insurance carrier. From an order of the Industrial Accident Commission amending an award, the insurance carrier brings certiorari. Affirmed.

R. O. Purvis, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. The petition sets forth that respondent, Albert Leo, was a carpenter in the employ of one H. J. Christensen. He was injured in the course of his employment when he strained his back while lifting a joist. After the injury he was furnished treatment by Globe Indemnity Company, the insurance carrier of said Christensen, and was also paid compensation indemnity until on or about May 20, 1926, at which time he was advised because of the progress in his convalescence from his injuries he was able to do light work and therefore compensation indemnity would be paid for the balance of his disability at a partial rate. Thereafter, being dissatisfied with this action on the part of the insurance carrier, Leo filed an application for the adjustment of his claim with the Industrial Accident Commission. At the time of the hearing Leo informed the referee of the commission that he had been examined by doctors of his own selection and had been advised that a radical operation upon his back was necessary for the relief and cure of his condition. Leo was thereafter examined by a physician appointed by the medical department of the commission, who filed a report as evidence in the case. Thereafter, on or about July 27, 1926, the commission made its findings and award and ordered that the insurance carrier should pay to Leo partial compensation indemnity. The award was silent in respect to the operative procedure requested by the applicant. Leo petitioned for a rehearing, in which it was recited that he had been operated upon. This petition for rehearing was not upon the grounds nor in the form required by the Workmen's Compensation Act, and it was denied by the commission September 20, 1926. Thereafter and some time prior to March 4, 1927, Leo filed a petition for the reopening of the case and for the allowance of further compensation. He set forth in his petition the fact that he had been operated upon and that by reason thereof he had incurred certain expenses; that he was totally disabled and could not perform labor, and requested the commission to make an award for continuing compensation indemnity and for his hospital and medical care. Hearing was had by the commission upon this application over the objection of petitioner herein, it being claimed that the issue of the operation was res adjudicata, the commission having already passed upon the question. On May 3, 1927, the commission made its order amending the original findings and award and granting to Leo the medical expense and indemnity he applied for in his petition to reopen the case. Petitioner herein filed a petition for rehearing from said last-mentioned order, which petition was denied.

It is here claimed that, by reason of the original award and the order of the commission denying Leo's petition for a rehearing, the matter had become res adjudicata for which reason the commission was without jurisdiction to make the order amending the original findings and award granting the medical expenses and compensation indemnity above referred to. The question here presented is disposed of by the recent decision of Bartlett Hayward Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com. (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 195, where it is held that the Legislature, by the enactment of section 20 (d) of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 850), enlarged the continuing jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission beyond that theretofore existing so as to embrace the power of the commission to rescind, alter, or amend its orders, decisions, and awards within the period of 245 weeks upon good cause appearing, without the necessity of any showing that the applicant's disability had recurred, increased, diminished, or terminated.

Upon the authority of that decision, the award is affirmed.

ALEXANDER v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5976.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 25, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 21, 1928.

1. Attachment ⚷133—Plaintiff cannot be own surety; hence undertaking signed only by plaintiffs held insufficient (Code Civ. Proc. § 539; Civ. Code, § 2831).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 539, relative to written undertaking on part of plaintiff in attachment, an undertaking signed only by plaintiffs in action was insufficient as adding nothing to security of defendant against an improper attachment; Civ. Code, § 2831, establishing fact that plaintiffs could not act as own sureties.

2. Attachment ⚷136—New undertaking by way of amendment cannot be filed, where original undertaking was void because signed only by plaintiffs (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 539, 558).

Where undertaking in attachment was invalid under Code Civ. Proc. § 539, because signed only by plaintiffs, new undertaking could not be filed by way of amendment under section 558, since undertaking was not only irregular in form, but absolutely void.

3. Mandamus ⚷3(2)—Mandamus will not issue in case there is speedy and adequate remedy at law.

Writ of mandate will not issue in case there is a speedy and adequate remedy at law, though, if remedy is not both speedy and adequate, remedy by mandamus will not be denied.

4. Mandamus ⚷4(3)—Mandamus lies to require discharge of void attachment of special equipment used in manufacturing typewriters resulting in paralyzing business; remedy by appeal being inadequate (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 554, 555).

Where property attached consisted of special tools and equipment used in manufacture of typewriters, and would have required at least a year to be replaced, so that business was paralyzed by attachment, defendant was entitled to writ of mandate to secure discharge of attachment because of invalidity of undertaking, in that remedy by appeal would not be adequate, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 554, 555, providing for filing undertaking for release of attachment, presuppose existence of valid writ, and do not provide remedy against a void writ of attachment.

Original application for a writ of mandate by Jesse Alexander, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and L. B. Lampton, County Clerk of Los Angeles County and ex officio Clerk of said Court. Writ granted.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: RICHARDS and PRESTON, JJ., dissenting.

Faucett & Ring, of Los Angeles (William C. Ring, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioner.

John J. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, J. There is pending in respondent court an action wherein Max B. Jamison, Lloyd J. Killian, and others are plaintiffs and Jesse Alexander and others are defendants. The plaintiffs therein, desiring to procure the issuance of a writ of attachment, made application to respondent clerk therefor, and among other things, submitted to him a so-called undertaking on attachment, but signed only by Jamison and Killian. The body of this paper, after stating the conditions of the obligation it was intended to evidence, concludes, "In testimony whereof, the said sureties, and each of them," have affixed their hands and seals on a given date. This statement is followed by the signatures of the two plaintiffs mentioned above. The so-called undertaking was accepted as such by the clerk, and he issued a writ of attachment on December 5, 1927. On December 7 the defendant Jesse Alexander (the petitioner here) served and filed a notice of motion to dissolve and discharge the attachment on the ground, among others, that the writ was improperly and unlawfully issued because the purported undertaking was a nullity. At the time the motion was set for hearing, the plaintiffs filed an undertaking in a sufficient amount executed by the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland. The hearing of the motion was continued until December 20, 1927, at which time plaintiffs again filed an undertaking executed by the same company, and the court made its order denying the motion. A writ of mandate is sought directing the respondent court to enter an order discharging the attachment. We are presented with the questions whether the original purported undertaking was in fact an undertaking under section 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, if not, whether a new undertaking may be filed by way of amendment under section 558 of the same Code. If both of those questions are answered in the negative, it will be unnecessary for us to discuss the other procedural problems argued in the briefs of counsel other than to determine that the situation is one in which it is proper to make use of the writ of mandate.

[1] It cannot be successfully or earnestly urged that the so-called undertaking was sufficient. Section 539, Code of Civil Procedure, requires "a written undertaking on the part of the plaintiff * * * with sufficient sureties, * * *" before the writ may be issued, to the effect that plaintiff will pay all damages resulting from an improper levy. It is immediately obvious that the section requires, as a prerequisite to the issuance of the writ, that some company or persons other than the plaintiff shall become bound to the defendant to guarantee him against loss under the contingency mentioned. Section 2831 of the Civil Code at once eliminates the thought that the plaintiff by any strained process of reasoning might act as his own surety. It defines the term as "one who at the request of another, and for the purpose of securing to him a benefit, becomes responsible for the performance by the latter of some act in favor of a third person. * * *" It has been determined that the distinction between a bond and an undertaking is that the principal should sign the former and that he need not sign the latter. Russell v. Chicago, B. & O. R. Co., 37 Mont. 1, 94 P. 501. It would be sufficient to observe that the paper filed, signed by two of the plaintiffs, added nothing to the security of the defendant against an improper attachment.

[2] Could this purported undertaking be amended? It is difficult to conceive how something which does not and never did exist may be amended. The word "amended" presupposes the existence of something which has been inartificially or irregularly drawn or constructed. It may be corrected and righted, but nothing remains nothing when amended. Respondent argues that the statutes giving the right of attachment have been liberally construed since the amendment of 1909 to section 558, Code of Civil Procedure. It reads:

> "If upon such application" (a motion for discharge) "it satisfactorily appears that the writ of attachment was improperly or irregularly issued it must be discharged; provided that such attachment shall not be discharged if at or before the hearing of such application, the writ of attachment, or the affidavit, or undertaking upon which such attachment was based shall be amended and made to conform to the provisions of this chapter."

Subsequent to the amendment of this section, the case of Fairbanks, Morse & Co. v. Getchell, 13 Cal. App. 458, 110 P. 331, was decided, in which it was determined that an affidavit which was void might not be amended under its provisions. In that case the affidavit was void because the affiant endeavored to swear to the affidavit over the telephone; he being in Los Angeles county and the notary public being in and a notary of Kern county. The court, after quoting the language of section 558, Code of Civil Procedure, in calling attention to the fact that it had been amended in 1909, based its decision upon the ground as it stated, that "there could be no irregularity in that which had no existence." An effort was apparently made in that case to make an affidavit. In this case no effort was made to execute an undertaking with sureties. Had an undertaking irregular in form been filed, we would have been presented with an entirely different problem, and one which the amendment to section 558, Code of Civil Procedure, was intended to reach.

[3, 4] The only remaining question is whether the writ of mandate is a proper remedy. It must be apparent that the exercise of judicial discretion was not involved in the problem presented to the respondent court. It was its duty to discharge the attachment under the language we have quoted. In this particular the application is governed by such authorities as Pacific P. Assn. v. Huntington Beach, 196 Cal. 211–222, 237 P. 538, 40 A. L. R. 782, wherein it is declared that, where the discretion ceases and the duty becomes absolute, the writ will lie. However, petitioner did not have a remedy by an appeal from the order. If that remedy is speedy and adequate, we cannot make use of this high prerogative writ. On the other hand, if the remedy at law is not both speedy and adequate, the remedy by mandamus will not be denied. Dufton v. Daniels, 190 Cal. 577, 213 P. 949, and cases there cited. It is made to appear by the petition (and not denied by the return thereto) that the property under attachment consists of special dies, tools, equipment, and typewriter parts used in the manufacture of patented typewriters and of approximately 2,000 typewriters from 80 per cent. to 95 per cent. completed; that it would take at least a year to replace the dies, tools, and equipment necessary to carry on the business of manufacturing the typewriters; that the business is paralyzed by the attachment; and that its continuance will greatly and irreparably damage the business by making it impossible to meet the demand of customers and prospective customers. Under this admitted state of facts the remedy by appeal is obviously neither speedy nor adequate. We are of the opinion that in this regard we should adhere to the rule announced in Dufton v. Daniels, supra. Respondents assert that petitioner also has the remedy of filing an undertaking with sufficient sureties for the release of the attachment as provided for in sections 554 and 555, Code of Civil Procedure. Those sections presuppose the existence of a valid writ of attachment, and cannot be said to provide a remedy against a void writ of attachment.

In this proceeding one of the judges of the respondent court was erroneously named as a party respondent, and this has occurred so often in the past that we deem it proper to make mention of the fact in the hope that it will not be repeated in the future. We have accordingly omitted his name from the title in this opinion.

The peremptory writ will issue.

Ex parte WALKER. (Cr. 1470.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 25, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑1211—Order of prison directors for confinement two years for false pretenses and five years for prior conviction held void as to prisoner seeking habeas corpus (Pen. Code, §§ 484, 487, 489, 552, 667, 1168).

In prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, order of board of prison directors for confinement for two years for false pretenses and for five years on count charging prior conviction held ineffective as to any rights of prisoner seeking habeas corpus, since, under Pen. Code, §§ 484, 487, 489, 552, and 667, only possible term was maximum term of ten years, and case did not come within provisions of indeterminate sentence statute (Pen. Code, § 1168).

2. Criminal law 🔑1211—Sentence under repeater statute for false pretenses imposed ten year penalty unimpaired by subsequent order of prison directors (Pen. Code, §§ 484, 487, 489, 552, 667, 1168).

Sentence imposed by court on conviction under criminal repeater statute for obtaining money under false pretenses was maximum term of ten years, under Pen. Code, §§ 484, 487, 489, 552, 667, and was not affected by subsequent order of prison directors under indeterminate sentence statute (Pen. Code, § 1168), attempting to impose a consecutive term of two and five years each, since order of prison directors was unauthorized.

Application by Vivian Walker for a writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Warden of San Quentin prison to secure petitioner's release from custody. Prisoner remanded, and writ discharged.

James P. Montgomery, of Oakland, and Edward J. Kelly, of San Diego, for petitioner.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. From the petition it appears that the petitioner was found guilty of obtaining money under false pretenses. The information in the ordinary form pleaded that offense, and in the ordinary form pleaded a prior conviction. The latter fact was not put in issue but was admitted by the petitioner, and she went to trial on the offense charged in the information. The jury returned a verdict of guilty as charged. Thereafter she was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. She was received at the prison on January 21, 1926. On the 21st day of January, 1927, the board of prison directors proceeded to determine the length of time the petitioner should be confined in the prison. In doing so it made an order as alleged in the petition that the petitioner be confined "* * * two years on the first count of said information and five years on the second count of said information running consecutively." The petitioner asserts that the meaning of the order is that she be confined two years from January 21, 1926, on the charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, and that she be confined five years from January 21, 1928, as and for the prior conviction. Thereupon she argues that she served her time as and for the prior conviction, and that the order as made by the board of prison directors is in effect putting her twice in jeopardy for that offense. The petitioner further argues that she has served two years as and for the term of imprisonment for obtaining money under false pretenses, and that she is therefore entitled to be discharged.

[1] We think the foregoing arguments are based on a misconception of the law. One must read together the provisions of sections 484, 487, 489, 552, and 667 of the Penal Code to ascertain what under the facts was the term prescribed by law. Doing so, it appears at once that the only possible term was a maximum term of ten years, and that the statute does not prescribe any minimum term. That being the provision of the statute, the petitioner's case does not come within the provisions of the indeterminate sentence statute (Pen. Code, § 1168), and therefore no power existed which authorized the board of prison directors to make any order under the last-mentioned statute on January 21, 1927. It follows that the purported order made by the board on that date was nugatory as to any rights of the petitioner.

[2] When the petitioner was sentenced by the trial court, the legal effect of that sentence was to impose the maximum term prescribed by law—ten years from the date she was received at the prison. In re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 P. 958. That term has not expired. She is not entitled at this time to be discharged.

The prisoner is remanded, and the writ is discharged.

WEIR et al. v. NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO. (Civ. 5973.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 24, 1928.

Rehearing Denied May 24, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 21, 1928.

1. Insurance ⟹665(3)—Finding that insurer relied on false representations in application, as to applicant's habits respecting liquor, health, and previous medical treatment held against weight of evidence.

In action on life insurance policy, finding that company relied on false representations in application as to applicant's habits in reference to using intoxicating liquor and false statements in answering questions respecting his physical condition, health, and previous medical treatment, held against weight of evidence.

2. Evidence ⟹591—Plaintiffs, introducing in evidence depositions taken by defendant, held not bound thereby (Code Civ. Proc. § 2055).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, plaintiffs suing on life insurance policy, who introduced in evidence depositions of five officers of defendant insurance company's officers taken by defendant before trial, together with accompanying exhibits, held not bound thereby on theory that they produced witnesses whose depositions were taken and put them on stand as their witnesses, though they did not, in advance or during proceeding, announce reliance on such statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by William B. Weir and others, as trustees of the trust created by the will and under the decree of distribution in the matter of the estate of W. Frank Whittier, deceased, against the New York Life Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove and John M. Clayton, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles (Timon E. Owens, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

KING, Presiding Justice pro tem. Action for recovery on a life insurance policy. Judgment was given for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

William R. Whittier applied October 1, 1920, for a policy of life insurance in the sum of $25,000. The application was accompanied by a document in two parts, the first consisting of questions asked by the local examining physician and answers by the applicant, signed by both, and the second a "medical examiner's report," signed by the physician alone.

They were received by the company November 11, 1920, and by the company's medical examiner November 12, 1920. Because the applicant stated that he had applied to "Travelers 1917 and 1920" for other insurance which had been declined, and because of his answers to questions regarding his use of intoxicants that he uses wine moderately, had used it moderately in the past, and had not used intoxicants to excess within the past five years, this medical examiner sent a communication November 12, 1920, "to the examining physician with regard to the applicant's habits and calling for an investigation of the applicant as an insurance risk and calling for an insurance report."

He received a report from one H. C. Wilson, living at Hemet, Cal., near the applicant, who had known the applicant eight or ten years, and who reported that the applicant uses intoxicating drinks, becomes intoxicated, "generally lasts a number of days," and, in response to a question as to when this last occurred, answered, "As far as I can learn it has been some time ago," and under the head of "Remarks" adds:

> "Think he is healthy enough but likes liquor too well; but still he puts in quite a large amount of his time at the ranch here, which keeps him in good condition."

On the examiner's recommendation, a policy was written for $5,000 only with a premium rating increased to 190 because of increased risk, as compared with a standard rating of 100, which policy was forwarded to the San Francisco office dated November 18, 1920.

On November 20th the company received a second report from one O. L. Comings of San Francisco, "some information" from the Travelers' Insurance Company with respect to Whittier's application to that company, and a reply from the doctor who had examined the applicant. These were examined by the company's medical examiner November 26th and a new policy written and delivered for $10,000 with a rating of 140; the $5,000 policy being withdrawn. This new policy, dated December 3, 1920, is the basis of the suit.

The inspection report of O. L. Comings stated that he had known applicant 20 years; that he uses intoxicating drinks moderately; that he became intoxicated "in the nature of a few hours' hilarity," which occurred not since 1906; that he had never taken a cure for the liquor habit; and under the head of "Remarks," stated: "He followed in the line of rich men's sons."

The reply from the doctor who examined the applicant was to the effect that he had seen Whittier under the influence of liquor eight years ago; has heard of his being under the influence of liquor "several years ago"; does not know how frequently he has been under its influence; answers "not to my knowledge" in response to a question as to applicant's ever taking a cure; and that there is no present indication of the use of alcohol. He adds:

> "Some years ago I understood Mr. Whittier drank considerable, but of late years he seems to attend to business promptly, and I have no knowledge of him taking liquor excessively."

A report was also received by the company from one M. S. Scott, who reports that applicant does not use intoxicating drinks to excess, if at all; that he cannot learn of his ever becoming intoxicated; has not taken a cure for the liquor habit.

The medical examiner and the company also received information from the Travelers' Insurance Company that Whittier had applied to that company twice, in 1917 and 1920; that, when examined, he admitted having used alcoholic stimulants to excess in 1890, and having taken the liquor cure in 1890, and in the later application admitted that he used alcoholic beverages to excess up to about 1916.

Whittier died at Hemet, Cal., March 1, 1921. Proofs of death were filed with the company, and on May 16, 1921, the company rejected the claim, and tendered to appellants a check for $658.20, the amount of the one premium paid, with interest. Respondent (defendant) took depositions of five officers of defendant —and at the beginning of the trial appellants read these into the record.

Upon a controversy regarding this matter, the court held that appellants were not entitled to the benefit of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, so far as the depositions then in evidence were concerned, and that appellants were bound by the testimony contained in the depositions upon the theory that appellants had produced the witnesses and had put them upon the stand as appellants' witnesses without having distinctly announced their reliance on section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure.

Appellants contend this was error, and the refusal of the court to allow contradiction of these witnesses warrants a new trial.

Attached to these depositions were the following exhibits, each of which was introduced by plaintiffs:

Ballard's Exhibit A, the application for insurance, answers made to examining physician.

Ballard's Exhibit B, the proof of death.

Harrison's Exhibit A, inspection report by H. C. Wilson, above mentioned.

Harrison's Exhibit B, inspection report by O. L. Comings, before mentioned.

Harrison's Exhibit C, inspection report by examining physician, above mentioned.

Harrison's Exhibit D, inspection report by M. S. Scott, before referred to.

Ballard's Exhibits:

C—Letter by one of the plaintiffs accompanying the proofs of death.

D—Letter from the company rejecting claim.

E—Check for $658.20—above referred to.

F—Letters returning check to company.

G—Letters from counsel for company denying liability.

The only other documentary evidence was: Plaintiffs' No. 3, the policy; Plaintiffs' No. 4, the assignment of policy to plaintiffs: Plaintiffs' No. 5, a letter from the company; and plaintiffs' No. 6, a letter from a plaintiff to the company; Defendant's Exhibit A, the certificate of death, and Defendant's Exhibit B, a paper signed by Dr. H. O. Miller—who had signed the death certificate.

The findings by the trial court are full and voluminous, and many of them are attacked by appellants.

[1] Finding III is to the effect that the policy was issued by defendant "relying on the representations and statements so made (that is in the application and the medical application accompanying it), and each and every of them, and said defendant corporation would not have executed or delivered said policy of life insurance but for said representations and statements, and its reliance thereon, and, had it known that any of said representations were not true, but were false and untrue, defendant corporation would not have executed nor would it have delivered said policy."

However, it appears from the testimony of the company defendant's medical examiner, Dr. Harrison, of W. F. Rohlffs, its assistant secretary, and of T. A. Buckner, a member of its classification committee, the three officials before whom the application for the policy came, and on whose approval it was issued, that before the policy was issued they had before them the report of H. C. Wilson, of O. L. Comings, from M. S. Scott, the further report from the examining physician, and the information given them by the Travelers' Insurance Company.

This evidence is uncontradicted, and from it the conclusion is irresistible that the company did know that some of the applicant's representations were untrue, and that it issued the policy for a reduced amount in spite of that fact.

In finding VI it is found that each and every of the questions and the answers thereto in the application and in the medical examination "was and were and each is material to the risk, and" that upon said answers "defendant, believing the same to be true, executed" the policy. Also that "defendant would not have executed, signed, or delivered said policy, * * * but for said statements and representations so made, and because of the same being material, and because of its reliance thereon and its belief in the truth of the same."

It is also found in paragraph VI of the findings that in the medical examination are the following questions and answers:

> 8. Have you ever suffered from any ailment or disease of > (a) The brain or nervous system? A. No.
> (b) The heart or lungs? A. No.
> (c) The stomach or intestines, liver, kidneys or bladder? A. No.
> 9. (e) What physician or physicians, if any, not named above, have you consulted or been treated by, within the last five years, and for what illness or ailment? A. Dr. Garnard Grant; three months ago; cold; complete recovery.

And it is found that "the answers in this finding above set forth, to each and every of the questions above set forth, were, and each of said answers was, false and untrue," and, at the time the "same were made, * * * were known by him to be false and untrue, and were made by him for the purpose of deceiving defendant and causing it to issue the policy."

Yet, as before stated, it is in evidence that the officials of the respondent company did not "believe the same to be true"; and did not execute the policy "because of its reliance thereon"; and there is only the slightest, if any, evidence that any of the answers listed were not true.

It is further found in finding VI that decedent "had taken what is known as the Keely cure."

The sole reference to this subject in the evidence is to be found in the testimony of Harrison, the medical examiner of the company, who states that November 26, 1920, he had before him certain information from the Travelers' Insurance Company received by his company November 20th, showing that deceased had applied to that company and had admitted "having used alcoholic stimulants to excess in 1890, and having taken the liquor cure in 1890."

It will be noticed then (1) that this is not evidence that decedent took the cure; (2) that, if he did, it was 30 years before; and (3) that the medical examiner had the information before him when the policy was written, and the company did not issue the policy in reliance on the applicant's statement.

It is further found in finding VI "that decedent had suffered from an ailment of the heart, of the kidneys and of the bladder and of the nervous system. That in 1920 * * * he was attended by Dr. Miller * * * for nervousness, sleeplessness, pains in the heart and heart region, somnolence and urinary disorders of the kidneys and bladder."

The testimony of Dr. Miller shows that in July and August of 1920, the trouble for which he treated the deceased was drunkenness. He states that deceased mentioned "trouble with his bladder—frequency of urination," but explicitly states that no medicine was given for this; that the treatments were entirely for acute troubles, and not for chronic illness.

None of this forms a basis for the finding.

Later in this same paragraph is a finding again that Dr. Miller treated the decedent for "acute nervousness, chronic nephritis, pains in the heart, somnolence, and diseases of the kidneys and bladder and of the urinary tract." Yet the testimony of the several physicians examined distinctly shows the man never had chronic nephritis, and fails to show any treatment for this disorder.

Again in this paragraph are findings that one Dr. Grant had treated the deceased for at least two years for various and different ailments and illnesses other than a cold, and for an ailment that caused one of his arms to be partially useless, as well as for sleeplessness and nervousness.

The uncontradicted evidence of Dr. Grant, however, is to the effect that, while he examined Mr. Whittier many times over a period of two or three years, the only treatments he ever gave were for a bronchitis or cold at one time, and that he irrigated decedent's eye with a little borax solution for an eye ulcer.

It appeared from the evidence that in 1918 Whittier had a phagedenic ulcer of the cornea of the eye, which is described by the physician as "a slight abrasion of the skin and an infection of the superficial layers of the cornea." He recovered in a relatively short period of time, and the doctor states that it was a temporary ailment of rather a minor type. In the treatment Whittier's tonsils were removed as a possible source of infection, but it did not distinctly appear that they were infected or the removal necessary.

Based upon the above facts, findings are made that the cause of the ulcer of the cornea of the eye was some disease of the blood; and that deceased had some disease of the blood, the cause of which none of said physicians could give. This finding is made in the face of evidence of Dr. Grant and Dr. Stoner, who repeatedly and frequently made examinations of Whittier—Grant a dozen times in a period of two or three years—always doing a urinalysis and taking a blood pressure; ran a blood chemistry determination, did a blood count, and ran a Wassermann test. They reported everything normal and the Wassermann negative.

The finding also is not supported by evidence.

The certificate of death gives the cause of death as uræmic poisoning, and the contributing cause as chronic interstitial nephritis, and certifies the disease was incurred "during past several years." Dr. H. O. Miller, who issued the death certificate, also made an affidavit in which he recites that he treated decedent for "various complaints. Nephritis was a gradual development becoming acute six months ago"; that he treated Whittier for "nephritis and other complaints" in July and August, 1920; that he treated him prior to last sickness for "such symptoms as nervousness, sleeplessness, pains in heart region, somnolence, and urinary disorders"—gives "uræmic poisoning due to chronic nephritis" as the immediate cause of death, and states his opinion that deceased suffered from the disease several years. Based upon these two documents, the court finds that the immediate cause of death was uræmic poisoning due to chronic nephritis.

However, this statement was practically repudiated by Dr. Miller when called as a witness. He substantially testified that Whittier died of alcoholism, although admitting the possibility of death occurring from a hypodermic administered by himself, and states that he gave the certificate of death from uræmic poisoning to avoid certifying to alcoholism as the cause of death.

Dr. Grant and Dr. Stoner testify that it was impossible that nephritis could have been the cause of death. Dr. Grant states he examined Whittier in 1918, when he "had no symptom of either uræmic poisoning or nephritis, either acute or chronic"; that in November, 1920, he examined Whittier, and took his blood pressure in December close to the holidays (ten weeks before death), and that neither chronic uræmic poisoning nor chronic nephritis could have been the cause of death. Dr. Stoner "don't see how it was possible" for either disease to have caused death. Dr. Strasser, who as representative of the respondent examined Whittier for the insurance, states that he "was not at the time suffering" from either. And, finally, the officials of the company who testified stated that they did not consider deceased died of these diseases.

Dr. Miller, who gave the medical certificate of death, and who was the only person even suggesting uræmic poisoning or nephritis (Bright's disease) as the cause of death, so thoroughly repudiates his statement that we feel justified in holding that this finding of the cause of death as chronic nephritis is not sustained by the evidence.

The trial court in its finding numbered VIII declares that the company did not find out that Whittier's answers to questions hereinbefore quoted were untrue until after the death of Whittier; and that, upon being advised of said false and fraudulent misrepresentations (after the death of the insured), it repudiated and canceled the policy.

The fact is, however, that the company knew of the dissipated habits of deceased before issuing the policy, and issued it in a reduced amount and at an increased premium rate because of its knowledge.

Feeling that there is in some instances a total want of evidence, and in others no substantial evidence to support the findings, it is the duty of the court to set aside the findings above noted and other parts of the findings to the same effect.

While we have disagreed with the trial judge on many of the findings made, we are not disposed to criticize his action in any particular for signing the findings as presented. It has required long and careful search and scanning of the record to find the evidence bearing upon them respectively, an effort which a busy trial judge should not be required to make. Counsel are prone in many cases, after a favorable decision is announced, to draft and present for signature by the judge a mass of findings favorable to their contentions without a proper scrutiny of the record to see if they are well founded. Thus we find in the instant case an answer covering eighteen pages of the transcript, and findings even longer.

[2] The question as to plaintiffs being bound by the introduction into evidence by them of the depositions of the officers of defendant corporation with the accompanying exhibits is novel and interesting. It will be noted that the depositions were taken on defendant's motion.

The trial judge, in ruling upon the question said:

> "Unless he states in advance or during some part of his examination, that he is acting under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, it would seem to me he ought to be bound upon the theory that he has produced that witness and has put him upon the stand as his witness."

Many lawyers and judges will agree with this theory.

However, we find the case of Grantham v. Ordway, 40 Cal. App. 758, 764, 182 P. 73, 76, an action for damages against a corporation and Ordway, one of its employees. In anticipation of the trial the defendant took the deposition of Ordway, a defendant and its employee, and plaintiff as a part of his case read this deposition to the jury. Mr. Presiding Justice Waste in the decision says: "Furthermore, plaintiff is not bound by Ordway's testimony," and quotes the provisions of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure. This seems squarely in point. See, also, Figari v. Olcese, 184 Cal. 775, at page 782, 195 P. 425, 15 A. L. R. 192.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment should be reversed.

PEOPLE v. KINKICHI WATANEBE.
(Cr. 1459.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 25, 1928.

1. Witnesses ⟹277(2)—Cross-examination of defendant, accused of performing illegal operation, as to conversation with proprietress of beauty shop, held not improper, in view of other testimony concerning transactions there.

In prosecution for second degree murder on account of defendant's alleged commission of illegal operation, cross-examination of defendant as to conversations had with proprietress of beauty shop held not improper, where mother of deceased testified that she and her daughter went to the shop on the day before daughter's illness, and that daughter left shop with piece of paper given her by the proprietress.

2. Witnesses ⟹406—Admission in rebuttal of testimony that witness sent deceased girl to defendant's store held not error as improper impeachment of defendant, in prosecution for murder by performance of illegal operation (Code Civ. Proc. § 2051).

In prosecution for second degree murder for alleged commission of illegal operation, admission in rebuttal of testimony of proprietress of beauty shop as to having sent deceased girl to defendant's store held not error as improper impeachment of defendant who testified in his own behalf, since witness may be impeached by calling other contradicting witnesses under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051.

3. Criminal law ⟹404(3)—Cervix dilator found in possession of another Japanese nearby held admissible in prosecution of Japanese for murder on account of illegal operation.

In prosecution of Japanese for second degree murder for alleged performance of illegal operation, admission of evidence of "cervix dilator" taken from possession of another Japanese, one-half block away, held not error, where admitted for purpose of showing that defendant had access to instruments and apparatus with which he could perform the operation, and where there was considerable evidence that defendant had purchased a similar article of a similar manufacture; weight of evidence being question for the jury.

4. Criminal law ⟹1159(1)—Findings and jury's verdict are controlling on appeal.

Findings of the trial court or jury are controlling on appeal.

5. Homicide ⟹254—Conviction for second degree murder by performance of illegal operation, resulting in death, held sustained by evidence.

In prosecution of druggist for commission of alleged illegal operation resulting in death, evidence which showed defendant was equipped with requisite surgical apparatus held sufficient to sustain conviction for second degree murder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

Kinkichi Watanebe was convicted of second degree murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Morgan A. Sanborn and Harry A. Encell, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The district attorney filed an information against the defendant charging him with the crime of murder. The defendant pleaded not guilty. A trial was had before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree. The defendant made a motion for a new trial. The motion was denied, and the defendant appealed from the judgment and the order denying his motion. He has brought up a typewritten record of all the proceedings.

The record discloses that the above-mentioned trial was the second trial of the defendant for the alleged offense.

It was the theory of the prosecution that the defendant performed an illegal operation on the body of Beatrice Newland, and as a result of that operation she died. The defendant was at the time of the alleged offense a licensed druggist conducting a drug store near the corner of Eighth and Franklin streets in the city of Oakland. The decedent resided in the same city.

On the trial, the prosecution called a large number of witnesses, and each one was examined and cross-examined. It introduced a large number of exhibits. Among others, it introduced a number of pieces of surgical apparatus which the prosecution had obtained from one of the rooms in the flat of the defendant, upstairs over his drug store. It also introduced in evidence some surgical apparatus which it located in a bundle in the possession of C. Kowana, another Japanese, who conducted a candy store around the corner.

[1] Immediately after the prosecution closed its case, the defendant took the stand in his own behalf. He testified to many facts, among others that he did not perform the operation. He did not testify regarding any conversations with Madam Mays, the proprietress of a beauty shop in Oakland. On cross-examination, the district attorney propounded many questions to the defendant regarding his conversations with Madam Mays. The defendant quotes the record, and claims that numerous errors were committed by the trial court in overruling his objections, based on the ground that the subject-matter was not within proper bounds of cross-examination. The subjects objected to were within the bounds of proper cross-examination of a defendant. People v. Rozelle, 78 Cal. 84, 92–93, 20 P. 36. The decedent's mother testified that the day before her daughter took to her bed she and her daughter went to Madam Mays' shop. After they arrived there, the decedent spoke to Madam Mays, and the latter gave decedent a paper, and decedent then directed her mother to wait, and went out. Later a telephone call was received. Madam Mays answered the call, and then turned to the mother, and told her that the decedent was going to the Southern Pacific Station at Seventh and Broadway, and wanted her mother to meet her there. Among the answers which the defendant claims were not proper cross-examination, the following were included:

> "Madam Mays never said anything to me about a girl that was pregnant. I never gave Madam Mays a slip of paper with 'Kay' written on it. I never told Madam Mays to have the girl that was pregnant come to my store July 12 (the date of the alleged operation)."

[2] After the defense had rested its case, the prosecution called Madam Mays in rebuttal. The defendant objected to all of the evidence given by the witness, contending that the subject-matter was a part of the case in chief of the prosecution and not rebuttal. At this time the defendant concedes that it is not necessarily prejudicial error to allow a party, in a criminal case, to introduce proof out of order. However, the defendant asserts that under the peculiar facts of this case the reception of the evidence of Madam Mays was tantamount to an impeachment of the defendant. But, if that be so, it is not necessarily error. One proper method of impeachment of any witness is to call other witnesses who contradict him. Code Civ. Proc. § 2051. She testified that on Monday (July 11, 1927) the defendant told her to send the decedent to his store at 1 o'clock Tuesday, and that he wrote on a piece of paper "Kay," and handed the paper to her. There is evidence in the record that the decedent was operated on by the defendant in a room upstairs over his drug store. There is evidence that Madam Mays sent her there. There is some evidence that the telephone call, above mentioned, was put in by the defendant.

[3] The defendant claims the trial court erred in receiving in evidence the "cervix dilator." As stated above, a bundle was taken from the possession of C. Kowana, another Japanese, one-block away. The dilator was in that bundle. The evidence introduced included such facts from which the jury might form the inference that the defendant either took or sent the bundle to Kowana's store. There was considerable evidence to the effect that the defendant had purchased a similar article of a similar manufacture. The purpose for which it was introduced was not to show that it was the particular instrument with which the operation was performed, but for the purpose of showing that the defendant had access to instruments and apparatus with which he could have performed the operation. The evidence connecting defendant's possession with the dilator was not insufficient. The real basis of the defendant's objection is a claim that the evidence of possession by the defendant was not strong. That, however, was a question for the jury.

[4, 5] Finally, it is claimed the evidence is insufficient. The defendant does not contend that the evidence fails to show the performance of an illegal operation. But the defendant claims the evidence is insufficient to show that he performed it. There is an abundance of evidence that the defendant was in a position, and was equipped with instruments and apparatus, enabling him to perform the operation. He concedes there are admissions by him that he performed the operation. But he argues that those admissions are of little weight. Conceding such to be true, the argument is not one on which an appellate court can act. The findings of the trial court or jury are controlling in this court. Moreover, on her dying bed, in the presence of the defendant, the decedent accused him of having performed the operation, and the defendant made no denial or other reply to the accusation.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HOGAN et al. v. HORSFALL et al.
(Civ. 6237.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 13, 1928.

1. Pleading 🔑416—Plaintiffs waived failure to grant leave to amend in sustaining demurrer, where they failed to ask such relief.

Where demurrer to complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and no application was made by plaintiffs to amend, held that, by failing to ask leave to amend, plaintiffs waived any abuse of discretion on part of court in denying such leave.

2. Judgment 🔑447(1)—Equity would not set aside deficiency judgment, where there was no showing that, in event decree was set aside, different result would ensue.

In suit to set aside deficiency, judgment obtained in foreclosure of mortgage, where there was no allegation in complaint as to value of mortgaged premises over and above senior mortgage, nor anything to show that, in event of decree's being set aside, any different result would ensue, held that decree would not be set aside, since equity will not do vain thing of setting aside judgment when no different result would ensue.

3. Equity 🔑15—Equity as such has no supervisory jurisdiction over other tribunals.

Court of equity as such has no supervisory jurisdiction over other tribunals.

4. Equity 🔑15—Equity has no power to sit in judgment on other tribunals to determine whether they have committed error while exercising their authority.

Court of equity as such does not possess power to sit in judgment on acts of other tribunals to determine whether they have committed error either in law or fact while exercising their authority.

5. Judgment 🔑501—Judgment rendered by court having jurisdiction of subject-matter and person, even though it contained error in exercise of jurisdiction, is not void but erroneous.

Judgment rendered by court in cause in which it has jurisdiction of subject-matter and of person, even though it contained error committed in exercise of jurisdiction, is not void, but merely erroneous.

6. Courts 🔑1—Court's jurisdiction is made up from authority to decide question rather than particular decision.

It is not particular decision that makes up court's jurisdiction, but rather authority to decide question at all.

7. Judgment 🔑407(1)—In suit to set aside deficiency judgment, conceding it was erroneous, equity would not take jurisdiction where there was failure to take advantage of adequate remedy for its correction.

In suit to set aside deficiency judgment rendered in action for foreclosure of mortgage, conceding that court committed error in rendering judgment by reason of insufficient description in decree, which would justify it in being set aside under appropriate proceedings, held that, since such decree was not void but voidable, and law provided remedy for its correction, equity would not take jurisdiction because of loss of such remedy through failure to take advantage of it when available.

8. Equity 🔑43—Adequate legal remedy defeats resort to equity.

Existence of adequate legal remedy defeats resort to equity.

9. Equity 🔑43—Rule that failure to exercise legal remedy will bar resort to equity applies to all sorts of remedies, whether by motion, appeal, or otherwise.

Rule that loss of adequate legal remedy through failure to take advantage of it when available bars resort to equity is applicable to all sorts of remedies whether by motion, appeal, or otherwise, and is in harmony with general principal which denies relief to any one who has been negligent.

10. Equity 🔑6—Intrinsic mistake is not ground for equitable relief.

Intrinsic mistake, like intrinsic fraud, is not ground for equitable relief.

11. Judgment 🔑316—Clerical misprisions in decree as to property's description may be corrected by court on own motion, in actions to foreclose.

In actions to foreclose, clerical misprisions in decree as to description of property may be corrected by court on its own motion, with or without notice.

12. Equity 🔑54—That which may be amended is not void.

That which may be amended is not void.

13. Judgment 🔑460(3)—Demurrer held properly sustained in suit to set aside deficiency judgment taken on foreclosure of mortgage, where there was entire absence of allegation of any attempt by plaintiffs to obtain relief.

In suit to set aside deficiency judgment taken on foreclosure of mortgage, where there was entire absence of allegation of any attempt by plaintiffs to obtain relief and of any showing by proper recitals that they could not have obtained relief in action for clerical misprision, held that demurrer to complaint was properly sustained.

14. Judgment 🔑445—Decree of foreclosure held res judicata in suit to set aside deficiency judgment taken in foreclosure suit.

In suit to set aside deficiency judgment taken on foreclosure of mortgage, where objection was not made to deficiency judgment in foreclosure suit, held that it was necessarily adjudicated by decree of foreclosure, and that decree becoming final was res judicata conclusively binding plaintiffs.

15. Mortgages 🔑559(10)—In suit to set aside deficiency judgment on ground of agreement not to take such judgment, complaint held insufficient as not showing consideration for such promise.

In suit to set aside deficiency judgment, where ground alleged was that agreement had been made not to take such judgment, but complaint contained no allegation as to when promise was made nor that there was consideration, held that deficiency judgment was proper, since for all that appears agreement was mere nudum pactum.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by Walter L. Hogan and another against William A. Horsfall and others to set aside a deficiency judgment obtained in an action to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 266 P. 1005.

J. L. Smith, of San Francisco, and Herbert V. Keeling, of Lakeport, for appellants.

Alan H. Critcher, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Suit in equity to set aside a deficiency judgment obtained in an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage. The bill contains three counts: Under the first it is alleged, in substance, that the property sold by the commissioner was, by reason of an error in the description, not the property he was authorized to sell under the foreclosure decree, hence there could be no valid deficiency judgment. The second is the same as the first, with the exception of the statement that the error in the description was intentional, and was therefore a fraud. In the third it was alleged that there was an agreement between the parties not to take a deficiency judgment, and the taking of the same was therefore likewise a fraud on the plaintiffs. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment was entered thereon, from which judgment this appeal is taken. No application was made by plaintiffs to amend, and the questions involved in the appeal are whether or not the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint and to each cause of action thereof, with or without leave to amend. In reciting the facts of their cause of action, plaintiffs have set forth that defendant Horsfall was the plaintiff in another certain action in the superior court for the county of Lake, wherein plaintiffs were defendants, which was an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon a certain piece of real property given to secure the payment of a promissory note for the sum of $2,000, signed by the plaintiffs herein. The mortgage given contained a recital that it was subject to a first incumbrance of $3,700, payable to one Frederica Meyerstein, which made the mortgage in question a second lien. On the 5th day of November, 1924, the court made a decree of foreclosure in the mortgage foreclosure action, and defendant Crawford was appointed as commissioner to sell the real property described in the decree. Thereafter Crawford, as such commissioner, published a notice of sale and sold said real property to defendant Horsfall for the sum of $10, and thereupon issued a certificate of sale conveying the property to him. On the 8th day of January, 1925, there was entered in said action a deficiency judgment against plaintiffs herein for the sum of $3,287.16. It is then recited that the property sold was not the property Crawford was authorized to sell under the decree of foreclosure, and hence no valid deficiency judgment could have been entered against the plaintiffs in that action. The correct description of the property involved is the southwest quarter and the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 33 in township 12 north, range 6 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian, and lot No. 3, the east half of the southwest quarter and the west half of the southeast quarter of section 4 in township 11 north, range 6 west, Mount Diablo base and meridian, containing in all 393 acres of land, more or less. The complaint shows that the property was correctly described in the mortgage, complaint, lis pendens, order of sale, notice, and return of sale, but was incorrectly described in the decree, in this, that the word "southwest" was substituted for the word "southeast" in the first line of the description. The decree also directed that the mortgaged premises as described in the complaint should be sold, following which is the specific description containing the typographical error complained of. It is appellants' main contention that, by reason of the error contained in the decree with reference to the description of the property, the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 33, township 12, was never sold, for which reason the deficiency judgment entered after the sale was void, for without a sale of the entire property there could be no deficiency judgment. There is no question that all of the property was sold by the commissioner, for the correct description of the property is contained in his notice of sale and also in his certificate as appears from the complaint herein. The question then really is not what he sold, but what he had the authority to sell under the decree. We are of the opinion that the demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained.

[1-6] At the outset it may be stated that appellants, by failing to ask leave to amend, waived any abuse of discretion on the part of the court in denying such leave. Buckley v. Howe, 86 Cal. 596, 25 P. 132; Durrell v. Dooner, 119 Cal. 411, 51 P. 628; Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 120, 60 P. 689; Williamson v. Joyce, 140 Cal. 669, 74 P. 290. We will therefore discuss the complaint as though it contained all matters which possibly could have been alleged by appellant. There is no allegation in the complaint as to the value of the mortgaged premises over and above the senior mortgage; the allegation being merely that the property was of sufficient value to have brought the amount of said mortgage, interest, and costs thereon, upon foreclosure which is an allegation that the property was worth $3,297.16, the amount of the judgment, which is less than the Meyerstein incumbrance; nor is there any allegation of what became of such senior incumbrance, whether it was paid, foreclosed, or is still subsisting, no reference whatsoever being made thereto. Then, again, there is nothing to show that, in the event of the decree being set aside, any different result would ensue. Equity will not do the vain thing of setting aside a judgment when the result would be the same. Painter v. Painter, 133 Cal. 129, 65 P. 311; Hite v. Mercantile Trust Co., 156 Cal. 765, 106 P. 102. Nor has a court of equity, as such, any supervisory jurisdiction over other tribunals; neither does it possess power to sit in judgment on their acts to determine whether they have committed error either in law or fact, while exercising their authority. A judgment rendered by a court in a cause in which it has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, even though it contain error committed in the exercise of jurisdiction, is not void, but erroneous merely. It is not the particular decision that makes up jurisdiction, but rather the authority to decide the question at all. Chase v. Christianson, 41 Cal. 253; Gray v. Hall (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 246. The rule is fundamental everywhere prevailing that, where a court has jurisdiction of the res and the parties, error committed in the exercise of jurisdiction renders the judgment erroneous merely and not void.

[7-15] Conceding, therefore, that the court committed error in rendering the deficiency judgment by reason of the insufficient description in the decree, which would justify it being set aside under appropriate proceedings, such decree was not void, but voidable merely, and the law provided a speedy and adequate remedy for its correction. Not only will the existence of an adequate legal remedy defeat a resort to equity, but so, also, will the loss of such a remedy through failure to take advantage of it when available. This rule applies to all sorts of remedies, whether by motion, appeal, or otherwise, and is in harmony with the general principle which denies relief to one who has been negligent. If this were not true, there would be no end to litigation. Intrinsic mistake, like intrinsic fraud, is not ground for equitable relief. Public policy and the interests of litigants alike require that there be an end to litigation, and the peace and order of society demand that litigants and busy courts be relieved from successive suits involving the same matter. It is the only manner in which certainty may be secured to individual rights and dignity and respect to judicial proceedings. In actions to foreclose, clerical misprisions in the decree as to the description of the property may be corrected by the court on its own motion, with or without notice. Dickey v. Gibson, 113 Cal. 26, 45 P. 15, 54 Am. St. Rep. 321; McKeever v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 259 P. 373. That which may be amended is not void. Newmark v. Chapman, 53 Cal. 557. Here there is an entire absence of allegation of any attempt whatsoever by appellants to obtain the relief they here seek, and likewise of any showing by proper recital that they could not have obtained relief in the action from the clerical misprision. Moreover, as above mentioned, the complaint shows that all of the property was sold as indicated by the notice of sale and the certificate of the commissioner. Under all these circumstances, we are of the opinion that the learned trial court properly sustained the demurrer to the complaint. What we have said applies with equal force to the third cause of action. The decree is made a part of the complaint, and it is there recited that the case came on for trial upon the complaint and answer. Objection could have been made, if warranted, to the entry of the deficiency judgment as it was a matter involved in the foreclosure suit, and, none having been made, it was a question necessarily adjudicated by the decree of foreclosure, and the decree having become final it is res adjudicata, and appellants herein are conclusively bound by it. Hager v. Astorg, 145 Cal. 548, 79 P. 68, 104 Am. St. Rep. 68. Moreover, defendants were entitled to a deficiency judgment in the absence of some showing to the contrary. The complaint contains no allegation when the promise not to take a deficiency judgment was made, nor does it contain any allegation that there was a consideration for such promise. For all that appears, the alleged agreement was a mere nudum pactum. Heim v. Butin, 109 Cal. 500, 42 P. 138, 50 Am. St. Rep. 54.

Respondents urge the additional argument in support of the judgment that the erroneous description contained in the decree may properly be disregarded as surplusage, as reference is made therein to the proper description as recited in the complaint. We are cited to the case of McNair v. Johnson, 95 S. C. 176, 78 S. E. 892, as declaring this rule. The case supports respondents' contention, and is on all fours with the instant one. A discussion of this question, however, is unnecessary, considering the conclusion we have reached that the complaint states no ground for the equitable relief sought, and the learned trial court rightfully so concluded.

The judgment is affirmed.

DESMOND v. STANDARD BOND & MORTGAGE CO. (Civ. 5115.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 23, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑989—On appeal, defendant cannot select that part of evidence which does not support findings as basis for request for reversal.

Defendant cannot, on appeal, select that part of evidence which does not support findings and present it as basis for request for reversal of judgment.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Appellate court must affirm judgment, if record contains substantial evidence sustaining findings.

It is duty of appellate court to affirm judgments, if in record there appears substantial evidence to sustain findings.

3. Fraud 🔑58(1)—In action by purchaser for false representations in sale of house, evidence held to sustain finding that statements respecting construction of house were of fact, not opinion.

In purchaser's action for false representations by vendor in sale of house, evidence held to justify court's holding that statements made respecting workmanship and foundation of house were statements of fact rather than mere expressions of opinion.

4. Fraud 🔑22(1)—Inexperienced purchaser need not investigate to determine truth of vendor's agent's representations that house was A–1 as regards recovery of damages.

Where vendor, engaged in business of constructing and selling house, having agent who visited premises every day while house was being erected, represented through agent that house was built on solid foundation, and that workmanship was A–1, held that no obligation rested on inexperienced purchaser to investigate for the purpose of determining whether statements made by agent were true as regards her right to recover damages, where such representations proved to be untrue.

5. Fraud 🔑62—$1,000 for false representations by vendor in sale of house, which was poorly constructed, held not excessive.

In purchaser's action for damages for false representation of vendor in sale of house which proved to be poorly constructed, finding that purchaser was damaged to extent of $1,000 held supported by evidence.

6. Fraud 🔑60—Interest held properly allowed on sum awarded purchaser as damages, in action for false representations in sale of house (Civ. Code, § 3288).

In purchaser's action against vendor for false representations in sale of house, allowance of interest on sum which plaintiff suffered as damages held not error under Civ. Code, § 3288, providing, "in every action for fraud, interest may be given in discretion of jury."

7. Fraud 🔑58(4)—Finding that purchaser relied on vendor's false representations in purchasing house which was poorly constructed held supported by evidence.

In action by purchaser for false representation by vendor in sale of house which proved to be poorly constructed, evidence held to support finding that purchaser relied on representations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Eleanor Desmond against the Standard Bond & Mortgage Company for damages for false representation. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. McDowell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Eugene C. Campbell, of Long Beach, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff purchased from defendant, on March 3, 1920, a lot in the city of Long Beach, upon which there had just been constructed a small dwelling house. Defendant was then engaged in the business of building and selling houses. Plaintiff moved into the house shortly after she purchased it, and soon thereafter the floors buckled and settled, and most of the plastering fell from the walls. Finally she was compelled to move away from the house while repairs were being made. She alleged in her complaint that defendant represented to her before the purchase that the house had been constructed in a first-class manner, with first-class plastering and painting, and with a first-class foundation, having underpinning posts not more than three feet apart. These representations she alleged were false, and were made by defendant with intent to defraud her, and in a manner not warranted by the information defendant had at the time. The trial court found plaintiff's allegations to be true, and rendered judgment in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $1,000, the difference between the actual value of the property at the time of the purchase and the value which the premises would have had if the representations had been true.

Abundant evidence appears in the record to sustain the findings of the court. It was thoroughly established that there was an insufficient number of piers for the house to rest upon, and that these had not been imbedded, but had been placed upon the surface of the ground. Rain water had softened the soil, and the foundations had sunk, thereby causing the floors to buckle and settle. The plastering was admitted to be so poor that replastering was necessary. Even the man who supervised the construction of the house testified that the plaster was not properly prepared, and that it had not been mixed with hair. It would unnecessarily lengthen this opinion to enumerate the many serious defects in the construction of the house.

[1-3] Defendant contends that the statements made to plaintiff concerning the construction of the dwelling were expressions of opinion only, and were not false representations. The statements were made by one Neece, who sold the property as agent for defendant. Neece visited the house every day while it was being constructed, and "O.K'd approximately all the bills." While the record shows that plaintiff did, during the course of her testimony, say that Neece had told her he thought the lumber was good, and that the purchase of the property was a good investment, the record also discloses that Neece made a number of positive statements of facts which cannot be classified as mere opinions. Defendant cannot on appeal select that part of the evidence which does not support the findings and present it as a basis for a request for a reversal of the judgment. It is the duty of this court to affirm the judgment if in the record there appears substantial evidence to sustain the findings. Plaintiff testified:

> "Mr. Neece said, 'The ground under this house is literally dotted with the underpinning.' And I asked him, 'How far apart?' and he said, 'About this far.' Just a bit wider than his own body. * * *
> "Q. Did you ask him anything about the general construction of the house, or have any talk with him about the general construction of the house? A. Just what I said, describing the woodwork and the plaster and the painting and papering, were of A-1 workmanship. * * * He spoke then except for that one spot in the ceiling that the plaster and the woodwork and the finish and the flooring and all were A-1 workmanship, and the best that could be had at that time."

Miss Renius, who was assisting Neece in the sale of the house, said to plaintiff:

> "There is one thing that Neece & Wiseman have insisted upon, is a good foundation for those houses out there."

The evidence clearly established that the ground under the house was far from dotted with underpinning. If the statement of Neece had been true, there would have been several times as many piers under the house as were actually placed there. The court was justified in holding that the statements made by Neece amounted to statements of fact rather than mere expressions of opinion. In French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515, the court said:

> "What amounts to an expression of opinion as compared with a positive statement of fact depends upon all the circumstances of the case, and is a question for the trial court to determine. * * * The trial court here found that defendant stated, as a fact, that the soil was the finest sediment soil, and we are bound by that finding."

[4] No obligation rested upon plaintiff to investigate for the purpose of determining if the statements made by Neece were true. She was inexperienced in matters of this kind, and had never constructed or purchased a house before. Defendant was engaged in the business of constructing and selling houses, and its agent, Neece, had visited the premises every day while the house was being erected. No circumstance was shown in evidence, and nothing appeared from her observation of the premises, which put her on inquiry to make sure that the house had been properly built. In view of the positive statements of Neece on the subject of the foundation, it cannot be said that it was plaintiff's duty to crawl under the house to count the underpinning posts.

[5] In attempting to uphold its contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings on the subject of damages, defendant asserts that the actual value of the property at the time of the purchase was not shown. Mr. Neece testified that the value of the property would have been $5,000 at the time of the purchase, if it had been constructed in a first-class manner. Another witness stated that the actual value of the premises six months later was $3,500 or $3,600, while a third witness testified that the property increased in value 7 per cent. during this period. Moreover, the court found upon sufficient evidence that plaintiff had expended the sum of $646.17 in making partial repairs to the house. It was established that to complete the repairs and put the premises in the condition as represented plaintiff would have to expend an additional sum, which would bring the total to more than $1,000. The findings on the subject of damages are amply supported.

[6] The trial court did not err in allowing interest on the sum which plaintiff had suffered as damages. Section 3288 of the Civil Code provides:

"In an action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, and in every case of oppression, fraud, or malice, interest may be given, in the discretion of the jury."

In Sutherland on Damages, section 354, this statement is found:

"Money obtained wrongfully or by extortion or fraud is recoverable with interest from the time it is obtained."

[7] Defendant contends that plaintiff "did not rely upon any statements made to her by or on behalf of the defendant, but upon her own investigation." The findings on the point are favorable to the plaintiff and are sustained, as is shown by the following testimony of plaintiff:

"Q. By Mr. Campbell: Did he say it was A-1? A. Yes, A-1.

"Q. Well, did you believe his statement in reference to the construction of the house? A. Yes; I believed him.

"Q. Did you rely upon those statements when you purchased the house? A. Yes; absolutely. Prior to this time I had had no experience in the construction of houses, and I had never bought a house before at all."

The judgment is affirmed.

FOLSOM v. BURNS et al. (Civ. 5797.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 25, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⊙⟹204(1)—Appellant cannot for first time on appeal object to introduction of testimony.

Appellant who had not objected to the introduction of testimony at time it was given could not for the first time raise such point on appeal from judgment.

2. Appeal and error ⊙⟹843(2)—Where defendant claimed through one whom court found had no interest in property, whether plaintiff was purchaser for value without notice was immaterial in action to quiet title.

In action to quiet title, wherein defendant claimed rights in land through one whom court found to have had no interest in land when defendant's alleged rights attached, whether plaintiff was purchaser for value without notice was immaterial.

3. Quieting title ⊙⟹44(4)—Plaintiff held entitled to quiet title against judgment creditor asserting lien on land as debtor's property where debtor never had interest therein.

Plaintiff held entitled to decree quieting title against judgment creditor asserting a lien on land as the property of the judgment debtor, where evidence showed that such judgment debtor never had any interest in the property in question.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Marion A. Folsom against Virginia B. Burns, A. E. Newton, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Newton appeals, C. W. Chamberlain, as executor of the estate of A. E. Newton, deceased, being substituted as appellant on defendant Newton's death. Affirmed.

F. L. Richardson, of San Diego, for appellant.

Lewis J. Utt, of San Diego, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. The action upon which the appeal herein is predicated was brought for the purpose of quieting title in the plaintiff to certain real property as against the claims of each of the several defendants therein named. With the exception of defendant Newton, none of the defendants appeared or in any manner contested the claim of plaintiff to ownership of the property in question. His claim depended upon an asserted lien created by virtue of a certain judgment. Since the filing of the appeal herein, appellant Newton has deceased, and, by order of court, C. W. Chamberlain, as executor of the last will of said Newton, has been substituted in his place as appellant in this proceeding.

Based upon the evidence adduced on the trial of the action, the trial court made findings which, in substance, included the facts that all the allegations contained in the complaint were true, and that none of the allegations contained in the separate answer of defendant Newton was true; that at the time judgment was rendered, and for a long time prior thereto, plaintiff was the owner and in the possession of the real property in question; that on the 21st day of February, 1921, Virginia B. Burns was duly adjudicated a bankrupt in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, and that Carl O. Retsloff was, and at all times since the commencement of the action has been, the duly appointed, qualified and acting trustee for the estate of said bankrupt; that the claims of Virginia B. Burns and Carl O. Retsloff as said trustee in bankruptcy, and A. E. Newton were without any right whatsoever, and that neither of said defendants had any estate, right, title, or interest whatever in the property described in the complaint or any part thereof; that in said bankruptcy proceedings the said Virginia B. Burns disclaimed the ownership of any real property, and both she and her mother, Mrs. M. Agnes Matthews, denied in particular that Virginia B. Burns ever owned any interest in the property in question; that on March 7, 1921, defendant Newton recovered a judgment against defendant Virginia B. Burns, and that said judgment had never been satisfied, but that it did not constitute a valid or subsisting lien against the property described in the complaint; that on the date that said judgment was rendered the title to said real estate did not stand in the name of said Virginia B. Burns, nor at that time nor ever did she have any right, title, or interest whatsoever therein or thereto. In effect the trial court further found that at a time prior to September 11, 1916, although the record title to the property originally stood in the name of Mrs. M. Agnes Matthews (the mother of plaintiff and her sister, Virginia B. Burns), nevertheless, as at the time the property was purchased plaintiff had paid more than two-thirds of the purchase price of said property, Mrs. Matthews was a trustee of plaintiff's interest therein; that thereafter, to wit, on September 8, 1922, for a good and valuable consideration, Mrs. Matthews caused the entire title to said property to vest in plaintiff; that at all times between September 11, 1916, and September 8, 1922, Mrs. Matthews was in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession of said premises as the owner thereof, and that thereafter plaintiff was in such possession—with all of which facts defendant Virginia B. Burns was entirely familiar; that on the 11th day of September, 1916, the said Mrs. Matthews made a deed in which Virginia B. Burns was named as the grantee of the said property, but that said deed was never delivered—notwithstanding which latter fact, on September 17, 1923, it was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county in which said property was situated; that at all times between September 11, 1916, and September 17, 1923—a period of over seven years—plaintiff paid all expenses of upkeep of said property, including all taxes levied thereon together with all interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum which became due and payable on a promissory note in the sum of $1,500 secured by a mortgage on said property; that plaintiff also paid a promissory note for the sum of $100, together with interest thereon (also secured by a mortgage on the property in question), which money on September 11, 1916, Mrs. Matthews had borrowed on said property—all of which facts were within the knowledge of said defendant Virginia B. Burns; that during all of said period of time, although plaintiff and Virginia B. Burns were sisters and on friendly terms, said Virginia B. Burns permitted plaintiff to expend said sums of money and acquiesced in everything that plaintiff did with reference to said property, and at all times concealed from plaintiff the signing and existence of the said purported deed made to her by Mrs. Matthews, dated September 11, 1916, and otherwise kept plaintiff in complete ignorance of any claim asserted by defendant Virginia B. Burns against said real property throughout said entire period of time until the recordation of said void deed on September 17, 1923; that at all times after the purchase of the property by plaintiff and her mother, Mrs. Matthews, and up to the time the title was vested in plaintiff on September 8, 1922, plaintiff openly asserted to her sister Virginia B. Burns that plaintiff owned over two-thirds of said property; that plaintiff likewise informed her said sister that the said property was to belong in entirety to plaintiff upon the termination of a certain trust entered into by deed of Mrs. Matthews on April 2, 1920; that plaintiff likewise informed her sister Virginia B. Burns of the terms and conditions of an agreement between plaintiff and her mother, Mrs. Matthews, wherein and whereby plaintiff was to take title to the said property and to receive the interest of Mrs. Matthews therein, and told her said sister that it was agreed between her mother and plaintiff that plaintiff would devote her entire time to taking care of her mother in her sickness, as well as pay for all medical attendance, nursing and extraordinary expenses, in consideration of plaintiff receiving the interest which her mother owned in said property; notwithstanding which, defendant Virginia B. Burns continued to conceal from plaintiff the existence of the deed made to her by her mother, and acquiesced in plaintiff's taking title to said property without calling the attention of plaintiff to any claim which Virginia B. Burns had therein.

[1] Appellant's first specification of error is that on the trial of the action plaintiff should not have been permitted to give certain testimony. It appears that no objection was made by defendant to the introduction of such testimony at the time it was given. In such circumstances, in accordance with the long-established rule, it must be held that appellant may not for the first time raise the point on appeal from the judgment.

[2] It is next urged by appellant that error was committed by the trial court in holding that the plaintiff was a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice of the deed dated September 11, 1916, from Mrs. Matthews to Virginia B. Burns, and recorded on the 17th day of September, 1923. Inasmuch as the fact was found by the trial court that Virginia B. Burns never owned any interest in the property described in the pleadings, the question of whether plaintiff was a purchaser without notice becomes immaterial so far as appellant's claim is concerned.

[3] It is finally suggested by appellant that the trial court erred in decreeing that the plaintiff was the absolute owner of the real estate described in the complaint and in quieting her title thereto against the lien of the judgment of defendant Newton; and that, at any rate, the court should have decreed that said

Virginia B. Burns was the owner of an undivided one-third interest in said property subject to the judgment lien of defendant Newton. As hereinbefore indicated, the evidence introduced on the trial conclusively established the fact that plaintiff was the owner of the property which was the subject of the action, and that Virginia B. Burns never had any interest therein. As the asserted lien of the Newton judgment on said property depended entirely upon the assumed ownership of Virginia B. Burns therein, it follows that no error was committed by the trial court in reaching the conclusion that plaintiff was entitled to a decree quieting her title to the whole of the property in question.

The judgment is affirmed.

91 Cal. App. 333

KLEGMAN v. MOYER. (Civ. 6219.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 26, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 25, 1928.

1. Mortgages 🔑280(1)—Assumption of mortgage is distinguished from mere taking subject thereto; "assume."

The term "assume" when used with reference to assumption of mortgage or incumbrance has a meaning distinguished from mere taking subject to a mortgage or other lien, there being but little distinction between assumption and execution of mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Assume.]

2. Evidence 🔑450(5)—Parol evidence held admissible to explain provision of contract that defendant should accept property subject to $20,000 incumbrance, payable 2 years from date, to show defendant's execution of mortgage was required.

Provision in contract for exchange of properties, whereby defendant was to accept property "subject to first incumbrance in the sum of $20,000, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and due as follows: On or before 2 years from date," held subject to explanation by parol evidence as uncertain and ambiguous, in action for damages for breach of contract, to determine whether contract called for defendant's execution of mortgage, in view of escrow instructions relative to defendant's giving or assuming of note and deed of trust.

3. Exchange of property 🔑8(4)—Evidence held to sustain finding that contract for exchange of properties calling for defendant's acceptance of property subject to $20,000 incumbrance required defendant to execute mortgage.

In action for damages for defendant's breach of contract to exchange real properties, evidence held to sustain finding that provision of contract which called for defendant's acceptance of property subject to first incumbrance of $20,000, with 6 per cent. interest, payable 2 years from date, required that defendant execute and deliver note and mortgage as part of the exchange, in view of original and amended escrow instructions calling for defendant's execution or assumption of trust deed.

4. Exchange of property 🔑5, 8(3)—Escrow instructions were not modification of exchange contract, and admission thereof in suit for damages for breach of contract was not variance.

In action for damages for breach of contract for exchange of properties, escrow instructions held not to constitute new contract between the parties, or modification of original contract for exchange, such as to produce variance as result of introduction of evidence of the escrow instructions which were not pleaded.

5. Exchange of property 🔑8(4)—Plaintiff's instructions to title company, that defendant and wife were to execute mortgage under contract for exchange of properties, held not inadmissible as extending contract to include defendant's wife.

In action for breach of contract to exchange properties instructions of plaintiff to title company that defendant and his wife were to execute mortgage, offered to explain provision in contract concerning defendant's acceptance of property subject to incumbrance, held not inadmissible on account of additional requirement that wife should join, where all of instruments executed by defendant were signed by his wife, and deed tendered by plaintiff ran to defendant and his wife as grantees, especially where no objection was made in negotiations to the demand that defendant's wife join, point was not raised in trial court, and defendant did not offer to execute mortgage himself.

6. Trial 🔑280—Objection to escrow instructions as requiring defendant's wife to join in mortgage held not raised by general objection.

General objection to offer of escrow instructions to title company in action for breach of contract for exchange of properties did not raise question that instructions improperly enlarged scope of contract by requiring defendant's wife to join in executing mortgage.

7. Appeal and error 🔑169—Reviewing court need not consider matters not raised in pleadings or presented to trial court.

Points not raised in the pleadings or not presented in trial court need not be passed upon on appeal.

8. Appeal and error 🔑673(2)—Record which merely showed offer of proof of limited portion of complaint in another suit, presented solely for purpose of impeachment, held not to present question of election of remedies.

In action for damages for breach of contract for exchange of properties, offer in evidence of restricted portion of plaintiff's complaint in a specific performance suit for purpose of impeachment only held not to present question of plaintiff's election of remedies on appeal; record being insufficient.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

9. Trial ⚷395(1)—Findings which as a whole show that material issues have been fairly determined support judgment.

If sufficient can be gathered from whole of findings of trial court to show that material issues are fairly determined, findings will be held to support judgment.

10. Appeal and error ⚷1071(6)—Failure to make additional findings is not ground for reversal, where such findings would have been adverse to appellant.

Where, in the light of the entire record, it is evidence that further findings, if made, would have been adverse to appellant's contention, failure of trial court to find further is not ground for reversal.

11. Appeal and error ⚷931(3)—Necessary inferences may be drawn from findings to support judgment.

Reviewing court is entitled to draw necessary inferences from the findings in order to support judgment.

12. Appeal and error ⚷1071(6)—Failure of trial court to make findings showing process by which it determined damages suffered from breach of contract to exchange properties held not reversible error (Civ. Code, §§ 3306, 3307).

In action for breach of contract to exchange properties, in which court found that plaintiff was damaged in sum of $5,000 as result of defendant's nonperformance, under Civ. Code, §§ 3306, 3307, failure of trial court to make findings as to respective market value of the properties and to show process by which final sum representing damages was arrived at held not error requiring reversal, since the statute makes measure for breach of agreement to purchase real property excess amount due seller under contract over the value of the property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action by Samuel Klegman against J. J. Moyer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Pierre A. Fontaine, of Oakland, for appellant.

Edward R. Eliassen and C. Leonard Rosenberg, both of Oakland, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover damages for the alleged breach by defendant of a certain contract to exchange real properties. The case was tried without a jury, and the trial court awarded plaintiff damages in the sum of $5,000. A motion for a new trial was made and denied. Defendant presents this appeal.

Plaintiff and defendant through the same agent signed and delivered separate exchange agreements. Plaintiff was to exchange certain described real property in Oakland for real property of defendant in the same city, and by the terms of the exchange agreement and as an additional consideration the defendant was to transfer to plaintiff a certain note and deed of trust covering property in Madera county, Cal. In the contract of exchange it was provided that plaintiff was to trade his property subject to a first incumbrance in the sum of $20,000, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum and due 2 years from date; that in addition to this first incumbrance the defendant was to execute to plaintiff a note and deed of trust secured by the same property in the sum of $2,500, which should be a second incumbrance.

It plainly appears from the agreements of exchange that if the same had been fully consummated plaintiff would deed to defendant all of the property described and belonging to plaintiff, and would receive from defendant certain real estate encumbered to the extent of $8,000, and also an assignment of a note owned by defendant and secured by deed of trust on certain Madera county real estate, in the amount of $12,500, and in addition thereto plaintiff was to receive back a note, secured by deed of trust on the property by plaintiff conveyed, in the sum of $2,500, and a cash payment of $500. By the terms of the exchange agreements the property thus conveyed by plaintiff was to be conveyed "subject only to first incumbrance of $20,000." It is around this provision of the agreement that much of the present controversy turns. Every other particular of the contemplated exchange was satisfactorily arranged. To present the issue it will be necessary to go further into the facts.

After the execution of the exchange agreements each of the parties proceeded to consummate the deal, and for that purpose initiated an escrow with a title company. The plaintiff, Klegman, on depositing deed executed by himself and wife delivered to the title company his instructions as follows: "J. J. Moyer and wife are to execute a first deed of trust and note for $20,000;" then follow the remaining conditions, concerning which there is no dispute. On the same date defendant, Moyer, upon depositing deed of himself and wife to the property conveyed by him and an assignment of the trust deed for $12,500 on the Madera county property, gave his written instructions as follows:

> "You are to receive for the account of J. J. Moyer good and sufficient deed for that certain property [describing property of plaintiff] on which I am to execute a note and deed of trust as a first lien in the sum of $20,000,"

By the terms of the original exchange agreement the defendant, Moyer, was to guarantee the payment of the note secured by deed of trust on the Madera lands. However, when he delivered the note and deed of trust to the title company the note was indorsed "without recourse," and the guaranty indorsement thereon was canceled. This brought about some discussion, but was finally settled by Moyer executing the guaranty. Then, after copies of Moyer's instructions to the title company had been given plaintiff, Moyer, without the knowledge or consent of Klegman, went to the office of the title company and, taking the original instructions, made a change therein. Where the instructions contained the clause, "I am to execute a note and deed of trust," Moyer struck out the word "execute" and wrote in ink the word "assume," thus making the clause read, "I am to assume a note and deed of trust." The transaction continued. The Hibernia Savings & Loan Society had a mortgage or deed of trust against the Klegman property in the amount of $16,500. Klegman proceeded to have the incumbrance removed and to arrange for the $20,000 incumbrance which was to remain on the property when transferred to Moyer. Accordingly Klegman prepared a first mortgage on his property in the sum of $20,000, which was to be executed by Moyer and wife and given to secure a note for $20,000 payable to Klegman and signed by Moyer and his wife. Then Klegman was to assign said note and mortgage to the bank. When the mortgage thus prepared was presented to Moyer, he made certain objections thereto. He objected to certain clauses pertaining to acceleration of due date upon transfer, and also the provisions thereof specifying the kind of money with which the obligation might be discharged. In the controversy ensuing each party was represented by counsel, and there is a sharp conflict as to just what was said or done at the time. Supporting the judgment there is evidence to the effect that neither Moyer or his counsel objected to the execution of this mortgage as such, provided the objectionable features were eliminated. Klegman did have all of the necessary changes made, and then Moyer took the position that he would prefer to execute the note and mortgage direct to the bank or to whomsoever it was intended should hold it. After further negotiations the whole transaction failed and no exchange was made.

The court below found that the failure to consummate the exchange was due to the acts and conduct of Moyer, and that Klegman at all times was ready, able, and willing to proceed and had done all things legally required of him. The court further found that as the result of the breach on the part of Moyer plaintiff was damaged in the amount of $5,000, for which sum plaintiff was awarded judgment.

Appellant advances many reasons why the judgment should be reversed, but all of these center about a few main contentions. It is contended that the rights and duties of both parties are measured and controlled by the first agreement of exchange; that this agreement expressly provided that the property of plaintiff should be conveyed "subject to an incumbrance of $20,000," and this contemplated a then existing lien; that the demand of plaintiff that defendant Moyer himself execute a mortgage on the premises was a substantial deviation from the terms of this contract, and, if made a condition of the exchange, it would be a new and different agreement and one upon which the minds of the parties had never met, and unenforceable, and if insisted upon, as it was, served as sufficient reason for Moyer's withdrawal from the exchange. Further, it is appellant's claim that in any event, conceding for the argument only that plaintiff might justly demand the execution of the mortgage by Moyer, yet he could not demand such an act from Moyer and his wife. In other words, the wife was not a party to the transaction in any sense.

[1, 2] It will be noted that the first written instruments between the parties were dated January 23, 1924. These instruments comprised two separate agreements of exchange, identical in language, with the difference only in the names of the parties. The contracts ran to Mutual Realty Company, and in each instrument this company was designated as agent of the owner. The contracts of exchange or the offers of exchange provided that if accepted the exchange should be closed by the parties at the office of Mutual Realty Company. This part of the exchange was evidently abandoned. On January 25, 1924, each of the parties signed and delivered his instructions to the title company, which have been hereinbefore referred to. In the offers of exchange as noted, the plaintiff was to convey his property and defendant was to accept this property "subject to first incumbrance in the sum of $20,000, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable and due as follows: On or before 2 years from date." This provision is not clear and unambiguous, and no definite understanding of the exact agreement results from a reading thereof, conceding that the instrument should be read as a whole. It will be noted that it does not, by reference or otherwise, attempt to identify an existing incumbrance. A fair construction would leave the idea that the incumbrance was to be one created for the purpose of the exchange in an attempt to equalize values. The term of the first incumbrance, namely, 2 years from date, lends further strength to the inference that no prior incumbrance was in the minds of the parties. The further restriction as to the amount of interest to be charged in the incumbrance doubtless was intended as a specification to be given a lien to be created rather than as descriptive of one already in existence. The defendant and appellant contended that by the wording of the exchange offer it was contemplated that plaintiff should negotiate a loan for $20,000 on the property, and that defendant should take the property subject thereto. However, within 2 days after the signing of the exchange offer the defendant in his written instructions to the title company said, "I am to execute a note and deed of trust as a first lien upon the property," and then later without the knowledge of plaintiff this was changed on the original to read, "I am to assume a note and deed of trust as a first lien." It will be seen therefrom that the construction adopted by defendant in either case differed from a taking of the property "subject to encumbrance of $20,000." The term "assume" has a meaning distinguished from a mere taking subject to a mortgage or other lien. See 18 California Jurisprudence at pages 44 and 45. From the cases there cited it follows that there is but little distinction between the assumption of a mortgage and the execution of a mortgage, speaking very generally and with particular reference to a case such as this.

The conclusion following the foregoing is that the provision of the contract "subject to first encumbrance of $20,000," etc., was a provision not so free from uncertainty or ambiguity as to preclude the trial court from taking evidence as to the true meaning and intent thereof. This the trial court did, over the objection of defendant. The objection was without merit, as is likewise the assignment of error predicated thereon.

[3] The testimony taken disclosed that before the defendant, Moyer, executed the offer or contract of exchange on January 23, 1924, there was a discussion between Moyer and the agent selected by him to negotiate the deal. Immediately it may be noted that this agent was authorized to act for both of the parties as a broker through whom and through whose efforts the entire transaction was being negotiated. The agent told Moyer that, under the terms of the contract about to be signed, Moyer was to execute the mortgage on the property, and that Klegman was to obtain the loan. To this Moyer made no objection, and understood and was willing to execute the $20,000 mortgage. The testimony further showed that, when the mortgage was presented to Moyer to execute, the ground of his refusal was not that the agreement did not so provide, but his objection went to the form of the mortgage instrument. Moyer said at that time—which was after he had secured the aid of able counsel:

> "When you bring the $20,000 mortgage and modify that language in the note and mortgage, why then we will do business; we will exchange."

However, when the desired changes were made, he refused to execute the mortgage and the contemplated exchange failed.

Appellant throughout is insistent that the escrow instructions do not constitute in themselves the contract between the parties, but that these instructions depend entirely upon and are inseparably tied to the original contract or agreement of exchange. His contention is thus set forth:

> "The said instructions were intended solely to provide for the performance of the contract of exchange dated January 23, 1924, that supported them."

Adopting this contention—and it is urged strenuously throughout appellant's brief—it must follow that appellant's escrow instructions then reflect his idea of the construction to be placed upon and the meaning and intent of the clause regarding the $20,000 mortgage. Appellant also recognizes the fact that when the word "execute" was stricken out and the word "assume" inserted in place thereof there was indicated again the understanding of the parties. However, appellant argues thus:

> "Surely this learned court is to be guided by the intentions of the parties rather than be bound by any technical legal definition. Among the laity the expression 'assume' is invariably and interchangeably used to mean 'subject to,' and this eminent court cannot fail to take cognizance of this fact as common knowledge."

If the words are thus interchangeable, it follows that "subject to" may be intended to mean "assume." Appellant is not only willing but anxious that the rule of construction which seeks to ascertain and follow the intent of the parties be invoked in his behalf, but objects strenuously to such a procedure whenever its effect might be in aid of his adversary.

Appellant further admits that the clause with reference to the $20,000 did contemplate the future act of placing this incumbrance on the property, which act was to be performed by "some one," but not by appellant.

The force of all these arguments coupled with the facts as presented compel the conclusion that the clause itself and its meaning are obscure and indefinite to the extent of requiring oral evidence in aid of the construction. And from the evidence thus taken we find sufficient to support the finding that the contract did provide that defendant was to execute and deliver the incumbrance intended as a part of the exchange.

[4] Appellant argues that the instructions, even if accepted, constituted a new contract, and that the new contract was not pleaded, or, if the instructions operated as a modification of the original agreement for exchange, then the modification was not pleaded. This defect in pleading, appellant continues, resulted in a variance between pleading and proof, and the contract which was the basis of recovery was not the contract sued upon.

The conclusions hereinbefore arrived at dispose of these contentions without further comment.

[5] It is further contended that, inasmuch as plaintiff, Klegman, inserted in his instructions to the title company that Moyer and his wife were to execute the mortgage, he thereby added an additional requirement to the contract by bringing in a new party, the wife, and insisted thereby upon a condition which defendant, Moyer, was justified in refusing to meet.

It is true that the wife of defendant, Moyer, was not a party to the agreement of exchange. It is true, however, that the deed tendered to Klegman was a deed running to J. J. Moyer and Ida Moyer, his wife, as grantees; and it would be obvious that if the title rested in both grantees any incumbrance thereon should cover the interest of both. Without objection, Moyer deposited in escrow all of the other instruments signed by Mrs. Moyer, his wife. For instance, Mrs. Moyer signed the deed conveying the property to be exchanged by Moyer. She signed the note and second deed of trust upon the Klegman property. She signed the assignment of the deed of trust on the Madera county property; in fact, she signed everything that Moyer signed.

Defendant, Moyer, in the court below urged his willingness to proceed with the exchange save and except on this one question of the $20,000 incumbrance. Not once in all of the negotiations or in the controversy did he object to the demand that Mrs. Moyer join in this incumbrance. On his examination after Moyer had given his version of the contract, and had contended that the mortgage was not to be executed by him, he testified as follows:

> "Q. Until February 19, 1924, did you know that Mr. Klegman has in his mind to have you sign this note and deed of trust for $20,000? A. No, it was absolutely a surprise to me.
> "Q. That was a surprise to you? A. Absolutely a surprise to me, because otherwise I would have had the wife down there and made arrangements for it."

Apparently throughout the attempted exchange it was taken for granted that the wives of the parties should join in all transfers. Appellant was ready to accept the deed running to himself and wife, and now urges that the demand of plaintiff that the wife join in the mortgage back was unwarranted. This contention cannot be sustained. The deeds tendered by defendant as well as the other transfers and assignments bore the signature of the wife; and it was and is fair to assume that she might have had some interest in the property conveyed. Without entering into any discussion of the law of community property, it will suffice to say that as a rule one dealing with a married man is to some extent at a peril when he neglects to consider what the interest of the wife might be. And particularly here, where the point was not raised in the trial court, and where every act and writing was without question as far as the present contention goes, it would be an extreme holding to support the contention of appellant. And this is further true for the reason that appellant did or does not offer to execute the mortgage himself, nor has he tendered the executed incumbrance without the additional signature.

[6] Appellant contends that he did raise the question in the court below, but this contention is based upon the notion that by a general objection to the offer of the instructions this specific objection was included.

If appellant was to receive the deed of plaintiff's property as running to Mrs. Moyer as well as himself, the effect of the instrument would be to vest the wife with an interest therein, and, as stated, this interest should be impressed with the mortgage lien. If appellant had any just ground for complaint he was called upon to express it at the time, and not merely as an afterthought in seeking some way out of his contract. In appellant's brief he states:

> "There is not one scintilla of evidence in the record to show that a note or mortgage of $20,000 was ever tendered by respondent or by any one in his behalf to the wife of appellant for her to execute, nor was there ever any demand made upon appellant's wife so to do."

The very next sentence reads as follows:

> "No more convincing evidence may be found in the record of the fact that the minds of respondent and appellant never did meet upon this matter of the execution of a note and mortgage for $20,000 than the conduct of respondent himself in constantly and inexorably demanding of appellant that both he, appellant, and his wife, execute said note and mortgage for $20,000."

The wife was ready and willing to sign all other papers, and the record shows that she was familiar with the transaction. Obviously the demands of respondent could not have been so insistent if the request was never brought to her. Appellant in arguing on the escrow instructions always insists that these were more or less unimportant as being merely the means each party was adopting to carry out his contract. To such an extent does he argue that he claims that when he changed the wording of his escrow instructions he was within his rights for the reason that these instructions were merely, as it were, suggestions. If this is correct, it would seem also that the suggestion that the wife join in the execution of the mortgage was likewise only a tentative proposal. And, as no objection was made to it at the time and apparently acquiesced in as far as mere execution was concerned, the point is not sharp enough to puncture the judgment.

[7, 8] Appellant urges that plaintiff cannot maintain the present action for the reason that, prior to the commencement thereof, the said plaintiff had instituted an action in the superior court of Alameda county wherein he sought specific enforcement of the contract of exchange. The contention is thus made:

> "'Said remedies are inconsistent, and the election of one is deemed the abandonment of the other. Plaintiff's present action to recover damages in lieu of specific performance cannot be successfully maintained until he has first established his right to specific performance."

However, we do not consider that we are called upon to pass on this question. In the first place, the point is presented here for the first time and was not raised in the pleadings nor at all in the court below. Secondly, there is no record before us sufficient to sustain the contention. In the court below defendant offered in evidence a part of the complaint in the action for specific performance. The offer was made under the following circumstances: Plaintiff had testified concerning the difference in value between the properties to be exchanged. This testimony was in support of plaintiff's claim for damages. Defendant's counsel, on cross-examination, asked plaintiff if he had not filed a complaint in another action in which complaint he had stated that the transaction was in all respects just and fair. The complaint was produced and these proceedings were had:

> "The Court: Make your offer in the legal way.
> "Mr. Fontaine: We will offer it in evidence.
> "The Court: Do you offer the whole thing?
> "Mr. Fontaine: No, just the particular portion of it.
> "The Court: Read it."

Upon the formal offer, the evidence was restricted as follows:

> "And I offer this particular portion of that only which reads as follows: 'That said agreement and the terms and conditions thereof aforesaid were and are in all respects just and fair and reasonable between the parties hereto.'"

The admission into evidence followed the offer. Therefore we have only the complaint before us restricted to the particular portion thereof, and no other record of the alleged suit in specific performance. A detailed statement was offered purely for purposes of impeachment, and the offer restricted to the particular portion relied on for that purpose. For the reasons given we decline to pass upon this question of election of remedies and the effect thereof.

Lastly, appellant contends that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment.

[9-12] The complaint alleged the contract and its breach and then alleged:

> "That, by reason of the premises, and because of defendant's refusal and neglect and failure to perform his part of the aforementioned agreement, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $15,500."

The answer denies this allegation specifically, denying further that plaintiff has been damaged in any sum or at all. The finding of the trial court is:

> "That it is true, by reason of the premises, and because of defendant's refusal and neglect and failure to perform his part of the aforesaid agreement, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $5,000."

The judgment is that plaintiff do have and recover the sum of $5,000. Appellant argues that it was the duty of the trial court to find specifically wherein plaintiff was damaged by the acts or omissions of defendant; that the trial court did not make a finding as to market value of the respective real properties of respondent and appellant, and in the absence of such a finding the trial court could not render a proper judgment.

It is appellant's theory that the measure of damages is controlled by section 3306 or 3307 of the Civil Code. Appellant concedes that the action is for damages resulting from breach of agreement to buy real property, and the Code section 3307 reads:

> "The detriment caused by the breach of an agreement to purchase an estate in real property, is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the amount which would have been due to the seller, under the contract, over the value of the property to him."

The whole theory upon which this phase of the case was tried in the court below was that the value of the property which defendant, Moyer, agreed to convey was greater by $15,000 or more than the value of the Klegman property, and that by reason of the breach Klegman was damaged to the amount of the difference. Many witnesses were called, and the whole controversy as to damages hinged upon this point. The finding of the court is necessarily a finding that the difference in value was the sum of $5,000. All parties understood or must have understood the finding in that light, and to reverse the cause now merely to require that the method of computation be set forth would seem a needless and useless procedure. There was abundant evidence in the record to support this conclusion of the trial court, and no interpretation can be placed on the finding other than that this was the trial court's conclusion. If the court had specifically set forth in the findings the value of plaintiff's property, and then the value of defendant's property, and by a process of simple computation then set forth the result, it would possibly have been more detailed. But, with the controversy hinging alone upon the question of value and the liability contingent upon the amount of difference between the properties, no one was misled as to the basis of the court's finding or as to the values found. If sufficient can be gathered from the whole of the findings of the court that material issues are fairly determined, the findings will support the judgment. Berry v. Crowell, 55 Cal. App. 537, 203 P. 835. From the facts found and from the judgment ordered it is evident, in the light of the entire record, that if more complete findings had been made, they would have been adverse to the contentions of appellant. If that be so, the failure to find further is not ground for reversal. Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 66 P. 309. We are entitled to draw necessary inferences from the findings in order to support a judgment. Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 571, 217 P. 750. In the case of Erskine v. Marchant, 37 Cal. App. 590, 174 P. 74, we find this language:

> "It is further contended that in awarding damages the court did not take into consideration the difference between the entire commission for each sale and what it would cost the plaintiff to make the sale. While it does not appear what elements the court consider in ascertaining the amount of damages, there was nothing in the court's finding to show that these costs and expenses were not taken into consideration. * * * It has been held that courts may find damages in a lump sum, and that any uncertainty in the findings is to be construed so as to support the judgment rather than to defeat it. * * * The trial court had before it evidence of the sales made by the plaintiff and the defendants prior and subsequent to the breach of the contract from which it could form a judgment as to the amount of plaintiff's loss, and from the record before us we cannot say that the trial court erred in estimating the damages."

The same rule is stated in 8 California Jurisprudence, 878, and cases cited. The great prejudice which appellant claims results to him from a finding of general damages is more imaginary than real. Many cases of this sort are submitted to a jury for determination under the general issue, and in no case does the verdict specify the values found, and in no case is it rendered difficult to determine the mode adopted in arriving at the jury's conclusion. This is mentioned merely to indicate that experience has not demonstrated or even suggested the necessity of always supporting a judgment for damages by diagramming the process of calculation leading to the conclusion.

The order of the trial court denied defendant's motion for a new trial. We find no error in such order.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

TREBILCOX v. CITY OF SACRAMENTO. (Civ. 3224.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 24, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 21, 1928.

1. Licenses 🔑1—Power to revoke license to conduct boxing and wrestling contests was not necessarily evidence that ordinance was regulatory measure.

Power to revoke license to conduct boxing and wrestling contests was not necessarily evidence that ordinance providing for licenses was regulatory measure.

2. Licenses 🔑1—Title stating "ordinance providing for licensing and regulating" trades, etc., was not conclusive that ordinance was regulatory measure.

Title of ordinance, reading in part, "An ordinance providing for licensing and regulating certain professions, trades," etc., did not control subject-matter of ordinance, and was not conclusive that ordinance was a regulatory measure.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑112(2)—City council could adopt omnibus form of providing for payment of licenses for carrying on numerous businesses and occupations.

It was proper and legal for city council to adopt omnibus form of providing for payment of licenses for carrying on of each and all of numerous businesses and occupations mentioned in ordinance, rather than to adopt ordinance relating to each business or occupation.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑111(4)—Invalidity of one or more sections of ordinance providing for licensing of different businesses and occupations would not invalidate entire ordinance.

If one or more sections of ordinance providing for payment of licenses for carrying on numerous businesses and occupations were invalid, it would not for that reason result that entire ordinance was invalid.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑592(1)—Ordinance for revenue purposes requiring licenses of those conducting boxing or wrestling exhibitions held not invalidated by statute, creating state athletic commission; "municipal affair" (Const. art. 11, § 6, as amended, and Pol. Code, § 3366, Initiative Statute approved Nov. 4, 1924).

Ordinance of city of Sacramento for revenue purposes, requiring licenses to conduct boxing or wrestling exhibitions when admission fee is charged, held under Const. art. 11, § 6, as amended, and Pol. Code, § 3366, not invalidated, by Initiative Statute approved Nov. 4, 1924, (St. 1927, p. LXXXIX), creating state athletic commission of California, since power to tax for all purposes conferred on legislative body of municipal corporation governed by freeholders' charter is "municipal affair" within contemplation of Const. art. 11, § 6.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Municipal Affairs.]

6. Municipal corporations 🔑111(4)—Invalidity of provisions of ordinance authorizing revocation of license without notice cannot vitiate legal force of provisions of ordinance requiring payment of license tax for revenue.

Invalidity of provisions of ordinance attempting to clothe city council with power to revoke without notice to licensee or without giving him hearing on charge on which his license is proposed to be or is revoked cannot have effect of vitiating legal force of provisions of ordinance requiring payment of license tax for revenue by persons therein enumerated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Action to recover license fees by M. F. Trebilcox against the City of Sacramento. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ralph H. Lewis, of Sacramento, for appellant.

R. L. Shinn, City Atty., and Chas. J. Hasman, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff by this action sued the defendant to recover the total sum of $475 as for four different claims alleged to be owing by the latter to as many different alleged claimants, and which claims, it is alleged, were severally assigned to plaintiff by such claimants prior to the commencement of this action. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend. From the judgment thereupon entered, plaintiff appeals.

The plaintiff's assignors are four different incorporated athletic clubs, the principal place of business of each being the city of Sacramento. The specific object of this action is to recover from said city certain sums of money paid to the defendant as for license fees for managing, conducting, and carrying on boxing and wrestling exhibitions in said city after a certain initiative statute, hereinafter to be referred to, went into effect. The allegations of the four causes of action set forth in the complaint are, with the exception of the parties assigning their claims to the plaintiff and the respective sums claimed by said assignors, substantially the same.

The contention of the plaintiff is that the ordinance, by authority of the provisions of which the assignors of the plaintiff were required to pay to said city, as a license fee or tax, the moneys here sued for, is a regulatory measure, and therefore, unless it be true that the "regulation" of boxing and wrestling matches be a "municipal affair," it was and is superseded or invalidated by an initiative statute approved by the electors of the state at the general election on the 4th day of November, 1924, and which became effective or operative on the 17th day of December, 1924 (St. 1925, p. LXXXIX).

An ordinance of the city of Sacramento providing for licensing and regulating the carrying on of certain professions, trades, callings, and occupations within said city was passed by the legislative body thereof on October 1, 1921, and is designated and known as "Ordinance No. 18, Fourth Series, Ordinances of the City of Sacramento." By virtue of its own terms it went into effect October 1, 1921, as an emergency measure. On the 11th day of May, 1922, the city council of said city enacted an ordinance designated and known as "Ordinance No. 73, Fourth Series, Ordinances of the City of Sacramento," adding to Ordinance No. 18, Fourth Series, the following section, designated in said Ordinance No. 18 as:

> "Section 31. For every person, firm or corporation conducting, managing or carrying on a boxing or wrestling exhibition, $25.00 for each exhibition, when a fee of admission is charged."

Said ordinance is entitled:

> "An ordinance providing for licensing and regulating the carrying on of certain professions, trades, callings and occupations; providing a penalty for the violation of this ordinance and making this an emergency measure," etc.

It provides for the imposition of a license tax upon a long list of callings and occupations, many, if not most, of which are not subject to regulation.

The statute above referred to, and which it is claimed superseded the ordinance in question, created a board to be known as the "state athletic commission of California," consisting of three members, to be appointed by the Governor. It authorizes the maintenance of the business of the carrying on of boxing contests, sparring matches, or exhibitions for prizes or purses, or where an admission fee is received. It vests the commission in its discretion with the authority to issue, "and at its pleasure revoke," a license to conduct, hold, or give boxing, sparring, and wrestling contests, matches, and exhibitions, where an admission fee is received, to any club, corporation, organization, or association which holds a lease of a term of at least one year of the premises in which such match, contest, or exhibition is to be held, etc. It prescribes the procedure to be followed to obtain a license to conduct such matches or contests or exhibitions, and provides that there shall accompany the applications for such permits the annual fee, the amount of which must be in accord with that fixed by the statute for such business transacted in a city of the population of Sacramento. There are certain regulatory provisions regarding the manner in which such matches and contests are to be conducted.

The city of Sacramento is, and for many years has been, operating as a municipal corporation under a freeholders' charter. The charter under which it is now operating was ratified by the electors of said city on the 30th day of November, 1920, and ratified by the Legislature at its regular biennial session in 1921. Among the powers thereby granted to the city council or the legislative body of said city is the following (section 12, art. 3):

> "To license for purposes of regulation and revenue all and every kind of business not prohibited by law to be transacted or carried on in the city; to fix the rates of license upon the same and to provide for the collection of such license by suit or otherwise; and, when not unlawful, to license, tax, regulate, prohibit, or suppress all tippling houses, dramshops, saloons, bars, bar rooms, raffles, hawkers, peddlers, pawnbrokers, refreshment or coffee or soft drink stands, booths and sheds."

The Legislature of 1901 added to the Political Code section 3366 (Stats. 1901 p. 635), which, among things, provides:

> "Boards of supervisors of the counties of the state, and the legislative bodies of the incorporated cities and towns therein, shall, in the exercise of their police powers, and for the purpose of regulation, as herein provided, and not otherwise, have the power to license all and every kind of business not prohibited by law," etc.

Section 6, art. 11, of the Constitution, prior to November, 1896, provided that all "cities and towns * * * and all charters thereof framed or adopted by authority of this Constitution" were "subject to and controlled by general laws." Under that provision of the Constitution, section 3366 of the Political Code, being a general law, controlled as to all matters or subjects pertaining to legally appropriate to the government of a municipal corporation to which it related; and under that section, by force of the limitation upon the power of incorporated cities and towns to impose license fees upon every business, calling, and occupation transacted or carried on within the municipal limits thereof for the purpose of regulation only, necessarily excluded the right of such cities and towns to impose such licenses for the purposes of revenue. In the year 1896, however, the electors of the state approved and adopted an amendment to section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution. This amendment, in so far as it concerned the present consideration, read as follows:

> "All charters thereof framed or adopted by authority of this Constitution, except in municipal affairs, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws."

In 1914 the electors of the state approved and ratified an amendment to said section and article as it read after the adoption of the amendment of 1896. The particular language of the amendment of 1914 pertinent to the present inquiry reads as follows:

> "Cities and towns hereafter organized under charters framed and adopted by authority of this Constitution are hereby empowered, and cities and towns heretofore organized by authority of this Constitution may amend their charters in the manner authorized by this Constitution so as to become likewise empowered hereunder, to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters, and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to and controlled by general laws."

There is no change made, except in form of language, by the amendment of section 6 of article 11 of 1914 with regard to immunity of cities organized under and governed by freeholders' charters from control or interference by general laws in matters which are municipal affairs guaranteed to such cities by the amendment of said provision of the Constitution in the year 1896. Therefore the cases construing the meaning and scope of the amendment of 1896 apply also to the amendment of the section in 1914.

In Fragley v. Phelan, 126 Cal. 383, 387, 58 P. 923, 925, speaking of the phrase "municipal affairs," as used in said amendment, the Supreme Court said:

> "For the purpose of getting at the true significance of these words, there is no brighter light to be shed upon them, than is disclosed by a consideration of the reasons which moved the Legislature to propose the amendment, and the people to adopt it. What was the evil to be remedied? What was the good to be gained by this amendment? The answer is common, everyday history. It was to prevent existing provisions of charters from being frittered away by general laws. It was to enable municipalities to conduct their own business and control their own affairs to the fullest possible extent in their own way. It was enacted upon the principle that the municipality itself knew better what it wanted and needed than did the state at large, and to give that municipality the exclusive privilege and right to enact direct legislation which would carry out and satisfy its wants and needs."

[1, 2] The only two questions here for decision are: (1) Is the provision of the ordinance in question exacting the payment of a license tax from persons engaged in the business of carrying on sparring, wrestling, or boxing matches or contests, or the ordinance itself, a regulatory measure? If not, is the power conferred on the legislative body of the city of Sacramento by its charter (a freeholders' charter) to license for purposes of revenue those who hold and carry on boxing and wrestling matches or contests within the limits of said city a "municipal affair?" The ordinance in question, as we have above stated, provides for the collection of license fees for the maintenance, conducting, and carrying on of a large number of different callings, occupations, and businesses. A large number of such callings or businesses are not, as also above stated, appropriate or subject to regulation. Section 31 of said ordinance relating to boxing and wrestling contests contains no provision regulating the manner of conducting such business, or any regulatory provisions at all. As will be seen, it merely prescribes the amount of the license fee to be paid by all engaged in carrying on such business. Counsel says that as evidence of the regulatory character of the provisions of the ordinance is the power thereby vested in the city council to revoke any license issued to any person to maintain a place where boxing and wrestling contests are held. But the power to revoke is not necessarily evidence that the ordinance is a regulatory measure. The proper authorities may, according to legal processes or procedure, revoke a license issued to a person to carry on any kind of business, whether subject to regulation or not, if it be shown that the purpose for which the license has been issued is being abused to the detriment of the public, or is used for a purpose wholly foreign to that for which it was issued. If, for illustration, a license is issued to a person to carry on the business of a café or restaurant, and it turns out that the person to whom the license was issued is or has been, in connection with the restaurant business, engaged in keeping and selling prohibited liquors, and so violating the law, of course his license to conduct the restaurant may and should be revoked. The same would be true as to the keeper of a hotel, or a mercantile business, or, indeed, of persons carrying on any kind of legitimate and necessary business. Counsel declares, however, that the title of the ordinance clearly indicates that the purpose of the ordinance is that of regulation. The ordinance, as shown above, is entitled in part, "An ordinance providing for licensing and regulating of certain professions, trades," etc. City ordinances are not required to have a title. Or, as is stated in Re Johnson, 47 Cal. App. 465, 467, 190 P. 852, 853, "a title is not an indispensable part of an ordinance. It may have a defective title," but this would not or does not invalidate the force of the ordinance. See, also, Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 44 P. 725, 32 L. R. A. 527; Ex parte Young, 154 Cal. 317, 97 P. 822, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 330. The title of an ordinance in no manner or degree controls the subject-matter thereof, or is to be taken as conclusive as to its purpose or the character of its provisions.

[3, 4] There are, it is true, certain provisions in the ordinance regarding the business of undertakers and that of retailers of nonintoxicating alcoholic beverages, as to which businesses certain conditions are imposed upon any person intending to engage therein as a prerequisite to his right to receive a license. By those provisions, persons desiring and intending to engage in such businesses are required to file a verified application before the city council before a permit to carry on such businesses may be granted. Said provisions may in their nature be more or less regulatory, but they are confined in their application to the businesses mentioned. Section 31 of the ordinance, authorizing licenses to be issued to persons to carry on the business of boxing, sparring, or wrestling matches, does not, as is to be seen, contain any conditions which must be complied with as a prerequisite to the right of any person applying for a license for such purpose to have the same issued to him. And section 31 is the only section or place in the ordinance where boxing and wrestling matches are referred to. As we have seen, the ordinance in question deals with a large variety of businesses, callings, and occupations each in separate and distinct sections. The one section has no relation to, or connection with, the other, in so far as the subject-matter thereof is concerned. As many ordinances as there are callings and occupations dealt with in the ordinance in question, each such ordinance providing for the payment of a license fee by any person engaging in any particular business or occupation thus separately legislated upon, could, of course, legally have been passed. But, as a matter of convenience, it was proper and legal for the city council to adopt, as it did, the omnibus form of providing for the payment of licenses for the carrying on of each and all of the numerous businesses and occupations mentioned in the ordinance under attack here. It follows from all these considerations that, if one or more sections of the ordinance were deemed to involve the unlawful exercise of the taxing power conferred on the city council of the city of Sacramento by its charter, it would not for that reason result that the entire ordinance was invalid. This is merely the application of the familiar rule that, if a part of a statute be invalid, the other parts, if in no measure or sense dependent for their validity upon the invalid part, will remain undisturbed, and subject to enforcement.

[5] There can be no possible doubt that the power to tax for all purposes conferred upon the legislative body of a municipal corporation governed by a freeholders' charter is strictly a "municipal affair" within the intent and contemplation of section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution. Indeed, it would be difficult to conceive what is "a municipal affair" if the power vested in a municipality by its charter to raise and collect revenues for the support of its local government does not come within the phrase "municipal affairs," as it is used in the Constitution. But this proposition has been thoroughly and ably and clearly considered by the Supreme Court in a number of cases. The case of Ex parte Braun, 141 Cal. 204, 74 P. 780, the opinion by former Chief Justice Angellotti, exhaustively considers the question. Not only that, but the opinion discusses and decides nearly every question involved in the present case in a case in which the general facts are very much the same as those of the one now before us. Braun was arrested and held by the chief of police of the city of Los Angeles for trial before the police court of that city for "willfully and unlawfully" conducting, managing, and carrying on the "business of a wholesale liquor dealer without first having procured a license from the city of Los Angeles so to do." The charge for which the petitioner thus was held was founded on an ordinance of said city entitled: "An ordinance providing for licensing and regulating the carrying on of certain professions, trades, callings, and occupations carried on within the limits of the city of Los Angeles," and was adopted and passed February 28, 1903. The petitioner asked for his release by the Supreme Court through a writ of habeas corpus. The principal question presented in the proceeding before the Supreme Court was whether the collection of a license tax for revenue purposes under the provisions of the Los Angeles charter (a freeholders' charter) was a "municipal affair." In the opinion it is said:

> "The meaning of the term 'municipal affairs,' as these words are used in the constitutional amendment of 1896, has been considered in several decisions of this court. In discussing the effect of this amendment, this court has always recognized the reason that impelled its adoption. After much public discussion, and upon an exhaustive consideration of the question, it had been decided by this court that the Legislature, prior to this amendment, had power, by general laws, to supersede, or take away, without the consent of the municipality, the powers conferred upon it by a special charter. Thomason v. Ashworth, 73 Cal. 73 [14 P. 615]; People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436 [18 P. 413]; Davies v. Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 37, 24 P. 771. These decisions had demonstrated that the power given by the Constitution to cities to frame charters for their own government for the purpose, as was said in People v. Hoge, 55 Cal. 612, 618, of emancipating them from the authority and control formerly exercised over them by the Legislature in municipal matters, were unavailing if such charters could at once be superseded by any general legislative enactment. Under these circumstances, the section of the Constitution providing that all cities and towns and the charters thereof should be subject to and controlled by general laws was amended by the addition of the words 'except in municipal affairs.'"

Again in the same opinion the court declares:

> "The words used in the amendment are words of wide import, broad enough to include all powers appropriate for a municipality to possess and actually conferred upon it by the sovereign power. The collection of a license-tax for revenue purposes is a well-recognized exercise of the taxing power. See People v. Martin, 60 Cal. 153. That the power of taxation is a power appropriate for a municipality to possess is too obvious to merit discussion. As was said by Mr. Justice Field in United States v. New Orleans, 98 U. S. 381 [25 L. Ed. 225], 'A municipality without the power of taxation would be a body without life, incapable of acting, and serving no useful purpose.' It was further said in that case that: 'When such a corporation is created, the power of taxation is vested in it, as an essential attribute, for all the purposes of its existence, unless its exercise be in express terms prohibited. For the accomplishment of these purposes, its authorities, however limited the corporation, must have power to raise money and control its expenditure.'"

The court concludes by saying that the power to collect license taxes for revenue purposes was "actually conferred upon the city of Los Angeles for municipal purposes by the charter framed for its government, under the provisions of section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution, and that such power is a 'municipal affair' within the meaning of those words as used in section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution, and cannot be withdrawn or abrogated by the Legislature. Section 3366 of the Political Code is therefore inapplicable to that city."

[6] Counsel for the plaintiff, in his briefs refers to many cases which he claims support his position that the ordinance in question is invalid. Some of the cases so cited harmonize, rather than disagree, with the position of the defendant. It is true, however, that the case of Angelopulos v. Bottorff, 76 Cal. App. 621, 245 P. 447, decided by this court February 24, 1926, the opinion being written by Justice Plummer, holds that the act of the city council of the city of Sacramento in revoking, without notice or a hearing, the plaintiff's license to conduct a restaurant business within the limits of said city because of an alleged violation of the prohibition laws in the carrying on of said business involved the taking from the plaintiff of a property right, in contravention of the "due process clause" of the state and Federal Constitutions, and that, for that reason, the provision of said ordinance purporting to vest in the city council any such power was and is unconstitutional and void. The soundness of this conclusion is, of course, unimpeachable. But the failure, if there be such failure, of the city council to provide proper procedure for coercing the payment of the license taxes exacted by said ordinance or for the punishment of any person subject to the payment of such tax for nonpayment thereof is a matter which is not involved in this case, nor is it so connected with the issues presented herein as to affect the decision thereof; for the invalidity of the provisions of the ordinance attempting to clothe the city council with power to revoke without a notice to the licensee or without giving him a hearing on the charge on which his license is proposed to be or is revoked does not, and cannot, for reasons briefly stated above, have the effect of vitiating the legal force of the provisions of said ordinance requiring the payment of a license tax for revenue by persons engaged in the prosecution of the callings or businesses therein enumerated.

The case of Ex parte Braun is decisive of this case in favor of the defendant.

The judgment is accordingly affirmed.
